☞ The Seventh Day Advocate, of Marion, Iowa, comes out enlarged and improved in appearance. It is now a folio. It is only just to these friends to state that they have no sympathy with Ellen White's visions. They hold to the keeping of the seventh day, and seem conscientious; yet we are certain they are mistaken in calling the ten commandments the moral law of God. Indeed, there is no such phrase in the Bible. Neither is there any such expression as "the ten commandments" in the New Testament. Our good friends in Iowa present a commendable spirit, but in their zeal for the law, they must remember that the two great precepts, love to God, and love to man, are in the very law they claim was nailed to the cross. Neither of the two love-precepts was on the tables of stone, but they are both on the tables of the heart.

☞ Sabbatarians now claim that the law referred to in Galatians is not the same as the one in Romans. Brother Smith, of the Review, gave us an overhauling for presuming that the Seventh day people believed the two epistles refer to the same law. And yet we find this statement from Jos. Clark, an old contributor, in the last Review. Bro. Smith will please set his Brother Clark right:

"But we know that the law is good if a man use it lawfully; knowing this, that the law is not made for a righteous man but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners." 1 Tim. 1: 8, 9. Then we conclude, after all, that Paul in his letters to the churches of Rome, of Corinth, and of Galatia, does not intend to do away the moral law, but to show how it is to be used; that is, that it should be used, lawfully. How is it to be applied? Answer, lawfully; that is, to convict the wicked, the sinner. Who are sinners? All the race of Adam before conversion.

If the law referred to in Timothy, Galatians and Romans is the moral law and that was not made for righteous folks, how does it happen that Sabbatarians are so tenacious about the seventh day, and argue that it was made for the righteous and is a moral precept? Evidently Brother Clark is in a dilemma. Perhaps Brother Smith can get him out. But how about Galatians? One says it is the moral law, another says it is the ceremonial law.

Exposition of Deut. xxxiii. 2.

A RESTITUTION correspondent is desirous of an explanation of the verse above named, which reads as follows:

"And he said the Lord came from Sinai, and rose up from Seir unto them; he shined forth from Paran and he came with ten thousands of his saints: from his right hand went a fiery law for them."

Some people consider this prophetic and refer it to a future event when Christ will move with His redeemed saints from old Mt. Sinai over to Jerusalem, after His second advent. This seems to be a very crude notion, and is unsupported by any Bible authority. It is quite easy to build up a theory if such interpretations of the Divine Word are allowed. Accepting the language as it stands, it is a plain statement of history, and embodies an outline of the march of Israel under the leadership of God, by the hand of Moses. The reader will find a similar statement in Judges iv. 4-6: "Lord, when thou wentest out of Seir, when thou marchedst out of the field of Edom, the earth trembled and the earth dropped, the clouds also dropped water. The mountains melted from before the Lord, even that Sinai from before the Lord God of Israel." This clearly states the point in regard to Seir. By turning to Numbers xiv. and reading carefully the reader will find how the glory of the Lord appeared to Moses and to Israel, in the wilderness of Paran. Read, also, chapter xiii. The phrase ten thousand of His saints alludes to the hosts of Israel who were under this wonderful manifestation of glory. "The fiery law," or "law of fire," more properly refers to the pillar of fire which gave visible proof of Divine protection. Fire is frequently mentioned in connection with the awful majesty of heaven. This was seen on Sinai and in many ways where the glory of God was manifested among men. Moses in the text alluded to these visible proofs of God's favor, as a foundation upon which the blessings He was about to pronounce would come into force.

The Many Mansions.

THE PREPARATION.

But allowing such to be true, why "go away to prepare it?" Why not remain here as well, during the time of preparation? The answer is, because there was a necessity in the case, and that necessity found its existence in his Father's law, as ordained of him for the expurgation of sin, and the removal of the curse. Why God made such a law, is among "the secret things," not being revealed, I only know that such "written law of God" exists, and Christ said he came to fulfill it, that heaven and earth should sooner pass away than one jot or tittle of that law could fail. The nature of the case, therefore, demands a partial consideration of, and examination into the law of preparation, as comprehended in the atonement and plan of redemption for the expiation of sin. "See thou make all things like the pattern," was the divine injunction to Moses, who was a foreshadowing of Christ in all his work, and Paul informs us in Heb. ix. 24, that "the holy places made with hands," were only "figurative representations of the true," or literal things, so that whatever was done by Moses and the high priest under the law, in the hope, must be repeated by Christ in the antitype to fulfill the law in the Spirit of it. When man sinned, God placed a curse upon the earth, and by sin also, man's life was forfeit to the law, which demanded man's obedience. Hence to take away sin, to remove the curse and bring back righteousness, there must be obedience to the law, and shedding of blood, without which there could be no remission of sin, for the law required "life for life," and not blood-shedding only, but blood sprinkling also, for a confirmation of the covenant that God enjoined, when he avouched himself unto the people, and the people unto himself, and it must also be used in his own appointed way, or be of no avail. In Leviticus we have given to us the law of expiation, as ordained for the high priest, and Paul says (Heb. vii. 2-7,) that Jesus fulfilled this "when he offered up himself." But after "the sin-offering," the high priest had to take of the shed blood and bring it within the vail into "the holy of holies;" i. e. heaven, and sprinkle it upon the mercy seat, eastward, and before the mercy seat,

" seven times, and in this way shall he also make an atonement for the holy place, (i. e., this world, in which we now live, and from which Jesus departed when he went away to the Father, into the holiest place, heaven), because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins; and so shall he do, for the tabernacle of the congregation that remaineth among them in the midst of their uncleanness. Consequently, "there shall be no man in the tabernacle of the congregation, until he (Jesus) come out, (of the holiest, heaven,) and shall have made —completed— an atonement for his household, and for the congregation of Israel." Lev. xvi. 17. But when "his judgments are made manifest, the temple of this tabernacle of the testimony in heaven, will be opened, but no man will be able to enter into the temple till the seven plagues are fulfilled." Rev. xi. 19: xv. 5, 6, 8. But the accomplishment of such a grand achievement, the consummation of this crowning work in glory, inaugurated by the Son in shame and humiliation; required Jesus, risen from the dead, to first become high priest, to enter the holiest, and minister the blood of sprinkling in consummation of the new covenant, and in accordance with the express stipulations of his Father's commandment, or law. But without "going away," (i. e., unless Jesus had gone away from this earth,) he could not have become a high priest, as Paul expressly states in Heb. viii. 4, and if he did not become high priest, he could not minister "the blood of sprinkling through the eternal Spirit," before the mercy seat, nor offer the incense within the vail of the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched, and not man, and without this ministration as "high priest of good things to come," (Heb. ix. 11,) there could be no preparation of a place for the house of God, in which are the "many mansions," nor could the house (hold) itself be fitted, completed, and prepared, so as to be adapted to and for the place; for we are also "the heavenly things," "the vessels of this ministry," that are "purified with the better sacrifices," (Heb. ix. 23) by which through the eternal Spirit, we are to be living stones in a living temple, fashioned like unto our living head, after the power of an endless life, and the land of the dead and dying, where death reigns, or where "sin reigns unto death," is not a fitting place for the immortal, undying children of the incorruptible and infinitely wise God our Savior, who hath done all things well. There was need, therefore, of a preparation of the place, and Jesus has gone away to make it, and when the preparatory work is ended, he will come back again, and when he comes he will receive his Father's household unto himself, " " " "that they may be with him," " " " and "behold his glory."

Then Jesus, our high priest, will have returned to his people, and will have announced to them that their sin-offering has been accepted, that "their sins are blotted out," Acts iii. 19), and then he will have lifted up his hands and "confirmed the blessing of life for evermore," (Rom. ii. 9; vii. 16; Psa. cxxxiii. 3,) all of which are now elements of faith, but then they will be facts of fruition and knowledge. Then the times of refreshing will have come, from, i. e., by the presence of the Lord. Refreshing, i. e., "revival. Return, recall, or recovery to life from death." Webster.—(Upon "the times of refreshing and restitution," the comments of Jamieson, Fausset and Brown, D. D. S., published in 1873, are so much in point that I reproduce them here. They say: Repent ye therefore, " " " "In order that the times of refreshing may come; that long period of repose prosperity and joy, which all the prophets hold forth to the distracted church and this miserable world, as eventually to come, and which is here, as in all the prophets, made to turn upon the national conversion of Israel." He shall send Jesus Christ, etc. "The true reading is." He shall send your predestinated (or foreordained) Messiah, Jesus. Until the times, etc., "embracing the whole period between the ascension and the second advent of Christ." Restitution of all things.—"Comprehending, probably, the rectification of all the disorders of the fall." N. T. Com. p. 477). Then the song of victory (Rev. xv. 3, 4,) is sung, and its refrain is written in Isa. xxvi. 8, 9, beginning with, "Yea, in the way of thy judgments, O Lord have we waited for thee." It is written that "Zion shall be redeemed with judgment, and her converts with righteousness," (The Parallels of Rev. xv. 3, 4, and Isa. xxvi. and are Rev. vii. 10 : xi. 15-18; xii. 10-12, and xix. 1-7.) Please do, take your Bible, now, trace them out and read them, it will do you good. Then will "the ransomed of the Lord, return,"

" " " (to earth, in immortality; they had been there before in mortality, but "had been out to meet the bridegroom," caught up into the air "to be with the Lord, and from thence,") they shall come to Zion with songs, (which are given specifically above), and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away," for they will then "see the King in his beauty," and he shall be seated upon the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all nations; the living nations, not "the rest of the dead," beside the raised saints; and he separates them, one from another. We then have three parties present, viz.: Christ and his saints; in the throne with him; they came with him, from the air, above, and so ever be with him, associated as, or in, "one body," and their separation was not "one from another," but they were separated, as was their "living head" and Lord before them, "risen from among the dead ones," having been "accounted worthy to obtain that age, aionos, and the resurrection from the dead ones;" they, therefore, are already "with him in the throne."

There are then, present, the company "in the throne" —or, enthroned,— also "the nations of them that are saved," by "shortening the days" of "the time of trouble," (Dan. xii. 1,) in "the great tribulation," who are before the throne, and "serve him day and night in his temple," (Rev. vii. 14, 15,) which is the same company that "get the victory over the beast, and stand on the sea of glass;" denominated "the righteous, on the right hand," in Matthew. (Compare Rev. vii. 9-17; xi. 15-18; xiv. 1-5; xv. 2-4; xix. 1-8.) In chap. iv. 6, the "sea of glass" is before the throne. In chap. xv. 2, the victors "stand on the sea of glass." In chap. vii. 15, they are represented as being "before the throne," all of which is in agreement. On "the left hand" stands the third company, called the "goats" in Matthew, the supplants to the "rocks and mountains" in Rev. vi. 15, to the "worshippers of the beast," under the third angels message, chap. xiv. 9-11, the "clusters of the vine of the earth," and "her grapes," in verses 18, 19, the "harvest of the earth," in verse 15, the "beast and false prophet," in chap. xix. 19, 20; and "the tares," in Mat. xiii. 25, 27, 29, 30, 38, 40, and these all refer to one and the same time and company, (the goats) and these also are in harmony and agree in testimony. When addressing those on "the right hand," in reply to their questions in verses 37, 38 and 39, the King does not say: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of yourselves," but "the least of these, my brethren,"—here with me in the throne, "ye have done it unto me." And when addressing those on "the left hand," verse 45, he does not say: "Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of those," on the right there, but again as before, "the least of these, ye did it not to me." These refer to the nearest, or last mentioned; those to the former, or most distant. "These apelensontai will go eis kolasin aionion to the cutting off everlasting, but the righteous (will go) eis zoen aionion, into life eternal." But the saints, "his brethren" were already in "eternal life," and "came forth"—from among the dead ones—"to life eternal," were raised incorruptible and immortal, while the attainment of "eternal life" is placed still in the future, by the word of the King, for those on the right hand. Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." But if those on the right, are not "the little flock," to whom it is the Father's good pleasure "to give the kingdom," who then are they? We have already stated that they are "the saved of the nations,"—so called in Scripture,—but not then, as yet, saved with "the great salvation," but saved from death and destruction "out of the great tribulation." Christ spoke of them as "the elect," and called them "flesh." Paul speaks of their reception as "life from the dead." And he says, "as touching the election, they are beloved for the Father's sakes." As concerning the Gospel, they were enemies for your sakes, (Rom. xi. 28,) i. e., for the sake of those whom we saw just now enthroned with Christ as rulers, and these on "the right," are the subjects of the King and kingdom, "the house of Jacob," or "all Israel," under the Church. There and then, God remembers his covenant with Jacob, and his covenant with Isaac, and his covenant with Abraham does he remember, and he remembers the land, (Lev. xxvi. 42) to give it to him and to his seed with him—"prepared"—for an everlasting possession; "and he (the seed) shall reign over the house of Jacob forever."

Notes by the Way.

BRO. REED:—By request of many brethren I write a report of my travels though nothing of special interest to relate. January 23, Bro. Wm. R. and Sister Henriette Eychaner, came from the country and conveyed me to their residence, about twelve miles north of Newton. Bro Wm. R. Eychaner and Milton Eychaner, settled in this section some eight years ago, with little or no means. They now own good farms and are doing well. They were formerly from Ogle county, Ill. Living, as they were, entirely isolated from those of like precious faith, they felt interested to have the truth preached in their neighborhood. I gave five discourses in the Eychaner school house. Some were interested, and we look for some fruit. Bro. Wm. R. and Sister Henriette Eychaner were not as many are, unmindful of the fact that it requires means to advance the truth, and that a man cannot devote his whole time to the preaching of the Word and travel from state to state, and support himself and family, without being remunerated. They, therefore, gave liberally of their means, to assist me in my travels in promulgating the blessed truths of the Gospel. May the good Lord reward them, and may more such persons be raised up, who are as willing to put their shoulder to the wheel, and push the great work forward, in bringing man and woman into the light of the glorious Gospel of the Son of God.

January 26, Bro. Waldo Aulls, my worthy friend and school mate, took us to Rock Creek, twelve miles east of Newton. If I mistake not, Bro. Aulls had been invited by one Mr. James Lackey, a Hard Shell, Iron Clad Baptist in belief, with whom we first put up. I only stayed with him one night, as it was plain to be seen that he was not a friend to us, or the cause of Christ. Why he invited Bro. Aulls to have an appointment sent there, is more than I can solve, or any one else, after treating us the way he did. Being an entire stranger among a strange people, we felt despondingly; and for a little while sorry we had come to the place. But, blessed be God, who doeth all things well, we soon formed many new acquaintances who proved to be warm and true hearted friends, and we were made to rejoice and feel at home; and are now glad that we ever visited Rock Creek. We remained eleven days, preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence no man forbidding us. At the close, organized a church of a very reliable element; one minister uniting therewith—Eld. J. Vanmeter from the Christian connection, who has taken charge of the church, and will give them regular preaching. While there, we found a pleasant home with Brother and Sister Winchester, also Brother and Sister Vanmeter.

February 17, in company with Bro. Waldo Aulls, we went to West Irving, Tama county, Iowa, where I found a land of noble brethren. Eld. John T. Prime is pastor of the church at this place, and is highly esteemed; not only by his own church, but by all the orthodox churches, and the outside world, which is proof that he is a man who walks in wisdom's way, having a good report of them that are without. We want more such men; men who being able to teach, in meekness instruct those who oppose the truth. Let us be kind unto all men, and especially to those who are of the household of faith. Bro. Levi Marsh was the first to introduce the truth at West Irving, about fifteen years ago, by his self-sacrificing spirit and godly example, he has done much for the cause. With his own means, he has erected a fine, commodious house for worship. Bro. John Fity, and Bro. Mershman, mechanics, executing the mechanical work. I mention this circumstance because it shows that brethren, who are in real earnest in the cause, and are blessed with an abundance of the things of this world, generally show their faith by their works; yes, I will say, invariably do so. What the cause at this moment demands, is less talk and more work. It is a shame for such men as Bro. Sanford, Bro. Foor, Orem, and others, not to be kept in the field. I think, we as a people, need a general waking up. The Church at West Irving rewarded me bountifully for my time and labor. They are a real, live, working people, and the church is in a growing condition under the pastoral care of Bro. Prime.

The Two Witnesses.

DEAR EDITOR:—Much has been said as regards the two witnesses spoken of in Rev. xi. 3. It seems that Bro. Magruder, of Baltimore, takes the position that those who appeared with the Savior on the Mount of Transfiguration, are the two witnesses.

"Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom." Matt. xvi. 28. And after six days, Jesus taketh Peter James and John, his brother, and bringeth them up into an high mountain apart. And was transfigured before them; and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light. And behold there appeared unto them Moses and Elias talking with them. And as they came down from the mountain Jesus charged them, saying tell the "vision to no man until the Son of Man be risen again from the "dead." Matt. xvii. 1-9. According to the language used, this was a "vision." It could not be otherwise, as he had not yet tasted of "death." The orthodox world claim this was a "spiritual kingdom" in existence at that time. This must be untrue, for man had not yet been "redeemed." Before a kingdom could exist, man must first be redeemed. Moses died and God buried him, and no man knows of his sepulchre unto this day. Deut. xxxiv. 5, 6. Elijah was caught up in a whirlwind and did not taste of death. 2 Kings ii. 11. The vision represents the coming kingdom. First, they saw the King in his beauty. Second, Moses representing the sleeping saints raised incorruptible, immortal. Third, Elijah, representing the living saints changed from mortal to immortality.

In Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians, he says: "But every man in his own order; Christ the first fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming. In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump, for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised "incorruptible" and we (the living) shall be changed." 1 Cor. xv. 23-52. Paul tells us when the dead are raised, how they are raised, and who will be raised. "They that are Christ's at his coming." John tells us when they shall have finished their testimony they shall overcome them, and kill them. Rev. xi. 7. Paul has said the dead are raised "incorruptible" and not until the last trump. This being true, Moses cannot be one of those witnesses. The King of kings and Lord of lords only hath "immortality" dwelling in the light no man can approach into. 1 Tim. vi. 15, 16. This statement being true, "Enoch and Elijah" are "mortal" and "corruptible" still in their nature.

"For I (Jesus) am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law. And a man's foes shall be they of his own household." Matt. 35, 36.

Behold I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord, and he shall turn the heart's of the fathers to the children and the hearts of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth "with a curse." Malachi iv. 5, 6. Here we are told for what purpose he will send Elijah the prophet. The meaning or signification of the word "Enoch," in the original, is dedicate or consecrate. Webster defines it as set apart for a sacred use.

And Enoch, also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of these, saying, "Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all of their ungodly deeds, which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him." Jude, 14, 15. and when they shall have "finished" their testimony (they had not finished their testimony in why they were translated), the beast shall overcome and kill them. And their dead body shall lie in the street of the "great city," which spiritually, is called Sodom and Egypt, where our Lord was crucified. Rev. xi. 7, 8. Notice the place where our Lord was crucified. And after three days and a half the spirit of life (breath of life) from God, entered into them and they stood up on their feet, And they heard a voice say, come up hither. "And the same hour was there a great earthquake and the tenth part of the city fell, and in the earthquake were slain of men, seven thousand, and the remnant were affrighted and gave glory to the God of heaven." The second woe is past and behold the third cometh quickly. And the seventh angel sounded. Verse 9-15. The tenth part of the city fell, seven thousand slain. This being true at that time, this city where our Lord was crucified, will have seventy thousand inhabitants (70,000), when it reaches that number we will see what the apostle saw on the Mount of Transfiguration. The King in his beauty.

JOHN O. BRONSON.

Continuation of Bro. Cook in Last Week's Issue.

P. S.—Lest my discriminations should not be seen, allow me to add, that the repugnant and repellant elements of the "iron and clay," which forbid union and strength, apply to the Ecclesiastical, as well as political condition of the world. Dan. ii. 41-43; 1 Tim. iv. 1-3; 2 Pet. ii.

The French Republic relapsed into "the empire," based on the example of the Cæsars! So the priest of Ecclesiastical bodies glide, as if insensibly, into the position worthy only of a daughter of the mis-called "Mother Church." It is this sad fact that renders "the end," a necessity to fulfill God's revealed purpose. The world needs a change, and God's word declares the nature of the change, as to the world, the Church and the Gospel dispensation. Dan. vii. 18; Rev. xvii. 26. The present organizations seem to have been, and are still, a necessity. But the impending crisis, that impresses itself more or less, on "Jew, Gentile and the Church of God," is written in unmistakable terms, as to the Gentile calling: "those also shall be cut off" Rom. xi. 22.

Yet, I hear and heed the Master's voice: "Occupy till I come." But this relates to our responsibility to God for all his good gifts, and to the reckoning that awaits each one and all, when he comes!

All such considerations must enter into our estimate of the value of whatever organization, so far as we are at all intelligent in our faith. Yet the more intelligent and comprehensive our faith, the more judicious and energetic should be our discharge of duty to our brethren, and to society at large.

Dawn.

The blush of the morning
Is tinging the sky
With purple adorning,
That gladdens the eye.
We stand in the gloaming,
And hail with delight
The sun in his coming,
To banish the night.

We catch the first token
That springtime is near,
When ice-chains are broken
By warmth of the year;
Our hearts overflowing
With praises to God,
Who set the streams flowing
And flowered the sod.

A day for excelling
Is ready to dawn;
The signs are foretelling
Its swift coming on:
The day of earth's gladness
That breaks through the gloom:
Through night of earth's sadness,
Through shades of the tomb.

Its sun never setting
Paints grandly the scene;
No clouds the sky fretting
Will shadow earth's green.
Come season, the vernal,
Go winter of storm,
Come beauty eternal
Et robe every form.

Spirits in Prison.

"By which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison; which sometimes were disobedient, when once the long suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing, wherein few, that is eight souls, were saved by water." 1 Peter iii. 19-20.

QUESTIONS.

I. What was the prison?

II. Who were the prisoners?

III. Who was the preacher?

IV. For what purpose did he preach?

V. Did Christ at death descend into a place where disembodied spirits were then tormented, and preach to them till the time came for his resurrection?

1. What was the prison?

The anti-diluvian earth, as it was during the 120 years of the building of the ark. This is evident from the context.

2. Who were the prisoners?

The inhabitants of that age.

3. Who was the personal, visible preacher?

Noah.

4. With what propriety could Noah's audience be called "Spirits in prison?"

Ministers are often appointed to preach to spirits or persons in prison, who deserve the name prisoners no more strictly than the anti-deluvians, as will appear from examination:

1. A prison is a place of confinement for wicked persons in hold for trial; or suffering their judicial punishment.

2. Noah, for 120 years, preached to very corrupt people.

"Every imagination of his heart was only evil continually." Gen. vi. 5. "The earth was corrupt before God; and the earth was filled with violence. And God looked upon the earth, and behold, it was corrupt; for all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth. And God said unto Noah, The end of all flesh is come before me; for all the earth is filled with violence through them; and behold I will destroy them with the earth." Gen. vi. 11-13.

Through Noah, condemned as they were, they were to have an opportunity of escape from impending ruin. That offer continued 120 years. "And spared not the old world, but saved Noah the eighth person, a preacher of righteousness, bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly." 2 Pet. ii. 5.

To represent wicked persons to whom the Gospel is to be preached, as prisoners, is not unusual.

"To open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison house." Is. xlii. 7.

"That thou mayest say to the prisoners, Go forth; to them that are in darkness, Show yourselves." Is. xlix. 9.

"The spirit of the Lord is upon me; because the Lord hath anointed me to preach the good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound." Isa. lxi. 1.

"Turn you to the stronghold, ye prisoners of hope." Zech ix. 12. See Luke iv. 18, where Christ applies Isa. lxi. 1 to himself.

The positions of Noah and Christ were similar. The same spirit that quickened Jesus, preached through Noah to the anti-deluvians. Christ is represented as doing what the Spirit does. The scheme of redemption has, through all ages, been his especial work.

Let us examine 1 Pet. iii. 19, 20, more critically:

"By which he went and preached to the spirits in prison." 1 Pet. iii. 19.

"By which," (w o,) by which Spirit, —Holy spirit—that raised up Christ.

"He," (this pronoun is understood,) Jesus Christ, that was put to death in the flesh, and was raised.

"Went and preached,"—poreuomai for preached, "And came and preached to you which were afar off (Gentiles,) and to them that are nigh, (Jews)." Eph. ii. 17. "All Greek verbs of posture or gesture, as to stand, to go, to sit, to walk, in good Greek writers, have the signification of existere—to be." "And the men which journeyed with him stood speechless, hearing a voice but seeing no man." Acts ix. 7. "And when we were all fallen to the earth." Acts. xxvi. 14.

"To the spirits,—tois pneumasi. "They were men on earth in the flesh when Christ preached to them by his spirit speaking in Noah.

"In prison,"—en phulaki, phulaki is used 46 times in the New Testament, and is translated prison 37 times, correctly so in every place. 1 Peter iii. 19 not being excepted. In Matt. xiv. 20; xxiv. 43; Mar. vi. 45; Luke ii. 8; xii. 38 twice, it is watch, as the positions of watchmen of walled cities and of prisons are somewhat similar. In Acts xii. 10—ward. In Rev. xviii. 2—hold, and cage. Dr. N. Summerbell says, in answer to a request from a lady, that "prison is an unnecessary translation. Some word like watch, care, guard, or keep, with proper adjuncts, would have better represented the idea." He says that "the spirits in prison" were in what men call the intermediate state. Some call it the under-world; others the state of the dead; the Bible, (Old Testament), sheol; New Testament, hades. These words do not mean grave." "The souls under the altar (Rev. vi. 9,) refer to the same."

"When"?—ote and pote. Adverbs of time, showing when Christ preached—whether in the days of Noah, or between his death and his resurrection. Papists hold that it was while he lay under the dominion of death, and originate a purgatory.

pote refers to some particular time in the past, when some truth or words were spoken, or some transaction took place. This will appear if we examine its uses. It occurs 31 times, indefinitely, in the N. T., and is rendered into the following English words: When, 1; sometimes, 2; aforetime, 1; at length, 1; in time past, 7; any time, 5; once, 1; sometime, 3, at last, 1; in old time, 2. In old time suits the idea best, as the days of Noah would be called such by Peter.

ote occurs 100 times, with the following English renderings: When, 98 times. The same word would suit the sense in the other ten places.

pote is found in 18 places, and is uniformly translated, "once," meaning one time and no more—once for all. His long suffering. (120 years), waited in the days of Noah's preaching once for all, never again to wait on that most ungodly of all people. Peter understood that Noah's preaching ended, forever the day of their probation.

These adverbs all point to the times of Noah, to the ark, and to the flood. pote directs us to those days of old time; ote confines to those days; hote shows that that long suffering ended their opportunity of escape. Christ preached to them once for all during a period of 120 years, and as corrupt and heedless were they that "they knew not till the flood came." Matt. xxiv. 39. It is not probable that he would undertake to do in three days (the time between his death and resurrection), what he had failed to do in 120 years, (convert them,) especially as he had been put to death by his own people, the Jews.

4. The Preaching of Christ by his Spirit through Noah was designed to produce faith in them and a reformation, so that they might escape the ruin of the flood. His preaching between his death and resurrection would have been to deliver them from purgatory. But as no such place existed, we are quite sure that there was no such preaching.

5. Did Christ, at death, "descend into the place of punishment, and preach to the infidel inhabitants of the old world there imprisoned?"

He was in sheol, where is "No work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom." Eccl. ix. 10. Asleep. Job xiv. 12. No work in sheol—too dark. "A land of darkness, as darkness itself, and the light is as darkness itself." Job x. 22. No device, no knowledge, nor wisdom, nor brain-work in sheol. Christ could not have been preaching there. No Gospel for the dead—no second probation; particularly for those who had resisted the gospel during 120 years.

An humble disposition is a good presage of honorable preferment.

A charitable disposition expects only opportunity; not importunity.

Art may win applause, but merit only can retain it.

A charitable disposition may soon find a charitable occasion.

As God at first made, so in the flood he kept alive one woman for one man.

Prayer

Is a subject, that lies near my heart, and though I feel my incompetency to write anything for the perusal of the many of God's dear children that read our very estimable paper, I feel it a duty we owe each other, to write on a subject of so much importance, hoping my effort may cause some one better able to write on the subject.

Paul in Tim ii .1: "I exhort, therefore, that first of all supplications, prayers, and intercessions, and giving of thanks be made for all men." It appears from this passage, that prayer is the first thing to be done, but some may say where, and when; I answer, everywhere. There is no occupation, no employment, that a Christian should engage in, that he or she cannot ask help from God, no matter what it may be that we undertake to do, we should first consider, if we can ask God to bless our effort. If so, we can go on with confidence; but if we are not sure that our enterprise is in favor with the will of God, we had better let it alone.

This passage may lead us to conclude that it is when we have met for worship; it appears so. Second verse: "For kings and for all that are in authority, that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty." This shows us that we should pray for our rulers that it may go well with us, this is good and acceptable in the sight of God. Verse 8: "I will, therefore, that men pray everywhere," there is no place where we should consider ourselves exempt from prayer, not that we should always be vocally calling on God, but let it never be said, "I have ceased to pray."

For a minister to commence preaching, without first having prayer, savors too much like self-confidence. Every Christian should esteem it a high and holy privilege, to approach God in the humble attitude of prayer, not that God is ignorant of our wants, but he has ordained that we should ask that we may receive. 'Tis then a duty as well as a privilege; some are doing away with family prayer. If we wish to bring up our children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, where is there any better place than around the family altar? The great and good of all ages have been praying people. Himself Christ spent whole nights in prayer to God. If he that was without sin felt the importance so great, of how much more ought we, that are liable to step aside continually.

In conclusion, I would say, brethren and sisters, as we are set for lights in this world of sin and wickedness, let us never be ashamed or afraid to be found calling on God in every trying hour. Not as the proud Pharisee praying to be seen of men, but ever be ready to move to those around us that we trust in a higher power than mortal man. Submitted by your sister in the Lord. Tobacco.

My former article for the RESTITUTION, was in the main doctrinal. This one I design to be practical, principally on one subject, hoping it may benefit some. Not that I suppose many of the readers of the RESTITUTION use tobacco, especially those that are in Christ; but this I do know, that many professed ministers of Christ, deacons, superintendents of Sabbath schools and church members do use it, thereby encouraging the rising generation to engage in the same needless, not to say filthy habit.

"There are said to be a million and a half of people engaged in the raising and preparation of tobacco, and that the tobacco crop of the world amounts to 4,430,000,000 pounds."

If so, at fifty cents per pound, it would more than pay our national debt, which is something over two billion dollars. Let the tobacco users reflect on this. How much better for the world, if all this labor was expended for raising wheat, corn and other useful crops.

The Pioneer factory, Brooklyn, N. Y., employs five hundred hands. They made and sold in two years, '69 and '70, four million five hundred thousand pounds of tobacco, and paid the government one million four hundred thousand dollars taxes. Think of this. Who supports this firm? The tobacco user pays the government twenty-four cents revenue tax, for every pound he uses, the snuff taker thirty-two cents, and cigar smoker six dollars per thousand, and yet there is no rebellion. If the government compelled the use of it, there would be another rebellion immediately.

Shall we continue in evil habit because the government does not forbid it? Think of it. If a young man begins at fifteen years of age, and smokes three cigars per day, five cents each, till he is fifty years old, the whole amount would be one thousand nine hundred and sixteen dollars and twenty-five cents. Think of this, young man, before you begin.

The almost untold evils arising from the use of tobacco, are not generally denied by those that use it. Why then not give it up? It's because there is such power in habit, and the effect of poison on the human system, that it is almost impossible. But it can be broken up by a firm determination never to use it again. But it is better never to acquire the habit. It is evil continually, financially, physically and morally.

Having written the above, to arrest if possible, the attention of those that use, manufacture, or sell tobacco, I close with the exhortation of the Apostle Paul in 2 Cor. vii. 1.

Having therefore these promises, (mentioned in preceding chapter), dearly beloved let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

Also, 1 John iii. 2, 3: Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doeth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure.

OAKWOOD, Mich.

A Beautiful Country.

Before moving to any new country, it is always desirable to first procure a knowledge of the country. No prudent man would think of leaving home, kindred, and friends, to cast his lot in a desolate land, without first having at least a general knowledge of the laws, government, fertility of the soil, state of society, healthfulness, and whether the country is well watered or not. All the details of the country would be enquired into before making the move.

Now, as many of us claim to be ready to move to "a better country," as the time appointed, it would be well to enquire what form of government we shall have there. It will be a kingdom, for thus it is written: "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break to pieces and consume all these other kingdoms, and it shall stand forever." Dan. ii. 44.

We find then, that it is not only a kingdom, but it will be a universal kingdom, and that it will stand forever.

Will there be a righteous administration of the laws in the country? Yes: "Behold, a king shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgement." Isa. xxxii. 1.

But will there be a good state of society there? Certainly: "Thy people shall all be righteous." Isa. lx. 21.

Will it be a peaceful happy country? It will, for "Violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting nor destruction within thy borders." Isa. lx. 18.

Will it also be a healthy country? Yes, for "The inhabitants shall no more say, I am sick." Isa. xxxiii. 24. "Neither can they die any more." Luke xx. 36.

It will also be a fertile country: "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that the plowman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes him that soweth the seed, and the mountains shall drop sweet wine, and all the hills melt. And they (the nations) shall build houses and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them. And I will plant them upon their land, and they shall not any more be pulled up out of their land which I have given them, saith the Lord thy God." Amos ix. 13; Jer. xxxi. 5.

It will also be a well-watered country: "All the rivers of Judah shall flow with waters, and a fountain shall come forth of the house of the Lord, and shall water the valley of Shittim. There is a river, the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God. And he showed me a fine river of water of life, clear as a crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God, and of the Lamb." Joel iii. 18; Psa. xxxvi. 8; Rev. xxii. 1.

But time would fail us to enumerate all the beauties of that land, where, "instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree," where no enormous beast shall go thereon, and they shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, saith the Lord: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea. And the wolf and lamb shall no more be heard in her, nor the voice of crying; they shall not build and another inhabit, they shall not plant and another eat; for as the days of a tree, are the days of my people; they shall not labor in vain, nor bring forth for trouble; for they are the seed of the blessed of the Lord, and their offspring with them.

The Earthen Bottle.

About 625 B. C., according to Usher, the Lord said to Jeremiah, (chapter xix:) "Go and get a potter's earthen bottle, and take of the ancients of the people, and of the ancients of the priests; and go forth unto the valley of the son of Hinnom, which is by the entry of the east gate (margin) and proclaim (preach) there the words that I shall tell thee, and say, 'Hear ye the word of the Lord, O kings of Judah, and inhabitants of Jerusalem; thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel; behold, I will bring evil upon this place, the which whosoever heareth, his ears shall tingle. * * * And I will cause them to fall by the sword before their enemies, and by the hands of them that seek their lives; and their carcasses will I give to be meat for the fowls of the heaven, and for the beasts of earth. And I will make this city desolate, and a hissing; and every one that goeth by thereby shall be astonished and hiss, because of all the plagues thereof. And I will cause them to eat the flesh of their sons and the flesh of their daughters, and they shall eat everyone the flesh of his friend in the siege and straitness, wherewith their enemies, and they that seek their lives, shall straiten them.' Then shalt thou break the bottle in the sight of the men that go with thee, and shalt say unto them, 'Thus saith the Lord of hosts, even so will I break this city.'" All this evil was pronounced against God's chosen people, because they had hardened their necks, that they might not hear the words of the Lord. [Read the chapter through carefully.]

The Prophet was not in honor in his own country. This people had said, "Come and let us devise devices against Jeremiah." (chap. xviii. 18) "and let us smite him." Yet he came from Tophet and stood in the court of the Lord's house whither the Lord had sent him to prophesy, and he fulfilled his mission. The breaking of the earthen bottle was too plain an illustration for the priests and servants of the people. It made their ears tingle to hear the words of the Lord which had been shut up in the bones of the prophet "as a burning fire," so forcibly illustrated. Jeremiah was arrested and Pashur "put him in the stocks that were in the high gate of Benjamin, which was by the house of the Lord." But on the morrow when he was brought forth out of the stocks, after uttering another "Thus saith the Lord" respecting the Babylonian captivity, he adds, (chap. xx. 6) "And thou, Pashur, and all that dwell in thine house, shall go into captivity; and thou shalt come to Babylon, and there thou shalt die, and shalt be buried there, thou, and all thy friends, to whom thou has prophesied lies." What courage! Who of us would be so faithful? The weeping prophet will yet be rewarded. With Daniel he will stand in his lot "at the end of the days." Praise the Lord for the "blessed hope." But what of the "earthen bottle"—the remnant of Israel over whom Josiah, Jehoiakim and Zedekiah reigned? Was the "place" broken, like the bottle? If not the sickening details of the "Siege of Jerusalem," recorded by Josephus, and learn that "the Lord hath accomplished his fury" and "hath kindled a fire in Zion, and it hath devoured the foundations thereof," notwithstanding "the kings of the earth, and all the inhabitants of the world, would not have believed that the adversary and the enemy should have entered into the gates of Jerusalem." Lam. iv. 12. The covenant of Noah (Gen. xxviii. xxix. 1,) was confirmed "for one week" (Dan. ix. 27), and the prophecy of Isa. iv. 10) "The hands of the pitiful women have sodden (boiled) their own children: they were their meat in the destruction of the daughter of my people,"—was literally fulfilled. The Jewish historian tells us of Mary who lived beyond the Jordan and came to Jerusalem. She was wealthy. Money was of no worth in the famine. The siege was effectual. There was no escape. "Snatching up her son, who was a child sucking at her breast, she said, 'O thou miserable infant! for whom shall I preserve thee in this war, this famine, and this sedition? Come on, be thou my food!' As soon as she had said this she slew her son, and then roasted him, and ate the one half of him." Book VI. chap. iii. "O, God, thou art terrible out of thy holy places!" (Psa. lxviii. 35) and "terrible to the kings of the earth." Psa. lxxvi. 12.

Why will not men believe in the Lord? Why will they not be warned now of the approaching danger? Why is it that history must ever be repeating itself? Jesus predicted the destruction of Jerusalem, (Luke xix. 42-44) and to the few who believed on him he gave warning and direction to "flee into the mountains," (Luke xxi. 20, 21), "When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies." The followers of the crucified "King of the Jews" were safe from the ruin occasioned by the breaking of the "earthen bottle." There is a way of escape for those who would now flee to the mountain of the Lord's house which "shall be established in the top of the mountains" (Micah iv. 1), "in the last days," when "the day cometh, that shall burn as an oven: and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble: and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch." Mal. iv. 1.

Dear reader, would you escape the fires of "the day that cometh?" Then fear the Lord. Remember that the predictions in reference to the "last days" will be as literally fulfilled as those concerning the days of Israel and Judah. "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ" (Acts xix. 21,) and "arise and be baptized and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord" (xxii. 16) and you "shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." Luke xvi. 16. "Return ye, oh backsliding children, for why will ye die? When God in great mercy is coming so nigh. Since Jesus invites you, the Spirit says, come. And angels are waiting to welcome you home."

BOOKS AND PERIODICALS.

THE FARMER'S MONTHLY.

We are in receipt of the first number of The Farmer's Monthly, a journal published by H. V. Reed, and published by McDonald & Brother, of the Plymouth (Ind.) Democrat. It is an eleven page agricultural and family journal neatly conducted and neatly printed, and as it is the only publication of the kind in Northern Indiana, it ought to be liberally patronized. The entire at the head of it will all every worthy gentleman, and we hope they will succeed in their new enterprise.—Goshen Times

We are in receipt of the first number of The Farmer's Monthly, a neat sixteen-page journal devoted to practical farming, horticulture and home instruction. It is published at Plymouth, Indiana, by McDonald & Brother, of the Plymouth Democrat, and is under the editorial management of H. V. Reed, of the Restitution, and who will be remembered by our citizens as the man who so effectually upset the fallacious theories of the Seventh-Day Adventists by his three sermons delivered here last fall. The Monthly comes at $1 a year, and ought to receive a liberal support from our Hoosier farmers.—Logansport Reporter.

The Farmers Monthly, a new candidate for public favor, is on our table. The mechanical and typographical appearance is creditable, while the articles and other matter is sound and entertaining. Mr. Reed, the editor, is evidently a gentleman of culture and experience, while the publishers, McDonald & Bro., are too well known to need mention. Its special aim is to collect and publish, not at the same time, their plan is to make it a first-class family journal. It will doubtless receive a large patronage from the farmers of Northern Indiana. The price is only 81 per year.—Mich. City News.

The RESTITUTION subscribers can have The Farmer's Monthly for 1876 for 75 cents per year.

Address McDONALD & BRO.,

THE
AMERICAN CYCLOPEDIA.

A Comprehensive Library in Itself.

A Great National Enterprise in which every American may Take Pride.

Published by D. APPLETON & CO.,

The Cyclopedia, now in course of publication, is entirely rewritten, and appears with about 4,000 maps and illustrations. To be completed in sixteen volumes of 800 pages each. Fourteen volumes now ready.

In the experience of book making and selling, this work is without a parallel. With the multiplication of steam presses, the publishers are still unable to meet the demand.

The sale has already reached over 300,000 volumes, and this in panic times! The demand for the work is but fairly commenced; the orders are largely multiplying and the applications are that the value of the work for 1870 will greatly surpass those of the previous year.

Thus the most sanguine expectations of the publishers are more than realized.

The publishers again repeat to the public that no expense has been spared in the writing, editing, or publishing departments of the American Cyclopedia.

The cost will be more than $300,000 to prepare the sixteen volumes for the press.

SOLD ONLY BY SUBSCRIPTION.

Delivered, expressage free, in any part of the United States.

Price in Cloth, $3 per volume; Sheep, $4; Half Morocco, $5; Full Turkey, $10.

If sent by mail, prepaid, $5.00.

A Little While.

A little while with tides of dark and light
The moon shall fill;
Warm autumn's gold be changed to shrouding white
And winter's chill.
A little while shall tender human flowers
In beauty blow;
And ceaselessly through shade and sunny hours
Death's harvest grow.
A little while shall time-spent planets speed
Round central flame;
New empires spring and pass, new names succeed
And lapse from fame.
A little while shall cold star tapers burn
Through time's brief night;
Then shall my soul's beloved One return
With day spring bright.

How oft in golden dreams I see Him stand,
I list his voice,
As waiting fingers from His lifted hand
The poor rejolce;
But waking tears that vision clear away,
My letter part,
And leaves me to this gale and empty day,
This longing heart,
I cannot see Her, but I love thee. Oh,
Thine eyes that read
The deepest secrets of the spirit know
This love indeed!
A little while; but, ah, how long it seems!
My Jesus, come,
Surpass the rapture of my sweetest dreams,
And take me home!

Selected.

The Son of God.

I will now notice that portion of the first chapter of John's Gospel, which is so often referred to, and which is considered the great Gibraltar of Trinitarianism.

If Trinitarians can not defend themselves here, nay, if they cannot be even-more the offensive, and carry the battle to the very gates of the enemy, and take possession; if they cannot here overthrow the opposing force, or, to be more direct, if they cannot prove from this chapter that Christ is the Supreme God, the creator of the heavens and the earth, they may as well surrender at once, when their strongest fortress is taken, and their heaviest artillery is turned against them.

If we had space to give all the points involved a full elucidation, we are confident we could show to the satisfaction of every candid mind that this chapter has been woefully misunderstood and erroneously interpreted.

The first question that naturally arises in the mind is, Shall we so interpret John's language as to make him contradict the explicit words of his Master recorded in John xvii. 3, and the positive language of Paul, 1 Cor. viii. 6, and also contradict his own teaching in all of his epistles? Or shall we not rather so explain it as to be in harm ny with all these, and in harmony with reason and stubborn facts?

To show that Trinitarians do so interpret John's words as to make him contradict his Master, it is only necessary to refer to 1 John v. 20, and compare their understanding of it with the words of Christ as recorded by John himself.

They claim that the expressions—"him that is true," and "this is the true God," refer to Christ instead of to the Father. And I suppose they base this claim on the evident error of the translators in supplying the word "even, which has no corresponding word in the original, where they should have put the word "and."

The text, (with its palpable meaning in brackets), is as follows:

"And we know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know him that is true; [which is the Father;] and we are in him [the Father] that is true; and in his Son Jesus Christ. This [referring to him that is true—the Father,] is the true God and eternal life."

What similarity of expression, and how harmonious is the language of the beloved disciple, as above explained, with the following words of his Master as recorded by John (vii. 28, 29, xvii. 3): "And I am not come of myself, but he that sent me is true, whom ye know not. But I know him, for I am from him, and he hath sent me." "This is eternal life that they may know thee [the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent."

It will be well, as we approach this noted chapter, to remember that Christ never claimed to be more than the Son of God, and the Son of Man, and that the inspired apostles would not claim for him more than he claimed for himself.

It will be proper to state here that EVERY contradiction is often caused by the improper translation of the prepositions in our common English Bibles. As an illustration of this, note the fact that the Greek preposition "en" is rendered "with" in connection with baptism "baptized with water," when every Greek scholar knows it should be in water, just as the same word is rendered in the following: "And were all baptized of him in the river Jordan."

The Greek word "dia," rendered "through" one hundred times in the New Testament, "because" and "because of" more than fifty times, and "for" about forty times, is sometimes translated "by" when it might be correctly rendered "through," "because of," "on account of," "for," &c., and should be so rendered in order to harmonize the Scripture, as in John i. 10; Col. i. 16; Heb. i. 2; where it is rendered "by," this making the inspired penmen say that all things were created "by" Christ instead of for him, or because of him, as it should be, seeing that God, who created the heavens and the earth, hath appointed him heir of all things. Heb. i. 2. If Christ is the true God and Creator, as alleged, all things would be his, without heirship, by the right of creation.

Having prepared the way as well as we can with our limited space, we now come to Jno. i, 1, which reads as follows: "In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and the word was God."

The fundamental error committed in rightly understanding this chapter is the assumption that the word, here spoken of as existing from the beginning, refers to Christ, when John states explicitly that "the word was God."

To assume that he does refer to Christ, is to affirm that John does not mean what he says. There is not in all of the Apostles' writings even an intimation that he could, in this first verse, have referred to Christ. And there is not a passage in the Bible that confirms such assumption.

Why then, it may be asked, did not John write it? "In the beginning was God," instead of "Word," if indeed he meant God and not Christ? In reply we might ask, why did he not write it? In the beginning was the Christ, if indeed, he referred to Christ and not to God?

A reference to a few passages of Scripture will, I think, answer the first question most satisfactorily to every thinking mind.

The fact that all creative power is in, or with God, and that he spoke the worlds into existence by the word of his omnipotent power (the opinion of some scientists to the contrary notwithstanding) sufficiently explains the mode of expressing the thought to his mind.

St. Paul says, (Heb. 11:3): "Through faith, we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God." What do you mean Paul? I mean that I believe the Scriptures when they declare that: "By the word of Jehovah were the Heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth." (Ps. 33:6.); "For he commanded and they were created. He spake, and it was done. he commanded and it stood fast." (Ps. 148:5, 33, 9.) And Peter (testifying says: (2 Pet. 3:5, 7). "For this they willingly are ignorant of, that by the word of God the Heavens were (or existed) of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water, perished. But but the Heavens and the earth which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." And Moses says: "In the beginning God created the Heaven and the earth." And God said: "Let there be light, and there was light," etc., etc. Thus we have the clearest evidence that it was "by the word of God," by the word of command the Heavens and the earth were created.

Such being the truth it is very evident that in the use of this term "word" John had no reference to Christ. And another reason why he could not possibly have referred to him is found in the fact that John says the "word existed from the beginning," which is understood as having always existed. But this can only be said of the One who is the First Great Cause of all things, the uncreated Jehovah. Christ being the Son of God, and therefore "begotten of the Father," at, or previous to his birth, could not be coeval with his Father. It is surprising that Trinitarians are so blinded by tradition they cannot see that the Father must necessarily exist before the Son in order to beget a Son

Another error is the supposition that in the expression "with God" the preposition pros, which implies that two persons are spoken of, the Word and God; as though the Word, which they say is Christ, existed with God from the beginning, when, as we have seen, it only implies that the word of power by which God spoke the world into existence, was with, in, of, or from him. "He spake, and it was done." The truth is, John employs the Greek term, logos-word (without a capital) as a means just as the Psalmist did when he wrote: "By the word of Jehovah were the Heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of His mouth."

We have introduce a very striking illustration of the propriety and truthfulness of the above explanation of John's language.

"An American writer," says Mr. Forest, in his history, "has given a parallel case. which, so far as I can remember, is as follows: In the beginning of the war of Independence, there was a hope to America, and that hope was with Washington, and that hope was Washington." Here the same person is said to have the hope of American freedom lodged with him, and to have been himself that very hope; a method of expression which does not differ in the least from that in John's introduction. And the Apostle has used similar language in other parts of his writings. "Love is of God and God is love." 1 Jno. 4:8. "As he (God) is in the light, and God is light." But we proceed. In the second verse John says: "The same (word) was in the beginning with God" (as a cause or means). "All things (v. 3) were made by Him (the word of God, the word here being personified) and without Him was not anything made that was made." Thus John here confirms the words of the Psalmist, that by the word of Jehovah was the Heavens made; and agrees with Paul and Peter whose language we have quoted.

Vs. 4, 5. "In Him (God) was life (to beget) and the life (through miraculous manifestations in the conception of his only begotten son, was (or became) the light of men. And the light (thus manifested) shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not."

Vs. 6–11. There was a man sent from God, whose name was John. The same came for a witness to bear witness of the Light (which was not the word, for the word was God, but the son of God) that all men through him might believe. He was not that Light, but was sent (by the Word, God, v. 6. (to bear witness (not of the Word, but) of that Light, (Christ)

That was the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. He was in he world, and the world was made (not by but) for (or because of) him (for he is the heir of the world, the heir of all things. See Rom. 4: 12, Gal. 3. 16; Ps. 2, 8) and the world knew him not. He came unto his own, and his own received him not."

V 14 "And the Word (which John says was God: not Christ) was made (manifest, or as Paul says: "God was manifested in the) flesh (or in the person of Jesus Christ) and dwelt among us (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father) full of grace and truth."

In conclusion we will again refer to the point on which hangs the correct understanding of this chapter. We think the candid reader has seen in the light of this exposition that John makes a clear distinction between the Word, God, and the light, Christ. The term logos-word, which is in the neuter gender is personified when he says: "And the Word was God," and when he says: "All things were made by him." The term Light, which is also in the neuter gender, is personified when John says: "That all men through him might believe."

The facts also seen that, "By the word of God was the Heavens and the earth created, that when darkness brooded over the face of the great deep, the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters, and God said, "let there be light, and there was light." When he said: "Let the dry land appear, it was so." Thus when God spoke in his omnipotent power, it was done; when he commanded it stood fast.

And again when this wonderful word of power is manifested on the plains of Bethlehem in the miraculous conception at the appointed time the true light of this fallen world appears. And as the shepherds watch their flock by night, the angel of the Lord descends and says: "Behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people; for unto you is born this day in the city of David, a Savior, which is Christ the Lord. And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the Heavenly host praising God, and saying, "Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth and good will to men."

And now let it be remembered that this divine personage, this only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth, by the authority of him who created the Universe, by the sanctity of his holy mission, attested by the wonderful miracles he performed, has said in that memorable prayer to his Father. "This is eternal life that they may know the only true God and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent.

Question Answered.

BRO. REED:—I herewith transmit to you an extract from a letter received some time since, from a friend in Texas, with my reply; which you may give to the readers of the RESTITUTION if you see fit:

* * * * "I have come in possession of two copies of the RESTITUTION, and from the articles of different persons in its columns, I judge that those claiming to be in the "one faith," in the western states are considerably divided in opinion, and as Christ was not divided, I am forced to the conclusion that they are not of his body. From this paper, I see that they hold to the immortal resurrection, a doctrine that mars the beauty and simplicity of the Bible teaching concerning the resurrection of the dead. The resurrection of the dead to immortality, I hold to be a process, and not an abstract principle. It . . . . . with the sowing of the incorruptible seed of the kingdom in the corruptible body. . . . I end with the same being clothed upon with immortality. I know not whether you hold to this doctrine or not. If you do, give me . . . texts which you consider substantiate it.

"For the sake of the truth, which you and many others are so manfully fighting for, (I mean the general outlines of the truth), can not a unity be effected among your brethren of the west. The Master is at the door, and will not receive a body cut up by many schisms, and especially the borders of a door time when in effect imbibes the judgment. Have you ever read "Anastasis," a pamphlet written by Dr. Thomas. Have you ever seen the Christadelphian, a monthly periodical edited by Robert Roberts, and published at Birmingham, England. * * * I remain your friend and well wisher.

REPLY.

* * * You say that from what you saw in the RESTITUTION, you think the brethren of the "one faith" are divided in opinion. That is true to some extent; and there is some danger, for at least there was at the time of which you speak), of a party coughing off and running into universal salvation. But such things have always been. You know that it has not been many years when there was no dividing line between us and the Christadelphians. Paul says there must be also sects (margin) among you, that they which are approved may be made manifest; yet we could wish that all those are near alike could be one. But is there no difference of opinion among you on any points at all? And when one presumes to differ with you in opinion upon the proper application of some passage of Scripture, do you unanoiliately class him with the "reconciled-ones?" I know two Christadelphians, a man and his wife, who, in a conversation with me, differed in the application of the word nations, in Matt. 25, "before him shall be gathered all nations," one holding that the word nations meant the church, while the other coincided with me that the church was not in it at all.

To my mind, the judgment of the church is part at that time, and the saints are associated with Christ as judges of the world or nations. See 1 Cor. vi. 2; Rom. viii. 17, joint heirs. Dan. vii 22. Judgment given to the saints, and saints possess the kingdom. Matt. xxv. 34. Christ is king and judge, and, to my mind, has his joint heirs with him.

But will there not be differences of opinion among those holding the same fundamental principles, so long as one learns farther than another? True, two separate bodies cannot both be the body of Christ; for he is not divided. But were there not differences of opinion even among the apostles themselves, and were they not of Christ's body? And were there not different opinions in the church at Corinth, and upon the all important question of the resurrection, too? and yet Paul calls them brethren. 1 Cor xv. 1-12.

Yes hold to the immortal resurrection of the saints; but I fail to see how that mars the beauty and simplicity of the Bible doctrine of the re-surrection; we imbibe no judgment either. I admit that it might mar the beauty of your idea of the resurrection, and mutilate your idea of the judgment; but might not your idea be wrong? I will admit that the dead are raised in the process and am glad to leave you intimate where the process begins, viz: with the sowing of the incorruptible seed of the kingdom. I understand that sowing to be the beginning of a process of regeneration, by which man are produced again. How are the dead raised up and with what body do they come? Are. Raised up upon a principal of regeneration, and come with the body of the regenerator; as by man came death, by man came also the resurrection.

For as in Adam all (of the church) die, even so in Christ shall all (of the church) be made alive. 1 Cor. xv 21-22. Now what does "in Adam" mean? Certainly a connection with him by the laws of generation by which they get his nature, and must die; hence, die in Adam, (Rom. v 12, 15, 17), and not a act in Christ mean the same thing; to wit: A connection with him by the laws of generation, (again) whereby they get his nature, and must live? Hence, made alive in Christ.

Now understand me, I hold that none will be raised but those who will be finally saved; and I understand that you hold that none will be raised but those who have had the good seed sown in them. Now, in this process of regeneration, there are the three principal steps that are in the process of generation, to-wit: the begettal, the period of gestation, and the birth.

They are begotten when the good seed is sown, or when there is an effect produced by that seed. James 1 18, 1 Peter 1 23. Then follows the period of gestation, or the development period, 2 Peter 1:5-11; 2 Peter 3:18; then comes the birth, which is the coming forth from the death state. Christ is the first born from the dead. Col. 1 15-18; Rom. viii 29; Rev. 1:5. So we see that it is coming from the dead is called a birth; and Christ is the first fruits of them that slept. So then, as the general harvest was not like the first sheaf, only it was gathered afterwards, so the general harvest of the dead will be just like the first sheaf, only gathered later. 1 Cor. xv 20, 23; Phil. iii 21; Isa. xxvi 19.

Then if Christ come out of the grave immortal, so will the saints. But say you, he did not; he was aware of resurrection was not finished with him when he came out of the grave. Well, let us see. Rom. vi 9. Death hath no more dominion over him, (since he is raised from the dead). What is immortality? simply not subject to death. Death hath no more dominion over him. Rev. 1 18; so if he could not die, he was not subject to death, and, hence, immortal. Did he die after he came out of the grave? No! Why? Because he had been born of the spirit, and had life in himself (John v 26) or had control of his own life. He lived by a different process, or by different means, for the wounds that killed him once; and one additional one, made in his side after he was dead, were still in him, and he lived. John xx 27; and, besides, he gave the very identical proofs that he had been born of the spirit, that he told Nicodemus that those that were born of the spirit could give (John iii 31; xx 19-20) the door being shut (Luke xxiv 31) vanished out of their sight. So is everyone that is born of the spirit like the wind whereof where it listeth, etc. But when was the resurrection process with Christ finished? When he came out of the grave. Luke xxiv 6. He is risen—this word shows a finished action—he died to done. So then I came to the conclusion that the resurrection process with him was finished when he came out of the grave; that then he was born of the spirit; and from that point onward he could die no more; which made him immortal. And as he is the first fruits, the first born among many brethren, and the representative head, or second Adam, so must all the heirs, all his brethren, all the regenerated, have their resurrection process finished at the time they come out of the grave, and are then born of the spirit, and are immortal from that point onward, for they are children of God, being children of the resurrection. Luke xx. 36. And then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, death is swallowed up in victory.

But say you, what about the judgment of the church that determines their worthiness for immortality? That is going on now, or during the period of gestation. Like as the Assenic high priest went into the holy place once a year with the breast-plate of judgment on, and the decision was made while he was in there, and the people waited without, Ex. xxviii 29-30; Luke i 10, so Christ, as the antitype of Aaron, has entered in once for all, there to appear in the presence of God for us. Heb. vii 27, and ix 6-12, and 23-28 inclusive. So then I came to the conclusion, that the record is made up, and the decision rendered in each individual case, when the Lord comes out of heaven, and that every one who has made a failure during the period of gestation, or between their baptism and death, will prove an abortion, (and not be raised from the dead) as certain as a failure in the period of gestation proves to be an abortion in the natural process of generation. Prov. xxi 16. But as to other phases of the judgment for the purpose of awarding them their proper places in the kingdom towards according to works such as 2 Cor. v 10, that is altogether another thing. When a criminal is convicted, it may be that the cur of the executive be complying with a regular process. But ok in the law, and the executive may examine the case, and render his decision in the case of the criminal. So in this case: the who. human race is condemned from the and may get the cur of the Great Executive by obeying certain requirements, and get the penalty taken off, to-wit, death, and the examination is had into the peculiarity of his claim, and the case decided in his absence, so then I see no nullifying judgment, nor the marring of the beauty of the resurrection, but on the other hand, to my mind, the beauty and simplicity of the system of regeneration brought to view in the Bible, would be marred by a mortal resurrection. I should be as glad as any one to see a union of all those who are honestly trying to take God at his word, and would do all in my power to bring about such a state of things; but the word "compromise" is not in my vocabulary. The union must be upon the word of God.

I have never read Dr. Thomas' "Anastasis," I have seen the Christadelphian; it is an able paper, but let me ask you, do you hold with Dr. Roberts that Jesus Christ is a son of Adam? If so, what is he with which to purchase back anyone, more than any other son of Adam? For the death penalty would lay against him. This, to my mind, overturns the whole scheme of redemption.

Let us look well where we stand. I said bold with Dr. Roberts. I understand that he holds and advocates, through the Christadelphian, the doctrine that Christ was a son of Adam and died for himself; at least I know that parties living in this state, that take and endorse the Christadelphian, advocate those ideas. If that doctrine be true, then is he the seed of the woman, or what is the woman's seed have had the seeds of death transmitted to him from Adam, just as any other son of Adam, and must, of necessity, have died i. e., suffered the death penalty, just as other men do; and in that case, how could it be said that he had power to lay his life down and take it again, wherein is the efficacy of his blood more than any other righteous man, for instance, John or Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist?

Let us see to it that we do not espouse a doctrine that will cheat us out of the redemption altogether. Consider the matter well and write me again. Yours in love, hoping to see you love to labor.

W. J. OREM.

Infallible.

Under this caption I wish to pen a few thoughts for those who dare think for themselves, with a view to elicit timely thoughts that will redound to a deliverance of some fettered soul. The word "infallible," as defined by Dr. Webster, signifies "incapable of error or mistake," being used by many writers and speakers in a very flippant manner when assaulting the Hydra Headed monster—Roman Catholicism—which system of daring blasphemy having risen mountain high, bids defiance to all Protestant projects, and will succumb only and if the cruels of the infidelity judgments. Yet, notwithstanding this dreadful and terrible condescring beast must soon fall to rise no more. Is it not possible and highly probable that very many of the holy sacrifices have large beams in their eyes? Let's see: they (the latter class) claim that God calls them to the ministry, and that "after the manner of the apostle Paul," as I heard one boldly declare of himself, and others affirmed that they were guided by the Spirit in their preaching, being simply instruments through which God speaks to the people.

Now, with all due deference to this whole set of confused teachers, and their too credulous followers, I wish to ask: If this is not claiming infallibility? and what is the difference between these two sets of infallible teachers? If the first claim the power to forgive sins—in short, the power the apostles possessed, the latter class claim to be called after the same manner, being baptized with the Holy Ghost and fire, and that God speaks through them, as He did the apostles, thus virtually claiming infallibility; and why not claim the power to forgive sins, as the apostles had the power, and then when this claim is successfully made, none dare question their teaching more than they would the words of the King Eternal, or His beloved Son, when they speak as never man spake. And again, we ask, why is it those called teachers teach so many discordant doctrines? Such as immersion, the only Bible mode of Christian baptism, all other simply man-made traditions. While others, called wise ones, say that sprinkling and pouring, are Bible modes? And still others discard all modes. And then, again, there are those who teach the complete mortality of man, sleep of the dead, and utter destruction, finally, of the impenitent. While others teach the very opposition, and all called of God, themselves being witnesses. One class just referred to, claim direct revelation from heaven, which revelations are booked up and sold out to thousands of their fello ers, who boast of dollars, and numbers whose eyes are so completely veiled that they can't discern the many inconsistent contradictions and suppressions that accompany their favorite religion

Now, if those various and pretended revelations are just like the Bible, why all this speculative ado? And then if they are not just like the Bible, I for one, have no use for them, more than a Methodist Discipline, at any rate This system does not speak volumes of praise for the perfection and all-sufficiency of God's established revelation, that was completed A. D. 96, on the isle of Patmos, closed up and guarded as one would think, securely, by a certain and fearful warning against those who would dare take from or add to, and why is it that men and women entirely overlook the cunning and shrewdness employed in the shaping up, remodeling, and suppression of said revelations, under the silly pies of their being of a feeal character, as though there never would be such cases again. God forbid that any man or set of men, should mutilate and suppress any part, jot or tittle, local or otherwise, of God's revelation And then who has the power to make temper with revelation, but an infallible church or pope, who might claim to change times and laws. And this is not all, but after this people have added on their exhibition of authority and power, something similar to the Koran, book of Mormon, and human disciplines generally, which characterize the daughters of Babylon, denouncing in bitter terms those who dare to be free, and think for themselves, they set forth the sounding forth, the three angel messages of Rev. xiv, and that they are the chosen instruments represented under the appellation of angels to warn a wicked world of its impending doom, by first flying angel-like with the Gospel to every nation, kindred tongue and people, which is not half accomplished yet, notwithstanding the third is nearly wrung out. and the "hour of God's judgment is come," rang out a score and a half years ago. The last message has been for years ringing out the fearful warning against the least worshipers and those who receive his mark—(keep Sunday) makes an image and richly enforces, under penalty, Sunday-keeping, which is visible to those only who have their inventive faculties fully developed, and then taking our leave of highly inconsistent reasoning. We would ask, in all candor, that if this claim is correct, and they are actually giving not only their own pretended revelations but this part of God's revelation, the three messages, are they not of necessity infallible,—as much so as Peter, John, or any one else? And then is it not marvel if they should all speak the same things? This claim once established, which is not the case, however, and then one would naturally expect such spirits were tried or tested, they would not only be harmonious in all their teachings, but fully able and ever willing to demonstrate with signs following.

But is this true of the case in hand? Nay, verily for said teaching not only borders on the marvelous, but actually contradicts itself and the truth. Please try the following: "My accompanying angel bade me look for the trail of souls for sinners, as it used to be. I looked, but could not see it, for the time for their salvation is past.—Exp. and Views. p 27. "I saw that the wicked could not be benefited by our prayers now," &c.—Sanden Views. Now hear Elder Smith speak out frankly with the foregoing: "It was the general sentiment of the Advent body immediately after the passing of the time in that year (1844) that their work for the world was done." Review Vol. 24, No. 8. Now hear Elder Himes testify to the foregoing, as he was intimately connected with the 1844 movements, therefore fully competent to speak: "These leaders took the ground that the prophetic periods ended in 1844; that the door of mercy was then shut and no more could be saved." Voice of the West, of Nov. 1, 1864. Now compare the following vision with the testimony of Jesus, Mark xiii 32. The vision says: "Soon we heard the voice of God. Like many waters, which gave us the day and the hour of Jesus coming, the living saints 144,000 in number, knew and understood the voice, while the wicked thought it was thunder and an earthquake." Exp. and Views. pp 1-11, published by Elder White, 1851. Here the vision contradicts Jesus as squarely as the serpent did the Lord in the garden of Eden.

Reader, which will you believe, Jesus who spake as never man spake, who came from above, and is above all, being the seat of God, speaking the words of God, "For God giveth not the spirit by measure unto him," or Mrs. E. J. White, who speaks human wisdom from beneath to the satisfaction of thousands, who like modern spiritualists, have "outgrown their Bible clothes," of they ever had any such clothes? The Father says, "This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased, hear ye Him." These Babel builders would do well to lay off this garb of infallibility, which is the principal cause of infidelity and religious lurs, and thus cast out from their own eyes a fearful beam, being then able to see clearly, and thus assist their mother and sisters in doing likewise, for they all claim infallibility directly or otherwise. And they are with their eyes their folly, repent and disrobe themselves of such lofty arrogated title, and humble themselves before God, not only in word, but in deed and in truth.

Whom Should We Fellowship.

BRO EDITOR:

As there are some diversities and adversities of faiths, among the readers of the RESTITUTION, perhaps a few remarks on the above heading would not be out of place. And I will submit a few thoughts, as they may suggest them-selves to my mind.

I am a firm believer in unity, for "in union there is strength." But the question very naturally and properly suggests itself in our mind, Upon what should we unite? This is a question of no difficult solution, otherwise existing notwithstanding. Are we bound by the God of heaven to know and believe every thing taught in the Bible? Every one will answer without hesitation, No. Well, what are we bound to know and believe? Why, you will answer, such things as will effect our destiny, either pro or con. Very well, this involves the necessary things, and more than these is non-essential.

But the question now comes up, What are the essential things? If we were to submit the question to man for an answer, some would say one thing, and some another. Some would say we must believe in the non-resurrection of the wicked; another would say we must believe that the wicked are to be raised to die again; another would say we must believe in a literal account-giving, and that the saints will emerge from the grave, mortal; another would say we must believe in the doctrine of endless punishment, and that the majority of the human race is to be so punished; another will say that we must believe in the doctrine of "a fair chance."

Now, where is the Bible for either of these? Point to the chapter or verse that binds us to believe either one. These are questions of human invention, though numbered in the catalogue of necessary things, and are well calculated to divide the body.

It is our privilege to know all questions of a Biblical nature, but not an absolute duty. There is a difference between a privilege and an absolute duty. There is nothing against the former, and nothing binding on the latter.

Well, what must we believe? Let Christ answer: "Go ye (apostles) into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature; he that believeth (the Gospel) and is baptized, shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." Mark xvi. 15, 16. Here it is in a nut shell, and include all the necessary things," viz: faith and obedience—faith in the Gospel.

Gospel is from two Greek words signifying good news, or good message—glad tidings, as it is rendered in various places in the Bible. It is so expressed by the angel to the shepherds in Luke ii. 10 ("Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people."

The Gospel, then, is good news to the sinner. Therefore, anything preached that is not good news is not Gospel, and ought not to be listened to. The good news is, the kingdom of God—that God will, by his Son, rule the world in righteousness.

Does the Gospel involve the points above enumerated, and must they be received? No, for not one of them is good news, and ought not to be numbered among the necessary things. Wemay do very careful not to cast a stumbling block in the way of any one by heaping upon him any unnecessary burden which might cause him to fall. It is our duty to bear with the weaker portion of the brethren, knowing that ourselves are also weak, and liable to fall. None of us have arrived at the knowledge of the truth, for "now we see through a glass darkly, and know only in part.

"The Gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." Thus says Paul, and say other means brought in, as a means of salvation, is not God's—it is merely human.

Now we come to the caption of this article. Whom should we fellowship? Having ascertained the means of salvation, the question is of no difficult solution. There is only one test of fellowship in the Bible, and that is, obedience. This is the only test God has seen fit to give. Diabolical conduct is the only disbelief in right to withdraw from any one.

But one asks, "What are you going to do with faith? Is not faith one of the conditions of salvation? Shall we fellowship hypocrites?" How can we tell who believe, and who do not, save by its works? Have we the power of discerning spirits? By their fruits shall ye know them," says our Savior. "Show me thy faith without works, and I will show you my faith by my works." says Jas.

The longest article of faith ever written is not sufficient to keep out hypocrites. Even in the apostles' day, when they had the power of discerning spirits, and of speaking with unknown tongues, some would creep in privately, and deceive the flock. Therefore, the only test we have that a man believes is works. If we are deceived, we must be deceived until we appear at the judgment seat of Christ, when all hypocrites will be made manifest.

Yours for the kingdom,

Conference Report.

The first quarterly conference of the Church of God, in Iowa, for the year 1870, met at the Hickory Grove meeting house, near Colo, Story county, Iowa, Thursday evening, March the 9th. The roads being very bad, but few were present, and no service except a few songs at this meeting. On Friday, at 10 o'clock, conference was again assembled, Bro. J. T. Prime, in the chair; on motion, Brethren L. Marsh, J. Carr, and R Stevens, were chosen as a committee of arrangements. Bro. John Fitz, our secretary, being absent on account of sickness in his family, A. D. Carter was chosen secretary pro tem; after which a prayer and social meeting was enjoyed. We then adjourned until Friday evening. At our meeting Friday evening, Bro J.S. Watkins preached on the signs of the times followed by Bro. Carr, after which we adjourned till Saturday at 10 o'clock. Met as per adjournment, Bro. J. T. Prime preached on the Christian hope, after which the conference was called together for conference business.

The question whether we, as a conference, do right in endorsing Elder T. W. Woodcox as one of our preaching brethren, while he preaches Universal salvation without let or hindrance. On motion, a committee of three were chosen to draft a resolution on the subject, viz.: L. H. Lincoln, Levi Marsh, and A. D. Carter. The writer would here say that nothing but a sense of duty to God and his fellow men, induced him to act in this matter. The following resolutions were presented and adopted by the committee:

Resolved, That whereas the committee have examines into the teachings of T. W. Woodcox, and find them not in accordance with the Bible, would recommend to the conference that his license be revoked, and the fellowship of the Church be withdrawn from him; also, that this conference revoke the license of Mathew Wing who has joined the Seventh Day Adventists, and is preaching their doctrine.

The time and place for our next conference was then discussed. By request of Bro. C. W. Aulls, it was resolved to hold our next meeting at the Rock Creek Center school house, six miles west of Grinnell, Jasper county, Iowa, commencing Thursday evening before the second Sunday in June. It was further resolved that the annual conference be held hereafter in September, instead of December, as heretofore. By request a vote was taken, and the president and secretary instructed to grant a license to preach, to Bro. John S. Watkins, of Story county, Iowa, after which the conference adjourned.

In the evening, Bro. W. A. Welsh preached on the subject of Christ's second coming. Sunday at 11 o'clock, Bro. White preached from Matt. xiii. 33, and was followed by Bro. Aulls; after which we were served with a beautiful repast by the sisters, at the place of meeting, and meeting re-assembled at 2 o'clock. Bro. J. T. Prime gave a masterly discourse on the subject of unfulfilled Prophecy, after which the suffering and death of our Lord was commemorated. In the evening Bro. J. N. Fletcher preached from Matt. iii. 3. This closed the exercises of this meeting, which was well enjoyed by those present, and we hope encouragement given to those living here.

The Seven Blessed of Revelation.

I. Blessed is he that reads, and they that hear the words of this prophesy, and keep those things which are written therein; for the time is at hand. Rev. i: 3.

II. Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them. Rev. xiv: 13.

III. Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame. Rev. xvi: 15.

IV. Blessed are they which are called unto the marriage supper of the Lamb. These are the true sayings of God. Rev. xix: 9.

V. Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousands years. Rev. xx: 6.

VI. Blessed is he that keepeth the sayings of the prophesy of this book. Rev. xxii: 7.

VII. Blessed are they that do his commandments, they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city. Rev. xxii: 14.—The Christian.

God has further honors for those who continue lowly when their reputation rises.

A cool head with a warm heart is an admirable composition.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the honor-elevation of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and so my other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisite to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Is the Bible Indeed the Word of God?

Of all subjects which have engaged the human mind, none is so pregnant with solemn interest as the one that forms the caption of this article.

There is certainly no subject that contains that degree of interest, or that deserves our special attention, as the one to which I now appeal, upon which, as upon a pivot, the Christian system is suspended. It is not my intention to enter largely into a discussion of the authenticity of the Holy Scriptures; but simply to submit the question to you for your consideration; for it is not possible that we can, in the limited space allotted us, enter into a lengthy discussion of this subject; but only notice a few of the minor points: for the field is so broad, that anything like a completed discussion, would consume more space, in one little journal, than would be prudent to take up with this.

So far as labored arguments are concerned, the Christian literature of the present day is indeed rich; so that an attempt on our part would not only appear weak, but also superfluous. Will those, however, who are willing to investigate the claims of the Bible, allow us to suggest the most tempting fields of research that were ever presented to the Bible student, in connection with a few other thoughts of less importance? We refer to the studies of the prophecies of the Scriptures in connection with the study of profane history. This is a matter which never can become uninteresting to the Bible student; for the prophecies of the Old Testament point to the infallibility of God's word with unerring certainty. The present the evidences of inspiration so clearly, that the infidel would stand appalled before the rich development of truth. The mighty walls of ancient kingdoms, and the magnificent trophies of antiquity are but the monuments of God's eternal truth. Two hundred years before an enemy's foot had entered Babylon the complete desolation of the "lady of kingdoms" was foretold by the inspired prescience. At the time she was the "glory of the Chaldee's excellency," when her mighty walls and brazen gates bade defiance to the united kingdoms of earth;—even then the keen eye of the prophet looked down through the long vista of the ages, and in the clear light of prophecy, told even the name of the man before whose mandates her glory should fade.

Two hundred years before the birth of Cyrus his name was inscribed upon the sacred scroll as the man who should be the instrument of God in executing his vengeance against that proud city.

Thus it reads: "Thus saith the Lord to his anointed, to Cyrus whose right hand I have holden to subdue nations before him; and I will loose the loins of kings, to open before him the two-leaved gates; and the gates shall not be shut. I will go before thee, and make the crooked places straight: I will break in pieces the gates of brass, and cut in sunder the bars of iron: and I will give thee the treasures of darkness, and hidden riches of secret places, that thou mayest know that I, the Lord, which called thee by thy name, am the God of Israel." Isa. xlv. 1–5. So accurate are the descriptions of desolation of those ancient kingdoms that testimony of those who have witnessed those scenes, in after years, appear like a repetition of the words of the prophets. Read the eloquent description of the overthrow of Babylon, as found in the rich language of Isaiah, or the mournful wail of Jeremiah, then turn to the classic pages of later writers, and they will be found but the echoes of inspiration. The next admirable fulfillment of prophecy is the destruction of Jerusalem, and the calamity of her people. First look at the present condition of that city. It is nothing but a heap of ruins, and plowed as a field. Then open your Bibles, and turn to Micah iii. 12, and tell who taught him more than two thousand years ago, while the city was in the zenith of her glory, to say: "Therefore shall Zion for your sake be plowed as a field: and Jerusalem shall become heaps; and the mountain of the house, as the high places of the forest." Turn and read the glowing description of the same, found in Jer. xxvi., written more than twenty-five hundred years ago, then turn and read the testimony of Josephus, and you will find a commentary on the fulfillment of prophecy. Read the prophecies concerning Samaria, Idumea, Ammon, Moab, Tyre, and Egypt, that are clothed in the glowing eloquence of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, Amos, and Micah. All these truths the infidel is unable to abrogate. Turn now and behold the calamity of her people. Compare their history with prophetic enunciation, and you will find a striking analogy. What induced Christ to say concerning that people what has become their history. He gave their history from that time till the close of this present age. When speaking of the destruction of Jerusalem, and the calamity of he. people, he said: "And they (the Jews) shall fall by the edge of the sword; and shall be led away captives into all nations; and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled;" and so utter should be the desolation of Jerusalem, that one stone should not be left upon another; and that vengeance should be poured out upon her people. That upon them should come all the righteous blood shed, from the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias, son of Barachias, whom they slew between the temple and the altar. That there should be great distress in the land, and wrath upon that people: "For these be the days of vengeance that all things which are written may be fulfilled." Have these sayings of Christ been fulfilled? Certainly they have. Go back and view the history of the Jews from the time of the commencing of their tribulation, viz: from the destruction of Jerusalem and forward, the scenes of dreadful carnage are constantly before our eyes. In a day when that people lived in prosperity and occupying a prominent rank among nations, the keen eye of inspiration looked forward through the dark mists of the future, and foretold their utter national destruction. For a better knowledge of the fulfillment of the predictions of Christ, I refer you to Fleetwood's "History of the Jewish Nation," and Gibbon's history of the "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." But we cannot dwell longer on this branch of the subject. We now come to the historical books of the New Testament. We see:

1. That the contents agree in every particular with what we know from other sources concerning the history of those times. Nothing can be detected in them inconsistent with their claims to authenticity. They exhibit no marks of later composition; and the characteristic peculiarity of their style, by which the several books are distinguished from each other, gives evidence of their genuineness.

2. The dialects in which these several books were written, are a convincing proof that they are genuine. They were written in a Hebrewistic Greek, which was chiefly used by the Jews of the first century, and went into disuse before the close of the same. These books, then, if they are forged, must have been forged during the lives of those men to whom they are ascribed, or very soon after their death.

The Coming of Christ.

The history of the past is full of grand and stirring events. Pageant after pageant, the most sublime and thrilling has been recorded in the most eloquent and affecting language that the gifted of past and present ages could command. Heroic chieftains have astonished the world with the brilliancy of their achievements. Mighty conquerors have gone forth conquering and to conquer. Conquering potentates have celebrated the glory of their achievements, by grand triumphant marches. Royal princes have donned the robes of royalty, and with mighty pomp, amidst tremendous applause, have taken to themselves great power, and reigned gloriously.

But an event of grander moment than any that the world has ever witnessed,—grander in its sublime conception, grander in its glorious enactment, and grander in its mighty results, is soon to electrify the world as no event of the past has ever done. A Prince mightier in power, of more distinguished origin, and possessed of higher royalty than any of the potentates of earth, is soon to commence the conquest of earth. A mighty conqueror, He will be escorted in His grand triumphal march, by a more magnificent retinue than ever before was escorted,—conqueror, prince, or potentate. The clouds are His grand triumphal car, the angels of heaven are his escort, and His coming is heralded by the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God. His will be a triumphal march, in celebration of such victories as no earthly king has ever gained. He has triumphed over the world, He has triumphed over satan, He has triumphed over the grave, and now He comes to triumph over the nations of earth. Then will be witnessed a scene of such solemn grandeur, such gorgeous splendor, and such transcendant glory as no pen can describe, or no pencil portray. The Prince of princes, He will be King of kings, and Lord of lords, and will take to Himself His great power, and reign as never earthly king has reigned.

Need I say that I speak of the coming of Christ, as He comes in His glory, and in the glory of His Father, with all the holy angels with Him to sit upon the throne of His glory,—when "the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven, with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God,"—when He comes to raise the righteous dead, and change the living saints, and they shall all "be caught up together to meet the Lord in the air,"—in that day when His feet shall stand upon the Mount of Olives,—when "the Lord my God shall come and all the saints with thee," and the grand work of restitution shall be inaugurated?

Reader, have you contemplated the momentous nature of that occasion? Have you compared the unspeakable joy of those who are Christ's, and who are waiting patiently for His coming, with the terror, the anguish, the utter consternation, that will seize upon all those that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ? Have you thought what a meeting that will be, with Jesus and the angels, with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, with the prophets, apostles, and martyrs, and with the dead of every age and clime? Have you thought of the imperishable and indescribable joy,—have you tried to measure the perfect bliss,—have you sought to fathom the depths of hallowed peace,—have you contemplated the bright and unfading glory that awaits all that have part in that joyous meeting? Have you seen in vision the glad, bright smiles that irradiate every countenance, and light up every eye, as with an intensity of joy unutterable? Have you heard with prophetic ear, the reverberating strains of seraphic music that echo, and re-echo over the hills and valleys of earth, while the redeemed sing that new song. "Thou hast redeemed us by thy blood out of every kindred and tongue and people and nation, and hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on earth?" Are you among those that have the promise of a part in this glorious meeting? Will your voice be attuned to sing that glad song? Will your eye behold the glories of that magnificent scene? Will your ears be saluted with the joyous, exultant notes of the ransomed of earth? Will your being be thrilled with the fullness of bliss that awaits all that have part in the first resurrection? If the opening heavens should to-day reveal the Son of God, with all the shining retinue of heaven, gliding down the heavenly pathway, and should the mighty blasts of God's trump, this hour, awake the sleeping inhabitants of earth, are you ready? Oh, if these joys await you, how fervently you ought to serve Him who is the author of such great blessings! If you are not of this happy number, O, turn at once from the error of your way, and serve the true and living God, and have part in those glories that are speedily to thrill the earth, and bring joy and gladness to the waiting ones.

Man-Made, or God-Made?

"If the Lord be God, follow him." Elijah, the Prophet.

I grieve to read in the RESTITUTION of March 22d that Brother Wiley Jones, of Norfolk, Va., has published, warmly commends, and offers for sale to the brethren of the One Faith, a "Catechism, designed for old and young, but chiefly for the instruction of the youth in the Sunday School or family circle," which also contains "notes, original and selected, from large and costly works" which "may be regarded by the reader as worth more than the whole price of the whole book," which is only "25 cents per copy."

"It contains also many songs adapted to Sunday Schools and general use," and Brother Jones hopes "that this catechism will lead to the inauguration and successful carrying on of many Sunday Schools, and that it will be used in many families where Sunday Schools are not available."

The writer knows Brother Jones well and favorably. He is a diligent, pains-taking, laborious reader and student and that he means well in publishing this catechism is not to be doubted; but new inventions or borrowed practices in religion are foreign to the apostolic faith and customs and however seemingly wise and expedient in the sight of men, are discountenanced and rejected by Bible precept and example. See Matt. xv. 8; Mark vii. 7, 8; Col. ii. 18–23; Eph. ii. 16–20.

Did any apostle or inspired teacher give us a catechism, or authorize us to "inaugurate or carry on Sunday Schools?" Had they been necessary or even expedient, would they have wholly failed to provide for them by a successful means of "showing the Gospel?"

If we are to have catechisms, "with copious notes, original and selected from large and costly works—worth more than 25 cents," and Sunday schools which these catechisms—not Paul, or Peter, or John—are to inaugurate, why not also a tract society, a missionary society, a Bible and temperance societies, a young and old men and women's Christian association, and all the apparatus and appliances and paraphernalia of a completely equipped sectarian hierarchy at once?

On our good brother's premises, he will be bound to answer, consistently and logically, "why not?"

What, then, becomes of the mission and work of the church of Christ, "the pillar and ground of the truth," as Paul calls it? Are not the church and the Word God's means and instrumentalities to reclaim mankind from the sin and ruin in which they lie? Is not the preaching and teaching of his word his plan "designed for the instruction of the old and young"? Does Brother Jones think his catechism and Sunday School is better and wiser scheme to accomplish the work? I would fain hope not.

Is not the Church of God and the Christian family the only real, divinely appointed Sunday School? The Bible, missionary, temperance society—the Christian association for the old and the young, male and female, for the education, instruction, conversion and salvation of all, whether saint or sinner—in short, God's institution for every good word and work? Shall we turn from these and the teachings and preachings of the great salvation emanating therefrom, and borrow the shallow inventions of men as something better?

If it be said that the church does not do its work in this respect, and therefore we must call on man for help, let no such delusive suggestion of Satan have place for a moment. In such a case, stir the church, the brethren, up to their duty. Reform the church to the Bible standard of Bible duty. Never forget Paul's caution: "Let God be true, though every man a liar."

In regard to the instruction of our children, we have the divine precept to parents, "Bring up your children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." This is the plain duty of parents, which they are not permitted, by "withdrawing the shoulder," to delegate to a Sunday School teacher, though ever so well versed in the "copious notes, original and selected with great care from large and costly works." (will Brother Jones allow me to add and amend in the very words of our Gentile apostle—"after the commandments and doctrines of men," in Col. ii. 22, and in verse 8,—"and not after Christ."

Let us beware, then, of being led away from the "old paths," of departing from the simplicity which is in Christ.

Christ saith, "My sheep hear my voice, and they follow me;" and "the voice of a stranger they will not hear." Truly doth the Psalmist say, "Through thy precepts I get understanding; therefore I hate every false way." Ps. cxix.

Faithfully submitted.

ALLAN B. MAGRUDER.

What is Man?

Among the many questions now agitating the minds of men, as a very important one, the above is occupying its place. Day by day men in every department of life are halting, reflecting, and to themselves propounding the question, "What is Man;" "What is his nature," and "What is his destiny?" These are not only theological questions, but they are becoming questions to the chemist and to the physiologist.

Upon the question at the head of this article we do not propose making a lengthy treatise, but simply to number a few obvious propositions and headings and to follow each in their order with appropriate definitions and references which we trust the reader, for his satisfaction and benefit will consult.

Making the Bible our standard, our first proposition then is:

I. When created, man's constitutional nature was mortal—subject to decay and finally death.

In support of this proposition we submit the following reasons:

1. MAN—Definition—Webster in his Dictionary, 20th. 1838-1863, on p. 71, says: "Man in English, signifies form, shape, image expressing distinctly the characteristic eminence or distinction of form of the human race." Under the word Man, he says: "The primary sense is form, image."

2. HIS COMPOSITION. 1. Made of the Ground. Gen ii. 7; iii. 17–19; Job. xvii. 13–16; xxi. 26; xxxiv. 14, 15; Psa. cxlvi. 34; Ecc. iii. 18–21. 2. His nature is earthy. 1 Cor. xv. 47–49. 3. Made flesh. Gen. vi. 3. 4. His life put in his blood. Gen. ix 4; Lev. xvii. 10–14.

3. THEN OF LIFE.—Its name indicates its purpose—to sustain physical life. Without natural and physical decay it would not have been needed.

II. Man in Eden with the Tree of Life to overcome the principles of decay might have lived on continually, either with or without transgression. Gen. iii. 22.

III. With the Edenic state forfeited man was brought back to his constitutional basis, as he was before the Tree of Life was given—subject to decay and death.

1. REDUCTION.—1. The Law given. Gen. ii. 16–17.

2. The Law violated. Gen. iii. 1–6.

3. Accusation and trial. Gen. iii. 9–13.

4. Condemnation. Gen. iii. 16–24.

This condemnation led directly to an expulsion from the Edenic estate, and this expulsion finally to the end of the law—

2. DEATH—Definition—That state of a being, animal or vegetable, but more particularly of an animal in which there is total and permanent cessation of all the vital functions, when the organs have not only ceased to act, but have lost the susceptibility of renewed action.—Webster on Primary Death.

3. COMPARISON—Like a son whose father squanders an estate, as that estate is forever gone from the reach of the son, so in Adam's transgression, to his posterity a right to the Tree of Life is forever forfeited—and therefore death as an inevitable result, follows.

4. EXTENT OF DEATH—Rom. v. 12; 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22.

5. Objections to the death penalty consider'd. The term Day, in common parlance and Scripture both, frequently measures an indefinite period—signifying a cycle of time, measuring the duration to which reference is made. See the six days. Gen. i. with ii. 4. Also Gen. xxix. 27; Heb. iii. 7–9; Luke xix. 41, 42; Rom. xiii. 11–13; Jno. viii. 56.

IV. What Man may be.—Not by any inherent principle in him; not by any physical principle implanted in his constitution; but by legal relationship to Christ. The Bible.

This collection of books has taken such a hold on the world as no other. It is read of a Sabbath in all the 10,000 pulpits of our land; the sun never sets on its gleaming pages. It goes equally well to the cottage of the plain man and the palace of the king. It is woven into the literature of the scholar, and colors the talk of the street. The barque of the merchant cannot sail without it. No ships of war go to the conflict but the Bible is there. It enters men's closets, mingles in all the griefs and cheerfulness of life. The affianced maiden prays God in Scripture for her strength in her home duties; men are married by Scripture; the Bible attends them in their sickness—when the fever of the world is upon them. The aching head finds a softer pillow when the Bible lies underneath. The mariner, escaping from shipwreck, esteems it the first of his treasures, and keeps it sacred to God. It goes with the peddler in his crowded pack, cheers him at eventide, when he sits down, dusty and fatigued, and brightens the freshness of his morning face. It blesses us when we are born, gives names to half of Christendom, rejoices with us, has sympathy for our mourning, tempers our griefs to finer issues. It is the better part of our sermons; it lifts man above himself—our best of natural prayers are in its storied speech, wherewith our fathers and the patriarchs prayed. The timid man, about awaking from this dream of life, looks through the glass of Scripture, and his eye grows bright; he does not fear to stand alone, to tread the way unknown and distant, to take the death angel by the hand and bid farewell to wife, and babes, and home! Men rest on this their dearest hope. It tells them of God and of his blessed Son; of earthly duties and of heavenly trust!—Theo. Parker.

The Pearl of Great Price.

We often hear it spoken, and see it written, that when any one embraced the truth, that they have sought and found the Pearl of great price. I think if we carefully look at all those parables, in the 13th chapter of Matthew, commencing at the 44th verse, we will see that it was no less than the Son of God that found the treasure in the field, which field, is the world; the treasure, the people in it. Did not Jesus sell all he had to buy this field and the treasure? The Scriptures so declare it. And is not the Son of God that sought the goodly hearts? And did he not sell all he had to buy the pearl of great price? Yes, truly. We must have been of great value in the sight of the Father and his Son, that such a price should be paid for our redemption. O, yes, God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish, but have everlasting life. Paul told the elders of Ephesus to feed the Church of God, which, said he, he hath purchased with his own blood. He says again, "ye are sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise until the redemption of the purchased possession." Oh how faithful and earnest we should be to secure eternal life when such a price has been paid for it.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT

☞"A Catechism," by Wiley Jones, is not for sale at this office, but can be obtained only of the author, according to his announcement in the book, at Norfolk, Va.

☞A very annoying mistake appeared in the make-up of our last number, by which Bro. Simonds' article on the Spirit, was divided, only a part of it appearing, and that with another article at the head of it. The writer and the reader may be consoled with the assurance that the blunder was more annoying to the printer than it could possibly be to them. The article appears in full in this number.

☞A minister in our place preached a funeral discourse recently, and stated when alluding to the death of a lady "she has now gained the victory over death." Strange, indeed, it is, that men will persist in stating things directly oppo ite to the word of God. There is not one text which represents death as the time of victory The victory that Paul longed for, was the coming of our blessed Lord, and the resurrection of the dead. Men may twist and say it makes no difference, but our victory will come when Paul's comes, and that will be when the dead are raised from the grave. Even as it is written, "O death where is thy sting, O GRAVE WHERE IS THY VICTORY?" 1 Cor. xi. 55–57: 1 Thess. iv. 14–17; Heb. xv. 37–39.

The idea that the saints get their victory over death when they die, flatly contradicts the plain word of God.

☞It will be remembered that we sometime ago mentioned that Mr. Macdonnell, of Toronto, was charged with heresy for preaching that endless misery was not in harmony with the word of God. A committee was appointed by the Presbytery to examine into the facts and report his case at the next session. The committee has made its report, and Mr. M. is accused of "heresy." The church, however, of which he is pastor, propose to stand by their pastor and help him through. Men are getting their eyes open upon these great questions, and it will not be long before the whole orthodox pulpit will openly renounce the old dogma of endless misery. Mr. M. is the most popular clergyman of the Presbyterian church in Canada, and has a strong influence in Toronto. The church building where he preaches is new, and cost one hundred thousand dollars. Rowland the "Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands." Mr. M. will find it hard work to stem the tide if he allows a padlock to be put upon his mouth by the set clergy of Canada. We truly sympathize with all who are struggling for liberty.

The Age to Come.

It would appear from the way some people talk, that all those who believe in the age to come, are under a great delusion. And yet the Bible phrase "the world to come," means just what is meant by the age to come. These very persons are very free to talk about the world to come, and yet they claim to have no faith in the age to come. The truth is, the two phrases mean one and the same thing in the Bible.

It is in the age to come that men are to gain eternal life; the same is true of the crown of the kingdom, of the reign, and the inheritance. It only needs a little honest reflection for any one to see that the Bible is full of promises relating to the age to come. Take this idea out of the Bible and you remove the Christian's hope and cause the promises of God.

But, says one, "I believe in the age to come, but I don't believe the nations of the earth will exist after translated saints are in the Eden home and on the sea of glass." If we could only have such persons stand on the sea of glass while the redeemed are singing their song of victory, it seems to us that we could make them believe the song. Hear it, O ye who claim to be guided by the word of God, "WHO shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name, for thou only art holy; FOR ALL NATIONS SHALL COME AND WORSHIP BEFORE THEE, for thy judgments are made manifest."—Rev. xv. 4.

If this friend expects to sing on the sea of glass, and will BELIEVE WHAT HE SINGS he will see that a great blessing is in store for the NATIONS. The REASON given in Daniel for Christ's receiving the kingdom is that ALL NATIONS MAY SERVE HIM. See Dan. vii. 13–14. Men may bluster and cry heresy, as long as they may please, yet it must come to pass that all the ends of the earth will remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the nations will be governed by one holy King. See Psa. xxii. lxxii.

☞Bro. Willcox is doing battle for the truth at Remington. He is engaged in a discussion with W. B. Hendryx, a Disciple minister. The debate has now been going nearly two weeks and will continue for a week yet. Mr. H. considers that the immortality of the soul is among the things of the Gospel, and also holds the church-kingdom theory, and does not look for a literal kingdom on earth under the royal sceptre of David's Son. Bro. Willcox is testing the truth of his positions by the Word, and is doing valiant work for the truth. Should any of our brethren desire to attend the debate, they will yet have time to visit Remington and hear the doctrine of Plato Biblically exposed.

We clip the following from the Remington Record, which will show the reader the points now under discussion:

"In order that our readers may fully understand the questions which are being debated, we give them below. Five nights will be occupied in the discussion of these questions, the first having been opened last Monday evening. First proposition, Hendryx, affirmative, Willcox negative; other two, Willcox affirmative, Hendryx negative:

Resolved, That there is in man a responsible, rational entity, called the mind, spirit or soul, which will never cease to be; and which entity is capable of conscious existence, separate from the body.

Resolved, That the eternal punishment of the finally impenitent will consist in the utter extinction of their conscious being.

Resolved, That the kingdom of which the gospel of Christ is the good news, or glad tidings, is a future, personal and eternal reign of Christ on this earth."

Can the Soul Die.

Clergymen are very free to tell the people that the soul cannot die; that it is immortal and indistructible. It is quite easy to assert this, but it will not avail anything if found in conflict with the Word of God. The reader is invited to read the following plain words from the Holy Scriptures, and then pause before denouncing men for believing just what God has said in the revelations of his truth to men.

First Witness.—And they smote all the souls that were therein with the edge of the sword, utterly destroying them; there was not any left to breathe; and he burnt Hazor with fire. Josh xi. 11; also x. 28.

Second Witness.—And Samson said, Let my soul (margin) die with the Philistines. Judges xvi. 30.

Third Witness.—Who can count the dust of Jacob, and the number of the fourth part of Israel? Let my soul die (margin) the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his. Num. xxiii. 10.

Fourth Witness.—So that my soul chooseth strangling, and death rather than my life. Job vii. 15.

Fifth Witness.—He made a way to his anger; he spared not their soul from death, but gave their life over to the pestilence. Psa. lxxviii. 50.

Sixth Witness.—All souls are mine; as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine: The soul that sinneth, it shall die Ezek. xviii. 4; v. 20.

Seventh Witness.—And fear not them which kill the body and are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell. Matt. x. 28.

Eighth Witness.—Let him know, that he which converteth a sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death and shall hide a multitude of sins. James v. 20.

Remarks.—The Bible nowhere says that the soul is immortal, but on the other hand it plainly says that God "only hath immortality." 1 Tim. vi. 16. It also says that man must "seek for immortality," and that this "mortal shall put on immortality at the resurrection of the dead." In proof of these statements read Rom. ii. 7; 1 Cor. xv. 53–56.

If the soul goes before God at death and enters immediately upon its reward, what is the use of the resurrection, and why have a future judgment? Read what Paul says upon this point:

"And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." 1 Cor. xv. 17–18.

To say that dead men praise God is to contradict the Holy Scriptures; for it is written, "The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence." Psa cxv. 17.

When Christ comes from heaven He will call the holy dead from their graves, not their souls out of heaven. See John v. 28–29.

Do the good and bad enter upon their reward before judgment? Do not the Scriptures say that Christ shall "judge the quick and dead at His appearing and His kingdom?" 2 Tim. iv 1-4.

Some people have an impression that all clergymen of the orthodox churches believe in the immortality of the soul, but this is a great mistake. It is safe to say that hundreds of the most powerful ministers in the churches, are now preaching and writing upon the subject. The revolution is setting in with great earnestness, and the time is not far distant when men will preach "Jesus and the resurrection," as Paul did at Athens, and let the doctrine of natural immortality sleep in the land of silence.

Zion the City of God.

For our accustomed original contribution we substitute the following, from the Bible Echo, published in London. Will write on the theme, commenced a few weeks ago, when we have a little more time at command.

S. A. C.

"Glorious things are spoken of thee, thou city of God."—Psalm lxxxvii. 3.

At the present time there is a desire on the part of many in the various churches around us to modify the doctrinal distinction that keeps them apart, and to draw simply around the leading features of the Christian faith which are common to all,—to sink those differences, and, as Christians, to meet on the common basis of a disciple's desire to worship and serve his Master.

In theory, the idea looks well; and the plausibility of its claims may lead away some who are not disposed to give the matter much consideration.

And, really, when we consider at how low an ebb is the knowledge of God in the community, and how sceptical men are regarding the prophetic word in relation to the future of the Church and the world, the wonder is, not that there are so many, but that there are so few, who participate in the movement. For it is a pleasant thing to see brethren dwelling together in unity; but it is not desirable to see God's truth set aside even for such a purpose.

One of the chief objects of the Christian Church is to be "the pillar and ground of the truth." Christianity brought not a service but truth to light. It placed before men's minds, dark and enlightened alike, certain great truths which it was necessary that all alike should know and believe; and the reception of these necessitated the rise of a new order of things. The love of this truth and its consequent promulgation took the place of service, alike in the temple of Jupiter and the Jewish synagogue. It arrested the current of men's thoughts, and gave them to see that it was not mere worship God required, but rather that they should repent of their evil works and embrace the Gospel of his Son, and walk in the ways of righteousness and truth. And so it caused the idolatrous Thessalonians "to turn from dumb idols to serve the living God, and to wait for his Son from heaven, even Jesus, who delivers us from the wrath to come."

Thus Christianity is based on the belief of the truth in order to eternal safety. It is a means whereby alone we may become acquainted with our true condition, present and prospective, in relation to God; and the system that lessens the importance of that fact, however pretentious, or however attractive in itself, is not of a right sort. The vagaries of many well-meaning men at the present time, regarding the folly, as they express it, of Christians living in the nineteenth century being bound by forms and doctrines of the first century, are traceable to the wide-spread fallacies that Christianity is a work accomplished whereas it is only as yet begun. And not until men are made to see this, and to apprehend the full scope of that salvation, shall we be freed from the schemes of those who would give us a temple service in lieu of the truths and hopes of the Gospel, as held by the early disciples. Our complaint is, not that men go too far back for their creed, but that they do not go far enough. The faith of the Gospel, as we take it, can never grow old or be improved by man; it must remain in its primal simplicity, till he who is its author and object, shall come again and faith give place to sight. Therefore is it essential that all who profess the faith of Christ should have their foundation, not in forms or in matters of taste, but in the word of truth.

To hear many persons talk on this subject nowadays, one might conclude it to be a matter of the supremest indifference what a man believes. Into such a condition of lawlessness have men drifted, that so long as an outward appearance of well-doing is preserved, all is supposed to be well.

The existence in a community of a large number of religious bodies may be taken as an index of religious life of a certain kind; it is not an unmixed evil; and where these are not based on trivial questions of expediency, matters of order, or modes of worship, they are good in a sense; for they are protests against the dull uniformity of indifference, and often are as bulwarks in defence of important truths which else, would be in danger of neglect.

It is on such grounds, that we as a community take our stand; and, though it is an oft-told story, yet it is well to familiarize our minds with the leading reasons for our isolation from other religious communities.

The matter, shortly told, is chiefly an adherence to the plain words of Scripture. We have laid it down as an axiom that the Bible is its own best interpreter; and that in all cases where the plain, obvious, and simple reading of the text harmonizes with its surroundings, and is consistent with reason and common sense, then that is to be taken as the meaning, and any departure from it we consider dangerous. It is on this principle that all the great realities of our religion have been fulfilled in the past; and in applying it to events yet to come, we only apply the same rule to the unfulfilled that is generally applied to that which has been fulfilled.

Following this course, then, we gather that God has determined to make for himself a name and a glory in the earth,—that the earth, which has been the scene of sin's ravages, shall be the place where sin shall be destroyed; and that the means through which this shall be accomplished is the establishment of a visible, tangible kingdom of righteousness on its surface, as, at once, the means and the end; and that in that kingdom shall be enjoyed the inheritance promised to the believer in Christ,—that honor and glory and eternal life which are his through the merits of his Redeemer.

The Scriptures that reveal such matters are numerous, and were it not for the commonly prevailing pernicious system of interpreting the Word of God, the simplest would have no difficulty in understanding it. But so uncertain is that system, and so unlike what men usually employ in any other case, that the, work is, for the most part, left in the hands of those who profess to teach it, with the result already noted,—that ignorance or misappropriation is general; and so we find that promises of good, which on their surface manifestably point to the people and land of Israel, are taken from their places and set down as part of a future history of a people who allow not even the remotest connection with either. Of such a class is this verse of the psalm we have read, "Glorious things are spoken of thee, thou city of God." A note in my Bible on this verse reads: "The future glory of the Church is here described." But is it not apparent that the psalmist is speaking of his own capital city, Jerusalem?

No other place than Zion is mentioned in the psalm, and it is often used to express the larger area of Jerusalem. There was the house of God, where dwelt the glory of God himself. It was the place which the tribes of Israel were taught to regard as the Holy City, and whither they went to pay their vows, and to worship the Lord their God. It was the place God had chosen for himself to dwell in.

At the time this psalm was written, it was not the city it afterwards became in the hands of Solomon, when the temple was built, with all its magnificence; but it was beautifully situated, so that even at that time it could be said, "Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is Mount Sion." Some have thought this psalm had its fulfillment then. But we must do more than read what we may suppose to have been written at the time to ascertain to what the psalmist alludes; we must consider that David was a prophet, and when he thus spoke of the glories of Sion, it was as much expressive of what would yet be as of what had already been. He could look down the long vista of time and could trace how events would cluster around that sacred spot. The foreground of the picture might be darkened by the clouds of man's defection. The fleeting episodes of calamity and misfortune would doubtless be present to his eye; but they would all pass away as the shadow of a cloud o'er the smiling landscape, revealing the city beloved, the city of God, bright and fair, sparkling in the beams of the glory of God, the joy of the whole earth.

Now these words we regard as something more than a patriot's wish. David was eminently a patriot. He loved his country, and did much to make it great and respected. He could look back to the time when the nation was small and contemptible; but now it was feared by the surrounding nations, and he felt that whilst it were the pulsations of a stronger life. Yet there was more than this in his utterance. It was doubtless a word given him to say in behalf of the faithful in Israel,—a note of hope and joy inspired by heaven, indicative of the purpose of Jehovah with his people when it would be the city of the Great King.

Four thousand years after these words were written, we are privileged to inquire how much of truth there was in them; and we are sure that whoever honestly considers the matter, will be impressed with the reality of God's word. Think of the insignificance of the city where the prophet first spoke. Think of its material and political indignificance ever since. Compared with the cities of many other states and their respective probabilities of coming greatness, it was as nothing. Egypt was a great power in the world, and some of her mighty works are world-wonders to this day. Assyria and Greece have left a name high in the world's estimation, —they were mighty empires, which for ages held the influence of their power over many peoples. And Rome, "the mistress of the world," how great was she? The invincible, the iron kingdom, whose power was felt in the remotest parts; in whose dominion Palestine itself was but the smallest possession. Did not the prophet see this when he uttered these words of panegyric over Jerusalem's greatness? Did he not see that Egypt was for greater, and that it my would one day trample her as dust beneath her feet? Yes; but the vision does not stagger his faith. He sees behind the darkest cloud, and steadily regards the purpose of Jehovah that fails not. God has chosen this city for himself; and what are all the efforts of man when put in the scale against him? Notwithstanding all the clamor and turmoil among nations in their lust for power, and that men forget or despise the little nation that holds its own in the land given it of God, there is a power there that shall make itself known when the hand shall be feeble and the spirit broken of all those mighty people that in turn have ruled the world. In full view of all this greatness, it is still true that "glorious things are spoken of thee, thou city of God."

But how shall we determine its greatness? It has sent forth no conquering hands to cause men to tremble at its name. It has reared no magnificent structures that have excited the admiration of successive generations and caused them to exte' its skill. It has not given to the world works of art, or inventions that compel men to remember with pleasure or gratitude the people who originated them. Palestine has not been able even to save herself from the hands of that destroyer, Time. Her cities are lost among their own heaps, and her remaining population is homeless and poor. Yet a power slumbers in her ruins. Like Samson of old, who slew more at his death than he did in his life, this people have made a deeper impression on the world by their destruction, so to speak, than they did by their prosperous existence. Where is the land that has not heard of Israel? Her cities,—her heroes,—her observances,—her battles,—her deeds are in our mouths, and on the lips of the entire world, familiar as household words. We identify ourselves with this people in a way we cannot do with any other. And the more we consider the circumstances of their case, the more are we astonished at the results of this people's influence in the world.

A people no more numerous at the best than the population of two or three of our largest cities; born in slavery and matured in adversity; they have compelled the world to bow before them in admiration and wonder. They have given us a religion, and a God. At their hands we have received the Scriptures of truth, that reveal to us all we know of a future life. These are great results, and no man could be warranted, humanly speaking, in anticipating them at the time when this psalm was written. They are results of which any nation might be proud; they are such as no other people have ever produced.

Yet, however much honor these facts bring to the name and history of Israel as a people, they fall short of fulfilling all that is included in "the glorious things that are spoken of this City of God." I regard these words as indicative not so much of glory to the people as to the city itself.

The people are distinguished by many admirable features; but it is not because of these qualities that honor surrounds to this city in any particular manner. Our own country has distinguished herself in many ways, and her people are characterized by many admirable qualities Yet we sing not the praises of any particular city on that account. No doubt, we all regard with affection the country, and particularly the place, where our lot has been cast,—the scenes of our youth, where linger the memories of happy incidents and youthful frolics. But that is purely an individual matter. Here, however, we have a particular statement regarding the city itself,—Sion, the City of God.

As well find a living man without breath, as a living Christian without prayer.

From Brother Bond.

Do the scriptures give us a rule for buying and selling? Yes; but it cuts very close on the old man of the flesh. All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for this is the law and the prophets. How very few who, even of those professing the one faith and are expecting the soon coming of the master, are doing business upon the just and honest rule given by the Master Himself. Be not deceived. God is not mocked, what a man sows that shall he also reap. How lamentable, that most of the buying and selling is done after custom of the Gentile world; and not after the rule given by Christ; how distressing to hear them without, unathematize in the most fearful manner, a professed believer in the gospel for, as they say; having been overreached in a trade. The men of the world are not all liars, or dishonest, or fools. If there was not a reason for such things we should not so often be pained to hearing them. How slowly we feel when we have made a good bargain, as the saying is, and the largest end of the stick. How often in trading the men and women use just a little bit of the artful, giving an overestimate, or a false coloring, or not telling the whole truth. If we miss the kingdom, there will be a good reason for it, and that reason will be manifest; no blame can be attached to any body but ourselves. What more could he have done for his vineyard that he has not done? It is a money loving age, and men resort to almost any kind of procedure to become suddenly and powerfully rich; for money is power. Happy indeed would it be if our brethren (some of them) had not tried the fearful experiment of leaving an honest, legitimate business, and going into also, to engage in an unjustifiable enterprise or speculation. Well, I am going to work for the Lord after I get such an amount of money; but, alas! they fade away, and we hear nothing more from them, or the Lord's work. What a fearful scene will the judgment reveal; how will men stand aghast when their works are made manifest.

Are we justifiable in taking a good, big slice from an uncircumcised Gentile as from those of the body? The Savior makes no difference. "As ye would that all men," is the rule. Brother, did you use the Savior's rule in publishing that book, or in buying that piece of land, of your neighbor, or employing that poor man to dig for you for a less sum than would buy bread for his family, because it is the custom or manner of doing business? You may plead that custom makes laws; but it does not do away or annul the law of Christ. Whatsoever was written before time, was written for our instruction on whom the ends of the age has come. St. Paul says, "Do good unto all men, especially to the household of faith. That is just what we believe, and would to our heavenly Father, and to the honor of our most holy Christianity, that the rule of Christ, and the injunction of his holy apostles, were more carefully or strictly practiced. How my poor heart was grieved when a poor brother said to me, "I have done all that brother's rough jobbing which afford but little profit, but when he has a good job he gives it to an unbeliever." Are these things so? Have I exaggerated or over drawn the sad picture? I have not intended to do so. I do not state these things upon hearsay; they are within my own personal knowledge. I would fain spread the mantle of charity over poor fallen humanity; but warnings and admonitions must be given, lest others fall into the same fatal snare. Have faith in God; and without faith it is impossible to please God. He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and he is a rewarder of those that diligently seek him. Have we tested our faith by confidingly following the opening Providence of God, or must we have somebody who has the greenbacks to underwrite for him? It will pay well to carefully look this matter over. Have we reflected upon what the infidel must think and say about the inconsistent faith and practice of men professing to be looking for the coming of the great God and our Savior, Jesus Christ? How different the effect, did we carefully practice what we profess, and thus show to an apostate church, and a perishing world, that there is a class of called out and chosen ones that dare to be consistent. Dearly beloved, I have written thus plainly, purely from a sense of duty; if there is an appearance of severity, it is not intentionally so. These things have long pressed me down like a cart beneath its sheaves till procrastination or forbearance ceases to be a virtue. I have written but a tithe of what is recorded in the Scriptures of truth. Receive them as coming from one who has left all for the whole truth as it is in Jesus. Surely these are perilous times; not in the way of much persecution. The treacherous calm is more to be dreaded by the skilful mariner, than the howling tornado. What I say unto you I say unto all—watch Jesus.

NEWELL BOND.

My Sixtieth Birthday.

Now sixty years of life are passed;
How very short they seem;
How true that life is but a span.
Our days are but a dream.

But though my days so quickly fly,
My hope has power to cheer:
It rests upon the word of God.
That word to me is dear.

Its light upon my pathway shines,
A Lamp to guide my feet;
A Rod afraid to chastise me on Through dangers that I meet.

It tells me of redemption's plan,
How Jesus died to save;
And bring to us eternal life;—
Though lifeless in the grave.

It tells me of a glorious land
That's free from every snare;
Where we can rest with Christ our head;
And in his glory share.

What glorious promises we find
Writ on the sacred page:
Yes, Kings, and Priests, to God we'll be
In that eternal age.

Warning.

What the clock—It striketh ten:
Hear the alarum—fools and sages!
Clocking out the lives of men—
Marching down the road of ages.

Soon the eleventh hour will chime,
Stilling all the wheels of men—
Let new load of life and time—
Wind the clock—it striketh ten.

The Spirit.

My object in this paper is to show the meaning of the word Spirit in a few of its applications.

It's primary sense is "wind, air in motion, to breathe." But it is not always used in its primary sense. It has a great variety of applications. As it is used, it is a very ambiguous term. It is used in more than sixty different senses in the Bible. It is used to represent God, and Christ, and the angels, and the resurrected saints. It is used to represent almost every passion, and every emotion, and every trait in human character. Hence the meaning of the word must always depend on the use or application made of it. The sense of the word Spirit can never be determined in any passage by the word alone. I will now consider a few of its uses and applications.

1. When applied to God.—"God is a Spirit, He is called an eternal Spirit; and they that worship Him, must worship Him in Spirit and in truth." The word Spirit, in these passages, represents the whole object to be worshiped. It means just what God means. It includes the whole being of God; His body, in the image of which Adam was made out of dust; His person, of which Christ was the express image. The word Spirit, when thus applied to God, means His whole Spiritual being. This is the largest sense in which the word can be used.

2. When applied to Christ.—"The Lord is that Spirit." "He was made a quickening Spirit." In these passages, the word Spirit represents His Spiritual, incorruptible, heavenly, and glorious body. It means His whole Spiritual being. It means just what the Lord, or the last Adam, when applied to Christ means.

3. When applied to Angels.—The angel of the Lord that spake unto Phillip, saying, arise and go down to Gaza; was the Spirit that said unto him, go near, and join thyself unto this chariot; and the Spirit of the Lord that caught away Phillip after he had baptized the eunuch. And the "angel of God which spake to Cornelius, saying, send men to Joppa, and call for one Simon whose surname is Peter;" was the Spirit which said unto Peter, "three men seek thee, arise and go with them nothing doubting; for I have sent them." The angels are Spirits. The word Spirit when applied to angel, means just what angel means. It signifies his whole being, including such bodies as partook of Abraham's fatted calf.

4. When applied to the resurrected Saints.—That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is Spirit. There is a natural body and there is a Spiritual body. The word Spirit when applied to resurrected saints, represents the whole being of the saints, including their Spiritual body which has been fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body. A Spiritual body or being is a Spirit, as God, and Christ, and the angels are Spirits.

5. The Spirit of God, the Spirit of Christ.—We read of the Spirit of God, and the Spirit of Christ. The word Spirit in such passages, represent the disposition of the being to which it belongs, or it is the agent which proceeds from such being, by which his will is made known, or accomplished, and is always dependent upon on the being from which it emanates.

6. When applied to what goes out of man at his death.—"Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the Spirit to God who gave it, as it was." The word Spirit in this passage, and in passages like this, means that which God gave, and that which returns to God at the death of the body. That which God gave, and that which returns to Him are the same. It is called by different words, but they are all from the same original words, which mean "wind," "to blow," "to breathe." God gave to Adam "the breath of life," "and to all life and breath." And that without which the body cannot live is called both "Spirit and breath." That which God gave is called breath of life, life and breath, and Spirit or breath. Without this breath or Spirit, the body is dead. Then that by which we live is what God gave. It is the breath or the Spirit of life. When we die, this breath or Spirit of life returns to God who gave it. That which returns to God who gave it, is also called by different words. That which went to God in the flood, is called the breath of life, and in the margin the breath of the Spirit of life. In Job xxvii. 3, it is called "my breath, and the Spirit of God in my nostrils." In xxxiv 14, it is called "His Spirit and His breath." In Psa. civ. 29, "God takes away their breath." In Psa. cxlvi. 4, that which goes to God is called "breath." In Eccl. iii. 19-21, where it is said man and beast die alike, that which goes to God is called breath once, and Spirit twice. In our text, that which goes to God is called Spirit. In the above, that which returns to God who gave it is called breath, and breath of life six times, and it is called Spirit, Spirit of life, Spirit of God in my nostrils, six times, but the sense is the same. The same original word is sometimes translated breath, and sometimes Spirit. The breath or the Spirit of life by which man lives is all that God gave—the breath or the Spirit of life is all that returns to God when he dies. In all such passages, the word Spirit means the breath or the Spirit of life.

7. This Spirit is not the responsible Man.—When the breath of life in Adam returned to God, he died. When, in the time of the flood, the breath of the Spirit of life of all flesh returned to God who gave it, all flesh in whose nostrils was the breath of the Spirit of life, died. When God takes away the breath of all flesh, they die and return to dust. When man's breath goeth forth to God, he returneth to his earth, in that very day his thoughts perish. When the breath or Spirit of man and of beast returns to God who gave it, then the dust will return to the earth as it was. Stephen said, "Lord Jesus, receive my Spirit," but Stephen fell asleep, and devout men carried him to his burial. The Savior said, "into thy hand I commit my Spirit," but he died, and was buried in Joseph's new tomb. David said, "into thy hand I commend my Spirit," but Peter said, "David is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us to this day. He is not ascended into the heavens." Thus, in no case is the Spirit that goes to God, the man. In no case, did the man ascend to heaven when his Spirit returned to God. But in every case the man, who was made of dust, and who is dust returned to dust again.

8. This Spirit is not alive, or intelligent, or responsible.—The Spirit is the means by which we live, but it is not itself alive. It is the means by which we become intelligent, but the Spirit has no intelligence. It is the means by which we become responsible, but the Spirit has no responsibility. It is not affirmed any where in the Bible, that the Spirit, of which we are speaking, is either alive, or intelligent, or responsible. It is not subject to moral law. It has no promises. It has no threatenings. It is neither praiseworthy, nor blameworthy. It is to the man what steam is to the engine. But it has no possible influence in determining the character of what we do. It gives us power, but it has nothing to do in directing that power.

The breath or the spirit of life which God gave us, came out of God's great reservoir of the breath or the spirit of life, which he prepared, to give life to the animal and vegetable world. When we die, this breath or spirit returns to God in His great reservoir of His breath of life, as it was before.

As the spirit had no personal identity before it was given to us, it will have none when it returns to God. As the spirit had no intelligence before it was given to us, it will have none when it returns to God. As the spirit had no responsibility before it was given to us, it will have none when it returns to God. For it is said, "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it, as it was."

JOEL A. SIMONDS.

A pretended zeal for that which is good often covers a real malice against that which is better.

As faith, of all the graces, most honors God, so Christ, of all the graces, puts most honor on faith

As Christ has not a house of his own while he lived, so he had not a grave of his own when he died.

A Riot to Those Who Promise Life to the Wicked.

"Because with lies ye have made the heart of the righteous sad, whom I have not made sad; and strengthened the hands of the wicked, that he should not return from his wicked way, by promising him life."

It is not hard to define a wicked man, given over though he may be, with all the appurtenances of wealth and power. His characteristics are distinctly enumerated in the Bible, as one who despises instruction, rejoices to do evil, sets at naught the counsel of the Lord, and will none of his reproofs. Who will not through pride seek after God, will not regard the works of the Lord, nor the operation of his hands, puts the judgments of the Lord far above out of his sight, fills his mouth full of cursing, and deceit and fraud; lies in wait for the poor, murders the innocent, and yet says, "God has forgotten, he will never see it."

God may seem to forget, but it is only because he is long-suffering; not willing that any should perish. So great is his desire that men should make good use of the opportunities of probation, that he utters a sharp rebuke to those, who with lies, strengthen the hands of the wicked, by promising them life. He sets his face against deceiver and deceived alike, to cut them off, and utterly destroy them from the midst of his people. Now, what life was held out to evil doers, by those false prophets of ancient Israel, it is not hard to determine.

They could not have deceived their devotees, by promising to lengthen out the present state of existence, for the folkey of such a promise would have been at once apparent. There is but one life that is the subject of promise; but one that is held out as a reward. To teach corrupt and bloody men, that they, in common with the righteous, have a right to that life, is so abominable to the Lord, that he heaps the abhorrence and curses of nations upon the man who so teaches; but brings delight and a blessing upon him who rebukes them. To make a man believe he is righteous—notwithstanding his evil deeds; is to give him in prospect the rewards of the righteous, and so strengthen his hands in working iniquity, that he will not return from his wicked way.

Just as it was in the days of those lokatrous prophets, just so is it now. Believe what you please and live as you please; call the Bible a fable, the resurrection a myth; assign the great facts of creation to the chance condensation of fire-mists, precipitation of sediment from primeval oceans, or impossible nebular hypothesis; deny God's right to eternal life the heathen, or to punish individuals; question the morality of his servants, and the justice of his laws; his miracle-working power and the veracity of his word, yet it will be all right with you in the end. God, it is true, has made conditions, and framed laws, to regulate the conduct of men, has fixed the death penalty to broken statutes and offered the reward of endless life to the doers of his commandments, but they doesn't matter; he made those conditions, and he'll take care of your future, whether you conform to them or not.

Such is the belief, and such the logical conclusion which is reached by many of the pulpit orators of the present day. Orthodox, Unitarian and Universalist, are alike guilty. They promise life alike to the doers and to the violators of law. It may be life in misery, but it is life nevertheless, and on even so false a hope does the wicked man venture, of somehow, or sometime, bettering his condition. He may suffer for a season, but even that is improbable, and, if he should, then will come a time, when he can elude or escape that punishment as he escapes the penalties of civil law in this life. Ones prove to him, that, one of Christ, there is no hope for man; no future life given, but as a reward for obedience to law and you take away the strength of his hands from the wicked, and give him an incentive to turn from his evil ways, that he may keep the commandments of the Lord and observe his statute, to do them.

The old lie of Satan, proclaimed so long and so artfully from our pulpits, in its bitter fruits, is indeed making the hearts of the righteous sad. They behold the giant structure of spiritualism reared upon it, and none with intense pain, the crowds who are seeking for rest in its refuge of lies. And with deeper sorrow still, they see those who once professed allegiance to God, fleeing for very terror, from the horrid dogmas it begets, to find a place in the ranks of infidelity. Does it not then become the lovers of unadulterated Bible truth, to be more than ever zealous in their endurance to spread the light, that some may be saved? Those who will not hear, must of course, be turned unto fables. From such, we can expect nothing but reorn and contumely, yet we rejoice in that we are counted worthy to suffer for the name of Christ and on behalf of his Word. We can endure to be called "imps of Satan," when we remember that nearly the same epithet was once applied to our Master. And rejoicing, with exceeding gladness, when men say all manner of evil against us falsely for his name's sake, we look forward to the great reward laid up in heaven for us, to be given at his appearing and Kingdom, and with God's truth boldly, still battle against the hosts of error. God has exalted his word above all his name. We know it will not return unto him void. Some will lend a willing ear, some will honor God by believing and obeying his Word. So, we must continue to work, and to warn. Our garments at least, must be clean from the blood of our fellow men. We cannot tell them, "they are a part of God, and must necessarily live forever," for God has not told them so. We cannot promise the wicked life, for God has not promised them life.

We cannot bring God's curse upon ourselves by justifying evil-doers. God has not justified them. But he has said, "Woe to the wicked for it shall be ill with him, for the reward of his hands shall be given him;" "God shall destroy him forever, he shall take him away and pluck him out of his dwelling place and root him out of the land of living," for "he that pursueth evil pursueth it to his own death."

Let those, who with lies, are strengthening the hands of the wicked, beware!

Correspondence.

DEAR BRO:

I seize a moment during my brief stay in this city, to speak of the band of believers, under the pastoral care of George A. Brown, a much beloved and able young brother. I had the pleasure of preaching in his place, as he had been suffering a temporary illness. The church is in faith, very much in agreement with the doctrinal teaching represented by the RESTITUTION, and I shall recommend the paper to their notice particularly.

I wish to speak also of the earnest labors of Brother Louis Reimer, in seeking to introduce the teachings of God's Word to the German population of this country. Brother Reimer is self denying and faithful, and his efforts are certainly worthy to be encouraged and sustained. He is publishing a monthly paper, The Bible Searcher, and is also printing and distributing tracts in the German language, designed expressly for the German people. I hope he may be assisted in this good work. He is in need of pecuniary aid, and is anxious to send his tracts wherever they may do good, and would be glad of any enlargement of the list of subscribers to his paper. I hope his excellent labors may be encouraged by the readers of the RESTITUTION. His address is 639 Eighth St., Philadelphia, Pa.

I am on my way South to meet my wife on her return from Florida, and may spend a month or so in preaching in North Carolina. By and by I may send you a report of my labor and experience there.

Yours truly,

CLINTON COLEGROVE.

PHILADELPHIA, March 19.

Gleanings.

Bro. Amos Sanford writes: Came from Indianapolis to Paris, Ill., March 31. Roads very muddy, and we commenced meeting in the school house with a few hearers. The interest, however, increased, and with better roads the house was crowded every night. Bro. D. A. Richards, his wife, Rachel, and Bro. John Henson became obedient to lovers of the Gospel. At 11 o'clock, on the last day, I was with them; the ekklesia met at Bro. Henson's house and commemorated the death of our Lord, following the scriptures as nearly as we understood them and the circumstances would permit. Brotherly love prevailed. Had a good hearing at night, and took the parting hand with a hope of meeting again at the general conference to be held July 27th, and over the following Sunday, and if not then, when the kingdom comes. "Even so come Lord Jesus."

Bro. J. M. Stephenson first preached at this place, and his labor is like bread cast upon the waters. It is now, after many days, being seen. Bro. J. S. Hatch, and others, have practiced here also, but not in vain. Brethren, do not be discouraged when you see no immediate fruit. Remember it is God who gives the increase. It is our duty to sow the seed which is "the Word of the kingdom." Am now holding meeting at Pesotum, Ill., from whence I go to Prairie City, McDonough county, Ill., the home of my childhood.

An important question: are few or many saved? but a more important one is, shall I be one of them?

All the pleasures of sense soon surfeit, but never satisfy: those of holiness satisfy, but never surfeit.

An obligation to do evil binds to repentance, but not to performance.

Missionary Work.

As many brethren have expressed a desire that I should report through the paper the work done while laboring for the committee on Evangelization, I will now hit the following:

From Jan. 1st to April 1st, 1870.
Boys out	75
Discourses made	73
Additions from the world	17
" from the Christian Church	13
" others, some with, and others without homes	9
Total additions	39
Remuneration on the field	$63.00
" Missionary committee	35.00

I have visited, in doing this work, six different counties, to-wit: Warren, Kosciusko, Wabash, Stark, St. Joseph and Marshall.

We will remark to the brethren, and especially to the older and well disciplined congregations that if the work is continued through June, July, and part of August, reaching till the annual conference,—omitting May on account of busy season—that some more funds will be necessary. Then let the congregations at Goodland, Rensselaer, West Lebanon, Plymouth, Antioch, Argos and other places, bear this in mind, and arrange to keep the work moving. People are ready and willing to hear, and calls for help are coming in.

Brother J. M. Stephenson's address is 642 West Washaren St., Chicago.

The Lord willing a general conference of the brethren and sisters of the One Faith will be held in the grove near Brother Thomas A. Wood's residence, about five miles southeast of Paris, Edgar county, Ill., on Thursday, July 28th, 1870, and continue over the following Sunday. A special invitation to all the preaching brethren to be present is extended.

The object is to have a general assembly or church of the members of the church of God for the purpose of co-uniting with each other, and to unite our efforts in the work of contending "earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints."

We hope to meet others in the vicinity of the meeting are making ample provisions for the entertainment of all who come. To those of us who live at a distance makes a little sacrifice to attend, and enjoy a good meeting where brotherly love, as set forth in the Bible, reigns.

Those coming from abroad will write to Thomas A. Wood, George J. Humphreys, or George Henson, Paris, Ill., for further particulars.

I cease labor at the special request of the brethren.

THE AMERICAN CYCLOPEDIA.

A Comprehensive Library in Itself.

A Great National Enterprise in which every American may Take Pride.

Published by D. APPLETON & CO., 549, 551, Broadway, N. Y.

The Cyclopedia, now in course of publication, is entirely rewritten, and appears with about 4,000 maps and illustrations. To be completed in sixteen volumes of 800 pages each. Fourteen volumes now ready.

In the experience of book making and selling, this work is without a parallel. With the multiplication of steam presses, the publishers are still unable to meet the demand.

The sale has already reached over 750,000 volumes, and this in panic times! The demand for the work is but fairly commenced; the orders are largely multiplying and the applications are that the sales of the year for 1870 will greatly surpass those of the previous year.

Thus the most sanguine expectations of the publishers are more than realized.

The publishers again repeat to the public that no expense has been spared in the literary, editing, or publishing departments of the American Cyclopedia.

The cost will be more than $500,000 to prepare the sixteen volumes for the press.

SOLD ONLY BY SUBSCRIPTION.

Delivered, expressage free, in any part of the United States.

Price in Cloth $3 per volume; Sheep, $4; Half Morocco, $5; Full Turkey, $6.

Rest.

"This is not your rest." Micah ii. 10. "There remaineth a rest." Heb. iv. 9.

O there never will be rest,
On a troubled sea,
Storms drive the foaming crest,
On the doubtful lee,
Nations, o'er all the earth,
Fond of peace, a painful dearth,
Pangs and throes, of some great birth,
Fill the weary time.

Men o'ercome with much belief,
Wear a dark veil,
Turning ever for relief,
To help sure to fail,
Long ceased to know their God,
They have felt affliction's rod,
In famine, war, and woe, they plod,
Tyrants have ruled.

True seers from conjurers,
Who shall divide?
Who call earth's wanderers?
Who true to guide?
Trumpet calls from Mecca come,
India's hordes seek Dramah's close.
Hoary prestige calls to Rome,
All flocks astray.

To every yea, of God,
Men have a no:
Contravention to their blood,
In unctuous flow,
And fanatics, of every mind,
Are heaven's saints, of every kind,
And the general right to find,
Is the general wrong.

But there'll come an iron rule,
Kind, just and true,
Holding madmen, and the fool,
Of Gentile and Jew,
Spontaneities crossed out,
Bewildering thought, and wicked doubt,
In men's hearts the lion stout,
Feel the keeper's vice.

Earth's "Blessed POTENTATE,"
"His times shall show,"
Jesse's House, in Royal state
"THE BRANCH" will bestow,
Then Alaric and Charlemagne,
Must abdicate, and no more reign,
And earth, stability attain
Wrong rule no more.

I, filled with anxious thought
Early, to find
How redemption might be sought,
But alas! how blind,
Taught terrestrial joys, but go,
To prelude eternal woe,
How O, can I safely know?
Trembling I cried.

Long lured was I, by a voice,
Exultant, in its sound,
Hope rose and cried rejoice,
Glory now, the hour is found.
But some prophets, voice but dreams,
Fountains pure, join muddy streams,
Oft, the wrong, most righteous seems,
In reverend attire.

Thrice, blessed are the ears,
And blessed, are the eyes,
Which hear and see, from Judah's seers,
No tolling parables,
Who from their mountains ever preach
Words, that o'er the ages reach,
Not in parabolic speech,
Shewing the Christ.

"Who also waited for,
The Kingdom,"—says the Word,
Joseph, crowned with Christian love,
Entombing the Lord.
Death will quite unfellow us,
But, it cannot quell in us,
Trust, in Power Imperious,
Over our inert clay.

A. W. BUTTON.

Son of God.

In my former articles, I think it has been conclusively shown from the Scriptures (1) that there is but one God, the Father, and one Lord Jesus Christ, as against the assumption of Trinitarians that there are God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost. See 1 Cor. viii. 6; John xvii. 3; Gal. iii. 20; Eph. iv. 6. And (2) that God the Father,—and not Christ the Son, as alleged,—created the heavens and the earth. See Gen i. 1; Psa. cii. 24–25; Isa. xlii. 5: xl. 28; Mal. ii. 10; Mark ii. 19; Rev. iv. 11. And (3) that Christ, as the divine Son of God and the human son of Mary, was inferior to, and dependent upon the Father for all power and authority; and so far from being the Creator, He is only "the heir of all things;" and so far from being the supreme God, He suffered and died according to the Scriptures. See Matt. xxviii. 18; xi. 27; John v. 27. "My Father is greater than I."

And having in our last article, as we think, turned the heavy battery of the great fortress of Trinitarians, against them, by showing that in the use of the term "world" John did not refer to the Son of God, but to God the Father It may be deemed a work of supererogation on our part to attack the weaker positions, but, nevertheless, we now propose to notice them.

We first remark, if the supposition that certain passages, to which we shall refer, teach that the Son of God existed as a personal being anterior to His conception and birth, should prove correct, it does not consequently follow that He existed from the beginning as the second person in the trinity. In order to sustain this position, Trinitarians must not only prove His pre-existence, but also His co-existence with the Father. They may do this when they can show that a son exis. before he is begotten by his father, but not before.

Again, if it could be conclusively shown that God created all things by Jesus Christ instead of for Him, as we believe, it would not thereby follow that the Son of God is the second person in the Trinity. For God,—whether you consider Him three or one, divided or undivided—is the uncreated Jehovah. In other words, God nor any fractional part of Him (?) was ever begotten. Then it logically follows that the Son of God, being begotten by the Father at some period in the history of creation, cannot possibly be the second person in the Trinity.

While it is true there are some passages in the Scripture that seem to teach the pre-existence of the Son of God, and many Christians thus believe, who discard the doctrine of the Trinity, we are, nevertheless, very firm in our belief that there is not one passage which clearly enunciates such a truth, if truth it be. The fact that the Old Testament writers who refer to the Messiah, never speak of Him as a being in existence at the time they wrote, but as one who was to exist, or be manifested in the future, should have considerable weight in deciding the point.

Moses first recorded what God said to the serpent, that the seed of the woman, Christ, should bruise the serpent's head; that is, destroy him, as Paul says, (Heb. ii. 14,) and that he (the serpent) should bruise His (Christ's) heel, referring to His crucifixion.

In His covenant with Abraham, God promised that in his (Abraham's) seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed; and Paul says (Gal. iii. 16), that Abraham's seed is Christ. Isaiah says, ix. 14: "Behold a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel;"—that "he shall be despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrow, and acquainted with grief—was wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities." Micah says, v. 2: "But, thou Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall come forth unto me that is to be ruler in Israel; whose goings forth have been of old, from everlasting." We here have a prophecy that is supposed to refer to and prove the existence of Christ from the days of eternity; and if we have such proof in the Old Testament, we have it here. To say nothing about the impossibility of Christ existing as already shown, we will look this prophecy square in the face, and see what we find.

But first let us refer to the words of the apostle Peter i. 1: six. 21, and see if they do not afford us light in construing the language of Micah. He says: "But with the precious blood of Christ, as a lamb without blemish and without spot; who was foreordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifested in these times for you, who by him do believe in God that raised him from the dead, and gave him glory."

This language of the apostle implies that, although He "was foreordained before the foundation of the world,' Christ was not then manifested, "but was manifested in these (their) times." If this be true, then He only existed in the purpose of God; and in the plan of salvation as the "lamb slain from the foundation of the world."

If we now return to the prophecy of Micah, I think we shall perceive, in the light of the above, the true meaning of the unjust language of the prophet,—"whose goings forth have been of old, from everlasting." Or, as Peter would say, "whose goings forth were foreordained of old. from everlasting, and manifested in these times."

There is nothing in the original to correspond to the words "have been" which were supplied by the translators; and if we leave these out, and substitute the words of Peter, "were foreordained," we have the true idea of the prophet, which is not only in harmony with the apostle, but with the whole Bible.

His goings forth doubtless refer to His going forth from the Father, or "out of God," (as Christ himself expressed it) in His first advent, including His personal ministry on the earth; and also refer to His second advent, including all His work in connection with the judgment.

Then as we examine some of the passages already referred to, let us remember that the Old Testament nowhere asserts the pre-existence of the Son of God, much less its co-existence with the Father.

The words of Christ: "I am the living bread that came down from heaven;" "I came forth from the Father," "came out of God," etc., do not prove His personal pre-existence, but only His heavenly origin.

But it is supposed that passages like the following, very clearly enunciate his pre-existence: "Before Abraham was I am." "And now Father glorify thou me with thine own self, with the glory I had with thee before the world was." "For thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world." But when we remember that the apostle says, (Rom. iv. 17,) "God who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were;" and the words of the Revelator, xiii. 8, where He calls Christ "the lamb slain from the foundation of the world," we can see that these passages, and such as these, may be understood as having reference only to the existence of Christ in the purpose of God and in the plan of salvation which, with Christ, "was verily foreordained before the foundation of the world, but was (not) manifested unto us in these times."

And when we also remember that with the uncreated Jehovah, who sees the end from the beginning, there is no past and no future, but one eternal present, we can see how Christ, the representative of His Father on earth, or God with us, who was sent to do His Father's will and work, could truthfully employ the language quoted in the same already explained.

How often are the words of Christ to Philip,—"He that hath seen me hath seen the Father"—flippantly quoted, being carefully taken from their connection and forced into a Trinitarian service in such a way as to contradict the more frequent sayings of Christ, and the most positive words of John who says in his gospel, and in one of his epistles,—"No man hath seen God at any time."

It is very evident that John did not understand the words of Christ to Philip, as Trinitarians do. But let us look at these notable words, with the Master's own explanation. John xiv. 7–10:—"If ye had known me, ye should have known my Father also; and from henceforth ye know Him, and have seen Him." Philip saith unto Him, "Lord, show us the Father and it sufficeth us." Jesus saith unto him, "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? he that hath seen me hath seen the Father, and how sayest thou then, show us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me? the words that I speak unto you [whence I say, he that hath seen me hath seen the Father;] I speak not of myself, [as though I were the Father] but the Father that dwelleth in me: He doeth the works." "For I can of mine own self do nothing." "But I have a greater witness than that of John: for the works which the Father hath given me to finish [and hath given me power to do] the same works that I do, bear witness of me that the Father hath sent me. And the Father himself which [I am? no, but which] sent me (for "I am not come of myself, but He sent me,") hath borne witness of me. Ye have neither heard His voice at any time, nor seen His shape."—John v. 36–37.

So by letting Christ explain His own language, and the Scriptures themselves, we find truth and harmony.

"Earnestly Contend for the Faith."

In the writings of Jude to the called ones (3d verse) we find him exhorting them to "earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered to the saints."

He does not teach us to strive for a faith, our faith, any faith, or no faith at all, just as it seems best to us, but calls upon us to earnestly contend for the faith. A definite, a unit, faith. There is but one faith spoken of in the Scriptures. Paul declares there is but one Lord, one faith, and one baptism. Eph. iv. 5. As well might we argue a plurality of Lords as a plurality of Bible faiths.

Paul also teaches that without faith it is impossible to please God. Heb. xi. 6. We see, then, at a glance, the great importance of possessing the one faith.

But what is faith? "Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." Heb. xi. 1. Having the one faith, we will then hope for those things to which that faith points, and not to something else. There being but the one faith, it can shadow forth but one hope, and but one is spoken of. Eph. iv. 4.

Again, it is apparent that we should have the right faith, that a right hope may be the result. To what does this faith relate? Paul says, in Phil. i. 27, it is the faith of the Gospel, and exhorts the brethren to stir "together—not separate—for the faith of the Gospel, and Jude tells us to earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints.

But the first question which here presents itself to our minds is, How are we to strive or contend for this unit faith? Believing, as we do, the great and fundamental doctrines of the Bible—which the faith of the Gospel points, inspiring us with the one hope, carrying us forward by faith to the time of reward, pointing us to the home of the redeemed, mapping out to us the glories yet to be realized by the people of God and the nations of earth in the coming ages. When we know and understand many of the great promises pointing to those things, can we earnestly contend for the faith in the great truths by smothering them in our bosoms, placing them in our pockets, and behind our backs, as it were, hobbling them as private property, and, perhaps, become a teacher for those who repudiate and deny all of the teachings of the prophets, Christ and the apostles, they leaving behind them a parting benediction to earnestly contend for the same?

But could we not adopt such a course and yet not deny the great truths? Could we not expatiate upon such questions as no one disputes or denies? Were we to allude to points of difference, could we not do so in a way that would create no dissatisfaction with those we address who believe not, and thereby drift along with the tide of popular opinion, receiving the approbation of the passing multitude? Can we? If it is it—applause of men we seek, need we murmur should that be all we receive for our labor? But by such a course do we not keep back a portion of God's word? and, by so doing may we not, like Ananias and Sapphira, be condemned for the part withheld? A kind of a lukewarm religion would be the result, and all such God declares he will spue out of his mouth.

Can we fulfill Jude's injunction by doing thus? Should our conscience accuse, "God is greater." Was this the manner of Paul's teaching? Was it because of such a course he received forty stripes save one? That the prison doors were closed upon him? Was it for such a course that Paul was brought before Agrippa bound with fetters? No. Such a course would never bring persecution to any one, or insure to us the crown of life promised to all those who are faithful, and for which Paul yet waits. His persecution fell upon him because of his faithfulness, to which he alludes in 2 Tim. iv. 6–8. It was because he dared to "declare all the council of God." Not a part of it. Looking to God for his reward, and not to man. In no other way can we obey Jude's injunction than by following Paul's bold and fearless manner of teaching. But while we are commanded to contend for the faith once delivered to the saints, never com; reconcile it in any way for the upbuilding of errors, the praise of men, for a high sounding name, friends or foes—we should first be fully persuaded we have the truth, before we contend for the truth of our position.

When this point is fully established the next great question to be solved is the manner in which the warfare should be conducted.

Are we to contend for the faith by slaying by the spirit of our mouth all who do not see as we see, or understand? upbraiding them because of their short-sightedness and lack of common understanding, because they cannot see with us? thereby exhibiting towards them a spirit of envy and hatred, which is no part of a meek and quiet spirit characterizing a child of God, "which vaunteth not itself and is not puffed up." Is this the way we should strive to convert a sinner from the error of his ways? to reclaim the fallen, or to bring to a correct knowledge of the truth? Far from it. We should attribute to others the same honesty of motive we would claim for ourselves, the same charity and patience we would demand; for it is possible that we may be in error upon some point.

But have we no standard of action by which we may proclaim to dying men the truths of the Gospel, and yet earnestly contend for the same? "But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts, and be ready always to give an answer (not a think so) to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear." 1 Peter iii. 15.

Have we no rule given by which we may approach those who oppose? "In meekness instructing those who oppose themselves if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging the truth." 2 Tim. ii. 25.

Is there a rule by which we may strive to reclaim the fallen, contending earnestly, and yet adhere to the Scriptures? "Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual restore such an one in the spirit of meekness considering thyself lest thou also be tempted." Gal. vi. 1.

How beautiful and aptly spoken is Paul's language, when he says: "All Scripture given by inspiration of God is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."

What more do we need? Why, then, should we not earnestly contend for the truths of the Gospel? Though for a time they may be few in number, who accept of the old paths of long ago, where Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob and the apostles, and all God's faithful and tried ones have traveled in leaving behind them words of exhortation, of comfort, and hope, to all who will deny themselves, and take up their cross, pointing them onward to the reward, the crown of life that Heth at the end of the race. Let us all strive to walk in their footsteps, although they may not lead us with the popular throng.

It is the little flock that receives the kingdom. God's people have ever been the few and tried ones. But few entered the ark and arose in triumph upon the waves of a shoreless ocean, while the multitude were wrapped in a watery winding sheet of death. But few escaped with Lot to the mountains from the doomed city of Sodom, while the multitude were folded in an ashy shroud. But few of all the world yielded to the commands of Christ and accepted his claims. But few were with him on the lonely night of his betrayal. But few tried and loved ones were at the cross. But few followed to the tomb, and but few were there at his resurrection. But few were by his side when he ascended to his Father's throne.

May we ever be found "earnestly contending for the faith once delivered to the saint ;" that when Christ returns to "reward every man according as his works have been," we may receive a "crown of life that fadeth not away," and enjoy a home where sickness and death can never come.

L. S. BRONSON.

Contentment.

The duty of contentment is plainly taught in the Scriptures. But it is not a virtue that prevails largely in the world.

The rich man, in the midst of luxury, and surrounded by all that seems to be essential to his comfort and happiness, is discontented. Perhaps when he commenced the "struggle of life," he was without money and influence. He desired a more elevated position, hoping thereby to enjoy ease and contentment, and to secure it he began to toil for riches.

With the utmost perseverance he labored, overcoming every obstacle and surmounting every difficulty, till success crowned his efforts, and his most ardent expectations were more than realized. But was he content? No. He found that by increasing his wealth he had entangled himself in a snare, and many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition; for the "love of money is the root of all evil."

Again he sets his mark, and, bending all his energies to reach it, is once more successful. But he is not yet satisfied. There are other heights to which he aspires—other joys of which he dreams. And thus he continues the struggle through life, always striving for contentment but never finding it.

The poor man, toiling day after day, and week after week, laboring hard from early morn till latest eve, and receiving but a scant pittance for his labor, is not content.

He sees the rich enjoying their abundance, and envies them their lot. He wonders why God should be so partial in the bestowment of His blessings, and is almost led to conclude that He is unjust. He still continues to brood over his trials, and magnify his sorrows, until death bears him away to his rest in the grave, when his afflictions are finally ended.

The ambitious aspirant finds no place on earth which satisfies his passions for fame. Though he should gain the highest pinnacle of honor, and even bring the whole world under his control, he would sigh that there was no more worlds for him to conquer, and die at last without his desires satisfied or hopes realized.

Is it possible, it may then be asked, that we should possess a contented mind in this world of disappointment and trial?

Certainly, if we but apprehend what is meant by the term. Contentment is not a gloomy affection of indifference to the ordinary pleasures and pains of life, but a perfect satisfaction with the measure of good that we enjoy, accompanied with the spirit of submission to the will of our Divine Redeemer. It prompts us to say:

Whatever clime the dawning eye
Sees for the circle of its
Pilgrim—the goods, and to Me ill
Contentedly submit.

The writer of the epistle to the Hebrews says: "Be content with such things as ye have." But "Godliness with contentment," says Paul to Timothy, "is great gain." And in his epistle to the Philippians, he assures us that he brought his own mind to this Christian temper. "Not," he says, "that I speak in respect to want; for I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content."

Like everything truly valuable, contentment can only be attained by the use of means. There are a few rules for the attainment of this accomplishment, which it may be well to consider:

1. In our meditations we should always dwell on the joys, rather than the sorrows of life.

2. Improve the present, and not be too anxious concerning the future.

3. Measure our desires by our fortunes, and not our fortunes by our desires.

4. The chief source of contentment is the hope of a resurrection through Christ Jesus, at His second appearing. The best masters, we fear, would avail but little without this.

Hence, we must plant ourselves upon the rock of Christ. Here we will always find comfort. For in the blessed words of Divine inspiration there are passages suited to all conditions of the mind—to every vicissitude of life. The world may look dark and dreary; storms of opposition may rage around us; our foes may oppress us on every hand, and our friends leave us when we need them most; yet shall we find in the utterance of God's word that which shall cheer, strengthen, and sustain us in every trying hour of life. Nay, we shall find that which shall breathe into our very souls the atmosphere of content.

Let us have a well-grounded hope in Christ, confide in his instruction, and trust in his promises; then we shall enjoy a peace of mind such as the "world can neither give nor take away."

A Wonderful Book.

While at Bro. Austin Heston's, in St. Joseph county, a short time ago, we found there a large Bible, which was a part of an inheritance from his ancestors. We had a curiosity to take the dimensions of this book, and on a measurement found it to be 5½ inches thick, 12 inches wide, and 18 inches long. Then we weighed it (but its contents by deliberation and judgment, but by avoirdupois) and found that it drew the scales down to 17 pounds.

This Bible was printed in 1811, by Jno. Brown, of Haddington, in plain type. On account of the size of the type we would like much to possess it, were it not for the foot notes placed there by the author, or rather publisher. We should not like much to place these before our family, considering them in their influence as poisoning to the minds of the rising generation as any of the dime novel family.

Mr. Brown remarks in one of his foot notes that the more one reads the Bible the more mysterious to him it becomes. It is very evident from this remark, if it be true, that Mr. Brown has read the Bible a great deal, for he has the peculiar power of mystifying the plainest of Scriptures.

Mr. Brown has, with maps and steel engravings, copiously illustrated the book; but he evidently departs from all the wisdom and honesty he ever possessed, whatever may be said of the stock he had on hand, when he comes by engraving to represent at Matthew iii. Christ and John the Baptist as standing in the water, in the Jordan, to their ankles, and John pouring water out of an old Jewish bottle (canteen shaped) on Christ's head for baptism. Mr. Brown ought to have known, and we have no doubt but that he did know, there was not one single lexicon, or creditable scholar in existence who would justify such a representation.

Personal Influence.

Every one is endowed, each for himself, with a special gift of salutary influence, a peculiar, benign power, which he can no more get another to employ for him than one flower can get another to breathe forth its fragrance, or one star depute to another star its shining.

Your individual character, the special mould and temper of your being, is different from that of all other beings, and God, in creating it, designed it for special use in his church. Your relations to your fellow men are peculiar to yourself, and over some minds—some little group or circle of moral beings—you can wield an influence which is given to no other man to wield. Your place and lot in life, too, is one which has been assigned to you alone. For no other has the same part been cast. On your particular path, no other footsteps shall ever leave their print. Through that one course, winding or straight, rapid or slow, brief or long-protracted, in no other course shall the stream of life flow on to the great ocean. And so it is given to you to send blessing around you, to do good to others, to communicate, as you pass through life, to those whose moral history borders or crosses yours, a heavenly influence which is all your own. If this power is not used by you, it will never be used. There is a work in God's church, which if not done by you will be left undone.—Journal New Yorker.

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Indiana.

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a simple belief of the Gospel, repentance, and Immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Prayer.

Show how the Scriptures, that speak of the prayer of sinners, are to be reconciled.

Show how the Scripture, that speak of the prayer of sinners and the prayer for sinners, are to be reconciled.

"Now we know that God heareth not sinners." Is not this a true sentiment, the passage being correctly understood?

A brother says "A Jew said it, while other Jews said, 'He hath a devil,'"—"no more evidence that one was inspired than the other."

Well, suppose the first Jew told the truth, and the other Jews a most blasphemous falsehood, and neither were inspired. I submit that the Jew who was cured not only of his natural blindness but also of his moral blindness by the Savior, was a better witness than those Jews who sinned against the Holy Spirit by attributing Christ's miraculous works to Satan. The only question is, did he utter a Scriptural truth? Look at the rest of the verse: "But if any man be a worshipper of God and doeth his will, him he heareth." Is not this true? The other Jews reviled him and charged him with being Christ's disciple. I understand the meaning of the passage to be that God will not hear the prayer of sinners who continue to refuse to do his will; but he will hear those sinners who yield to God and are penitent and believing. While the sinner regards "iniquity in his heart, the Lord will not hear him." But if he ceases to regard and do iniquity, the Lord will hear him.

This is the key that unlocks the apparent contradictions. God heard David's prayer because he confessed and humbled himself in the dust on account of his great sin. Cain was deeply humbled on account of his great crime against his brother Abel, and the severe sentence passed upon him. Whether his repentance was genuine, we are not able to say. If he lived a wicked life afterward, his prayers—if he made any—were not heard.

It is to be presumed that the Jews "in captivity for their numerous sins" became penitent by their afflictions, and could thus pray acceptably for the peace of the city where they lived. In praying for the peace of the city, they prayed as much for themselves as for others. So the apostolic exhortation to pray for kings and all in authority was not for their miraculous regeneration, but that God would so overrule them that "we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty."

It is true that if we are taught to love our enemies in the sense of good will toward them, we should pray for their welfare, even their salvation, if they will "repent and be baptized for the remission of their sins." The apostles did not get down and pray for and with unreconciled sinners, but prayed them in Christ's stead, "be ye reconciled to God."

The modern plan of converting sinners by praying for a mysterious influence of the Spirit to convict and convert their hearts, is not in accordance with Bible precept or example. The primitive disciples held a long prayer meeting in the upper room for the promised Spirit—their prayer was answered, the Spirit was shed upon them, with a sound as of a mighty rushing wind—with cloven tongues like as of fire sitting on each of them. The result of their being all filled with the Holy Ghost, was that they began to speak with other tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance. The work of the Spirit on Pentecost was miraculous altogether. The object of those miracles was to arrest attention to the word spoken, and convince the multitude that the word spoken was God's word, and hence Jesus was Christ, was raised from the dead to sit on David's throne—hence their sorrowful rejection and crucifixion of their King was extremely wicked. They believed it in consequence of the external, miraculous proof presented to them by the Holy Spirit in the wonderful works there wrought. When they cried out, "men and brethren, what shall we do?" did Peter invite them forward to be prayed for? He said what always should be said to the enquiring. "repent and be baptized every one of you [in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins." Three thousand of them "gladly received the word," and were baptized, and thus were added to the Lord the same day. When this had taken place "they continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers. They prayed and were prayed for, after their faith and obedience.

But our brother thinks we are to pray for all men because God has purposed to save all.

There is no question but that God is able to raise sinner as well as saint from the dead, with the blessed and holy, at the first resurrection if he chooses. He can raise up the evildoers to a resurrection of eternal life, instead of damnation if he wills it. Does not Paul say, "who will have all men to be saved, and come unto a knowledge of the truth?" What do these words, so often quoted, mean? I allow that the translation favors the idea that God purposes the salvation of all. As it reads, will is auxiliary to have—one verb. In the original, will is a verb by itself, and the definitions in my Greek lexicon are to will, wish, desire, take pleasure in, delight in, to be able. Take either of the second, third, fourth, or fifth definitions, and this passage would harmonize with all such passages as "Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die? saith the Lord God, and not that he should return from his ways and live?" "For I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, saith the Lord God: wherefore turn yourselves and live ye." Ezek. xviii. 23, 32. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish, but have everlasting life." "The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness, but is longsuffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance." 2 Peter iii. 9. Because God is not willing that any should perish, does it follow that none will finally perish? In the same connection it is declared, "But the heavens and earth which are now, by the same word are kept in store reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men."

Those who proclaim the Gospel of Christ should always say, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be condemned." A resurrection of condemnation will be his portion. The condemnation will not be endless misery, but death—everlasting destruction. "For the gift of God is eternal life; but the wages of sin is death." "Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death." Those who do not overcome will be hurt of the "second death." Over the blessed and holy who have part in the first resurrection, the second death will have no power. But the fearful and unbelieving will have their part in the fiery lake, which is the second death.

The petition of the Roman officer was answered by our Savior in healing his servant. But Christ marvelled at his faith—he had not found such faith, no, not in Israel.

Jesus said to the Canaanitish woman whose daughter he healed, "O woman, great is thy faith." No wonder he heard the prayers of such strong believers! The thief on the cross, too, was a penitent sinner, and a full believer in the coming and kingdom of Christ.

E. HOYT.

Why?

Bro. Miller asks, "Why speak of restoring the earth to more than its Eden state? I'll tell you why.

1. Restitution in the sense of "recovering a former state or position," is an unusual signification of the term, and not used in Bible parlance.

2. Because God has so promised. Eden was a province eastward from Babylon, in which God made a paradise, (pleasure garden), and into which "he put the man whom he had formed," * * * "to dress it and to keep it." This Eden paradise is taken for the primeval condition of all the earth, in Adam's day, but by what authority the deponents, further, sayeth not. If true, why then take the pains and trouble of making a garden when the whole earth should, upon the hypothesis, have been a most delightful park, and each, any, and every place have been most desirable for an habitation as a home. But into that garden of delights came the tempter. Sin entered, death followed, man had fallen from his "primeval state of purity," and God's anathema rests still heavily upon him and all the earth, and a groaning creation attests its truth. Man had lost, his purity, his peace, his joy, his delights, his home, his communial felicity, his dominion; his life! Lost all.

Now, God has promised to restore man, and give him an incorruptible nature, endless life, purity, peace, joy, home, felicity and dominion, on a renewed earth, under new firmaments. (Isa. li. 11; lxv. 17-23; lxvi. 22; 2 Peter iii. 13; Rev. xxi. 1,) in which "God himself shall be with men, and wipe away all tears from their eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, * * * and there shall be no more curse." Rev. xxi. 3-5. Now as all these did enter into the former world in its Eden state, and none of them at all be excluded into the restituted world it will be the kosmos (world of mankind) restored to more than the former Eden state. That's why I my good brother.

G. W. STETSON.

"Behold the Man."

Trouble and trials seem to be the lot of man while journeying through this vale of tears. Oftentimes the soul is faint, and the heart weary, and we long to see the coming of the Lord that we may lay our burdens down and rest forever in the Paradise of God. But I have often thought that if we could keep our eyes more steadfastly upon the man Christ Jesus, that if we would make a greater effort to imitate that glorious and self-sacrificing example which he has left on record for us, that it would materially lighten the burdens of this mortal life. It would cause us to look, not upon the things which are beneath, but upon that which is above. It would remove our treasure from earth to heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, nor thieves break through and steal. Why, brethren, our master asks us to do nothing but what he has done before. He says we must have faith. Read the Gospels and see the mighty faith of the Son of God. He says we must love one another. Behold him at the grave of Lazarus, when even his enemies, the Jews, cry out: "Behold how he loves." And what unfathomable love was manifest in dying for a lost and ruined world. He asks us to be buried in baptism; he too was buried beneath Jordan's dark waters; he commands us to take up our cross and follow him; he too took up his cross and bore it up Golgotha's rugged hill, and upon that cross he suffered the agonies of death, upon that cross, paid the penalty of our transgressions. Are we scorned and hated by the world? Then look upon him as he is surrounded by that Jewish rabble. Hearken unto the cries that go up,—"away with him, crucify him." Are we complaining and finding fault because we are not rich in this world's goods, or does poverty press us hard upon every side? If so, hearken unto him; "the foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head." Are we oftimes buffeted and smitten by those who oppose the truth, and would fain see us crushe as it were, under their iron heel? Then let us take a lesson of humility from the Lord Jesus as he stands before the high priest and is smitten upon the cheek by an officer of the law. Behold that crimson face as it reddens with the blow, and I know not but angels looked with consternation upon the serene face of God the father as he permitted the Son of his love to be thus smitten by vile hands. But time, space, and ability would fail us to enumerate all the graces of that model character which has gone before, and which has strewn rich blessings upon every hand without money and without price, and if it should be our lot to fall under the power of the enemy, death, and be laid away in the silent tomb, and as we enter the dark waters of death we ask, whose footprints are these? The response will come back, they are the footprints of the Lord Jesus; for even here he has gone before. And if it should be our happy lot to be among those who shall rise triumphant over death and the grave, and sing the victors song, we will find, when upon that immortal shore, that he was the first fruits of them that slept, for he might have the preeminence on all things. But when we stand upon the new earth, restored to Eden's pristine beauty, and see the glory of the King of kings, we will then no longer say, "Behold the man," (See John xix. 5,) but, behold the God (Isa. ix. 6,) for all power in heaven and in earth will be given unto him.

Brethren, a little in the distance, and we see looming up those pearly gates and jasper walls. Shall we be found worthy to enter in through the gates into the city? Shall we have an abundant entrance administered unto us into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ?

BENJAMIN GARDINER.

Studying the Bible by Subjects—"Scrapping the Bible."

We, as a people, have been accused of "scrapping the Bible," because our method is to compare Scripture with Scripture, bringing together all passages having any bearing upon the subject under consideration. Yet this is the course our Savior took when reaching the assembled multitudes, or when reasoning with the opposers of His doctrine.

He discourses with the wily Sadducees upon the resurrection of the dead, and to prove that they were in error, "not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God," He takes them right back to Moses, saying, "Now that the dead are raised (the point to be proven) even Moses showed at the bush, when he called the Lord the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob; for He is not a God of the dead but of the living." As much as to say, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are dead, but the very fact that Moses called the Lord their God, proves that they are to live again.

So of divorcement; he refers to Moses and to the beginning of creation. Of his sufferings, he said, it had been written that he must suffer many things and be set at naught.

Of the sacredness of the temple, "Is it not written, my house shall be called of all nations, the house of prayer; but ye have made it a den of thieves."

And after his resurrection, discoursing with two of his disciples on the way to Emmaus, he upbraids them because of their slowness in believing all that the prophets had spoken, and then shows them from the Scriptures that Christ ought to have suffered, before entering into his glory. So, beginning at Moses, and all the prophets, he expounded to them in all the Scriptures concerning himself. Can we understand the method of Jesus now? Do we, indeed, think he read the Old Testament through, from beginning to end, to those disciples while walking to Emmaus? Not a bit of it. It is plain enough that he only selected from all the Scriptures, the passages, relating to himself.

That was the manner of Stephen and of Paul and of all the apostles. And we take the same course with any book that treats upon a variety of topics, be it history, biography, or science. We want to learn all we can from the book on a single subject. We may find treated upon in different chapters, and perhaps some one chapter may only contain a single paragraph, but we want to bring all that has any bearing upon the matter before our mind, that we may thoroughly understand and appreciate the author's arguments. If it be the character and exploits of some great man of which we would know, we must read those parts of history with which his exploits are connected.

And this is the only way whereby we can reach the truth upon any Bible topic. Be it faith, or hope, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come, the same course is to be pursued. The Bible may be profitably read in course, but it must be studied by subjects.

S. ROXANA WINCH.

The Berean Casket.

"I cannot help thinking that there is much meaning in Rom. viii. 20: 'For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope;' and if you can give me any light ad bereau casket on the matter you will further oblige, greatly obliged."

The Book that speaks of a groaning creation tells us that it shall be delivered into the liberty of the glory of the sons of God. Why do we not take the consolation which this assurance contains, and thank God for it, instead of mourning over the sore travail and pain that surround us as if they were mysteries for which there is neither solution nor end? He who pronounced all things very good before sin and sorrow and death entered the world will yet "rejoice in his works" (Psa. civ. 31); whilst the Seer of Patmos tells us that the testimony of the perfected, when resurrection light shall have scattered all the clouds of the mortal pilgrimage, will be "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honor, and power; for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created." Rev. iv. 11. Moreover, still farther on, as the "visions of God" are unfolded to his sight, he says, "There shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away."

Now when the destined period arrives when there shall be no more pain, it is obvious that the birth-pangs of creation, which now "travaileth in pain," will have ceased, and the vanity to which all things were unwillingly subjected will have passed away to make room for the liberty and the glory which God had in view when he imposed this temporary doom. Try to realize by a strong effort of imagination the surprise and sorrow, the grief and consternation that overwhelmed the mind of the first man when he heard the sentence of the Judge: "Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field; in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Thus man and his world were subjected to vanity—decay; the word here means the transitory nature of all animated creation; it speedily passes away, from the insect that dances its brief hour in the sunbeam to the comparatively strong man who nevertheless finds life at four score years "only labor and sorrow." Psa. xc. 10. The creature could not be willing to be thus subjected to pain and decay; every day we are fighting against them, although with the consciousness that we are the weaker of the combitants; yet the same essential reason of perfect wisdom, acting in harmony with perfect love, which led the Creator to eject the disobedient man from Eden, lest he should eat of the tree of life and live for ever in moral alienation from God, led him to subject creation to decay that he might make room for the perfect and the durable in the new creation in the glorious age to come. Vanity is the co-relative—the merciful co-relative—of moral disorder, and they shall pass away together; whilst stability will be the eternal co-relative of all who, having Christ's life in them, shall live for ever. —The Rainbow.

BRO. REED:—I notice in THE RESTITUTION a note from Ira A. Kellogg, that I would be at Columbus, Cherokee county, Kansas, on the fourth Sunday in April. This is a mistake; I shall be at the above named place on Saturday before the fourth Sunday in May to hold over Sunday and part of the following week in the evenings. Let the brethren, one and all come. Let us have a good meeting together at Columbus. Call on Dillworth Cox.

JOHN J'GOIE.

Sins Like Scarlet.

Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool. Isa. i. 18.

This by many is believed to refer to the strength of the color, and to the difficulty of discharging it; and though I do not presume to contradict that opinion, it may perhaps be suggested to have an additional meaning. Dr. Adam Clarke says, "Some copies have כשנים ke-shanim, like crimson garments."

The iniquities of Israel had been very great. In the 10th verse the rulers are addressed as if of Sodom and Gomorrah; and in the 21st it is said the faithful city had become a harlot. In the 29th, "They shall be ashamed of the oaks which ye have desired, and ye shall be confounded for the gardens ye have chosen." Is it not certain that these references to Sodom, to a harlot, and the gardens, allude to the wickedness, the idolatry, and the union which Israel had formed with the heathen? For what purposes were the gardens or groves used of which the frequenters were to be ashamed? No doubt for the same as those used in the East at the present day. The courtesans of the temples receive those in the groves who are ashamed to go to their houses. Those wretched females are called Solhilit-kal, i. e., parrots of the grove. "The wicked youth is always gathering flowers in the grove." "Thou hideous wretch! no one will marry thee; thou art not fit for the grove."

Scarlet or crimson was the favorite color of the ancient heathen prostitutes; (Jer. iv. 30): "And when thou art spoiled, what wilt thou do? Though thou clothest thyself with crimson, though thou deckest thee with ornaments of gold, though thou rentest thy face with painting, in vain shalt thou make thyself fair; thy lovers will despise thee." This is an exact description of the dress and other modes of allurement used by a female of the same character at this day. (Rev. xvii. 4.) : "The woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet color, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand, full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication: and upon her forehead was a name written, Mystery, Babylon the Great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth." In that most vivid description of Ezekiel (chap. xxiii.) of the idolatries of Samaria and Jerusalem, they are represented as two harlots; and there such disclosures are made as convey a most frightful picture of the depravity of the people: "She increased her whoredoms: for when she saw men portrayed upon the walls, the images of the Chaldeans portrayed with vermilion, * * she doted upon them." Her paramours, alas, were "exceeding in dyed attire upon their heads." The sacred prostitutes of the temple always have their garments of scarlet, crimson, or vermilion.—Roberts in Bible Echo.

The Soul Not Immortal.

Orthodoxy says the soul is immortal, and can never die.

Let us see if the Bible will prove this assertion. It says:

The soul that sinneth, it shall die. Ezek. xviii. 20.

He spareth not their soul from death, but gave their life over to the pestilence. Psa. lxxviii. 50.

None can keep alive his own soul. Psa. xxii. 29.

Let my soul (margin) die the death of the righteous. Num. xxiii. 10.

Let my soul (margin) die with the Philistines. Judg. xvi. 30.

He that converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death. James v. 20.

And it shall be that every soul that will not hear that prophet shall be utterly destroyed from among the people. Acts iii. 23. (American Bible Union Version.)

MAN NOT IMMORTAL.

Shall mortal man be more just than God? Job iv. 17.

God only hath immortality. 1 Tim. vi. 16.

All things can not be in man, because the son of man is not immortal. Eccles. xvii. 30. (Apoc.)

Solomon, says: I myself also am a mortal man, like to all, and the offspring of him who was first made of earth. Wis. xv. 17. (Apoc.)

The righteous only can have immortal—by patient continuance in well doing. See Rom. ii. 7.

THE RESTITUTION

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT

☞We must defer writing two or three pieces we contemplated on the prior resurrection of the just, till our brethren write out their views on the resurrection of the unjust. When this question is canvassed, we will proceed.

S. A. C.

☞Bro. Hugh Barnhill, on his way home from Laporte county, gave us a call on Monday last. There were fourteen additions to the congregation worshipping in the neighborhood where he has been laboring. Bro. B. is now 67 years old; but he is full of vigor, and his whole heart is in the gospel work. The prospect for a number of others is encouraging, and they will, ere long, obey the Lord.

☞We have received a copy of a pamphlet containing four sermons upon "The Christian Sabbath," by V. P. Meredith, pastor of the M. E. Church, of Ligonier, Ind. Mr. M. takes the popular side of the question and argues that the first day of the week is the Christian Sabbath. We have not had time to examine the book. Mr. Meredith has written this pamphlet in reply to the Seventh Day theory, as set forth by James White & Co. The pamphlet, mechanically, looks very attractive. It was printed at the office of the National Banner, conducted by our excellent friend, J. B. Stoll.

☞A new Hebrew paper has just been started in New York. It is to be called the Independent Hebrew. It will advocate independent views on all questions of science, politics, and religion. The world is moving in all directions. Old notions are giving way to new ideas which seem to be pressing in from all directions. The Bible not only holds its own, but men are approaching the great truths of revelation in a way they have not known. The Hebrews of America are coming to a new life, and the signs point to a new era among these people.

☞Prof. Swing preached upon the subject of rewards and punishments, on Sunday last. There are many things in the discourse well said, but it will require an astute theologian of the old type to find out just where he stands upon the question of final punishment. Endless misery, however, finds no consolation in his exposition, and indeed it is difficult to find any consolation in such a theory. Prof. Swing steers clear of dogmatism and urges that a life of purity in this world will open the gates of eternity, and introduce the true heart to endless peace.

☞We fully intended to have Bro. Wiley Jones' note go into the paper last week, but it got hung on the wrong hook, hence the delay. Bro. J., however, will not flare up as some do if their articles do not appear before the ink is fairly dry. We believe in the idea of a "fair chance" for all in this world and in the world to come, and cheerfully give place to Bro. J.'s protest. Some of our good brethren see a vast deal of "heresy" in our article on the "union movement." It is very consoling to have guides who understand all mysteries, and who do not need to go to Rome for instructions. We are not hide-bound in our views, and hope to accord to all men what we ask for ourselves—Christian Liberty.

Too Much Creed.

But few people have any idea of the baneful effects of creeds upon the human mind. It often happens that men are driven away from the beauties of the Christian faith by some human system unsupported by the word of God. An old Quaker once said that "If a creed was just like the Bible, we didn't need it; and if it were not just like the Bible, we didn't want it." This is a short, pithy statement of the case. The following item is of interest in this connection:

At the White House, "on an occasion I shall never forget," said Mr. Deming, "the conversation turned upon religious subjects, and Lincoln made this impressive remark: 'I have never united myself to any church, because I have found difficulty in giving my assent, without mental reservation to the long, complicated statements of Christian doctrine which characterize their articles of belief and confessions of faith. When any church will inscribe over its altar, as its sole qualification for membership,' he continued, 'the Savior's condensed statement of the substance of both law and gospel, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and thy neighbor as thyself," that church I will join with all my heart and all my soul.'"

☞We have communications from different brethren on the subject of the resurrection of the wicked, pro and con, for which we will find a place soon. Will try to give Brother Magruder's and Brother Sweet's next week. We propose to use but little space till our brethren have "a fair chance" to discuss this question. We must, however, give brethren that write on other topics space for communications. Our paper is small—manuscripts are many and lengthy—and—we must do the best we can.

☞It seems that Elder Thurman is yet in the time business. We clip the following item from the New York Tribune, which explains itself. Men are constantly fixing up dates. Their Christianity is made up of fanaticism and a sort of a religious arithmetic:

A company of Adventists, of Lewiston, Me., whose spiritual guide is Elder Thurman, spent the evening of Good Friday, in waiting for the second coming of Christ. About thirty assembled. The early part of the evening was devoted to the observance of the rite of feet-washing and the administration of the Lord's supper. A little before midnight they gave up their watching and returned home.

It seems that wherever Thurman is the Lord will come. One year ago he was to make his advent in Chicago; this year he is to appear in Maine. The Bible idea is "His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives." But it is an easy matter for men to arrange plans independently of the Bible.

Little Popes.

There are more popes in this world than ever lived in Rome. It sometimes happens that men are popes without any election of the cardinals. You must pronounce certain words just as certain brethren do, or certainly be damned. These little popes are very convenient. They can issue bulls of excommunication by simply withdrawing from the brotherhood, and then run a little scheme of their own. Everybody has seen or met with these little popes. They wear no crowns, and yet they rule or ruin.

How blessed it is to know that the judgment of the quick and the dead is not in hands of narrow-minded bigots, who would make their ipse dixit the guide to eternal life. The Pope's day is about ended, and the day will soon come when humanity will be blessed by one noble brother who will execute justice and judgment in the earth. The white robed bands will gather in the city by his side and glorify him as the chief of saints and nations. Then the little hates and crochets of men will cease, and the law will go from Zion unto the world. Let not the human intercept the Divine. Stand by the Word until the new age comes with its crown of endless glory. Our Lord is King, the Bible is our guide, the Gospel our message, and the kingdom our home. Men shall not thwart us, and the bulls from human vaticans will not change our way-unto the realms of light forever shining in the City of God.

Victory Over Death.

The plains of Judea were made resonant with angel songs; shepherds watched their flocks under the quiet hills, and the valleys were calm beneath the moon's steady glow. The watchmen were still in the streets, and the murmurs of the birds were not heard, the gentle flow of Kedron was heard in the stillness of the midnight hour. It was then that a voice rang from heaven, which echoed over the hills and vibrated in the valleys: Peace on earth, good will to men. A Savior is born and the guilty chains fall from the world. The angels brought the tidings, but the Lord brought pardon. Years sweep by and the great heart of humanity beats without change. At last change comes. He who was born in David's city rises as a teacher. A new law falls from his lips. Diseases fly from his presence; demoniacs are restored to reason, dead men come from their graves, the wild seas become calm, the winds are lulled into a calm, and the sinful sons of earth find forgiveness and love in the heart of the greater than Solomon. The streets are thronged with people, blind men open their eyes and see for the first time the hill side and the plain, the lakes and the valleys. Truly the Son of God is now among men. Blessed presence! The world begins a new life.

But how brief his stay. Only a few years, and all is changed. He is betrayed. Priestcraft sees no good in the man of sorrows. Kings are envious. A bosom friend takes the silver and in wicked hands we behold the Lamb of God. The notes of mockery are wrapped around him, thorns form his crown, carpenters hew out a cross, the trial is over. "CRUCIFY HIM," becomes the watchword of a wicked clan. Calvary now rises after Gethsemane. Awful hour of sufferings. A strange dream haunts the sleep of Pilate's wife. The governor washes his hands and tries to get rid of the blood which seems to stain them. Mighty events crowd in here. The day seems still. Heaven droops in blackness. The sun is wrapped in darkness. Earthquakes heave the ground. The temple is rocked. We can hear all these, and also the Roman hammer as it drives the nails into those hands that were stretched out over a great city when there rang out the pathetic words, "Oh Jerusalem! Jerusalem!" His feet now crossed and the cold iron passes through like the infamous cross. Feet that had been wet with tears and wiped with a woman's hair. The title is now complete. Three languages now proclaim the dying King. Soldiers are sporting with his garments, and jeering his claim. Brave hearted women cling to the cross. Calvary is now the world's centre of hope. The agony now begin: the blood-streaks flow down with tears. It is here that we behold the moral grandeur of the pure life of our noble Sacrifice. His mother stands away from the angry crowd. Beside her is that dear child of love and trust. A command greets his ear, and Mary, the mother of Messiah, finds a home. Above the wild cry of the crowd we hear an earnest prayer. "FATHER, FORGIVE, FOR THEY KNOW NOT WHAT THEY DO." Blessed words! He still prays for others while his own temples, hands and feet are pierced. A promise of paradise with its glory is made to a dying culprit. The golden gate now shines out in the darkest hour of the awful scenes. But the life is now closed, and his head is bowed in death upon his bosom. The hate and rancor of the priestcraft are now appeased, and the Son of God is now dead. Honorable man given a new grave. Roman sentinels appointed to watch. The disciples are treated as thieves by the mocking priests. The seal is made sure. Three days pass away. The Sabbath is at an end. A new week begins. Women hurry to the tomb with spices. But the angels came first. The corners of the tomb are yet dark. The stone has been rolled from the sepulchre. The white linen is still there, but the Christ of God is not there. The angels proclaim his victory, and the news soon flies on the wings of the morning. The eastern sky is painted with purple and gold; the landscape is lifting up its voice in the new day, and all heaven glows with the emblems of love and good will to men. Our hero has passed through the dark valley—the king of death has been conquered. Life and immortality now beck the brow of our risen Lord. Those who left at Pilate's hall and at the cross, now greet him on the other side of the grave. Blessed victory of hope. Hail thou conqueror of sin and death! Hearts are made warm by his presence from the cold valley. But how short his story. A few days of sweet communion. A few more hours with the pilgrims on the way, and all is quiet. A chariot in the form of a white cloud bears the victor to the skies. But he can yet be touched with the feelings of our frailties, and will ere long come forth from the chambers of heaven in kingly array to drive away death, immortalize his bride, calm the world's tumult, remove the curse, restore paradise, and reign forever as the victorious King. May we be ready. Amen.

The World's Peace.

All men desire peace, and yet war is the watchword of nations. At no time in the world's history has there been such stupendous preparations for war as now. The great nations of the Old World are straining every nerve and sinew for impending conflicts. Kings talk peace while preparing for slaughter. Six millions of men are now under training for war, and yet all nations claim to love peace. But, says the Apostle, when they shall cry "Peace and safety then sudden destruction cometh." We feel assured from the words of prophets that endless peace will never come until the Prince of Peace reigns from sea to sea. The following, from the pen of Charles Sumner, presents in a few words the true estimate of the world's war chiefs:

"Tell me not, then, of the homage which the world yet offers to the military idolatry. Tell me not of the glory of war; tell me not of the honor or fame that is won on its murderous fields. All is vanity. It is a blood-red phantom, sure to fade and disappear. They who strive after it, Ixionlike, embrace a cloud. Though seeming for awhile to fill the heavens, clothing the suns, it must, like the vapors of earth pass away. Milton has likened the early contests of the heptarchy to the skirmishes of crows and kites, but God and the exalted Christianity of the future shall regard all the bloody feuds of men in the same likeness; and Napoleon and Alexander, so far as they were engaged in war, shall seem to be monster crows and kites. Thus shall it be as mankind ascend from the thrall of brutish passions by which they are yet degraded. No other aim, by nobler means, shall fill the soul, a new standard of excellence shall prevail, and honor divorced from all deeds of blood, shall become the inseparable attendant on good works alone. For better, than shall it be, even in the judgment of this world, to have been a door-keeper in the house of peace, than the proudest dweller in the tents of war."

Does the Bible Teach a Partial Resurrection.

The chief design of the fifteenth chapter of first Corinthians was to prove the resurrection of the dead. The only issue between the apostle and some of the brethren at Corinth, was not whether a select company of the dead should be raised, but whether any of the dead should ever live again. The issue was resurrection or no resurrection. The apostle has stated the question so plain, that there can be no misunderstanding his meaning. He says, "Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead." 1 Cor. xv. 12. These skeptical Corinthians did not deny the resurrection of the righteous or wicked as such, but they denied resurrection of any dead ones. The resurrection of Christ was not introduced to prove the resurrection of the righteous, but to show the possibility of a resurrection. This point is clearly stated in the following verses: "But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen? And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain. Yea, and we are found, false witnesses of God; because we have testified of God that he raised up Christ; whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not. For if the dead rise not, then is Christ not raised." Verses 13-15. The indefinite phrase, "the dead," is used in every instance in the verse quoted, in an unlimited sense. This (1) "no resurrection of the dead." Verse 13. (2) "The dead rise not." " " "For if the dead rise not."

The foregoing quotations express the real issue between the apostle and those brethren in the church of Corinth, for whom they were designed. It reads, "the dead," not a part of the dead, as the premise laid down by the apostle at the 21st verse, the resurrection is just as unlimited as death. One is just as broad as the other. It reads, "For since by man came death by man came also the resurrection of the dead." The words dead and death are used synonymously. One is just as unlimited as the other; and the word resurrection embraces all represented by both. Any argument, therefore, that would confine one to the righteous, would confine the other also to the same class. One is just as universal as the other. Adam was the cause of the death of all men, and Christ will be the cause of the life of all men, "For as by Adam all die, even so by Christ shall all be made alive." Verse 22. If it is by in the premise, it must be by also in the conclusion. The Greek prepositions dia and en in the premise and conclusion must be used in precisely the same sense. It will not do to use one of these prepositions to denote causality and the other to denote relationship. Campbell, the Diaglott, and most of our best translators render it "as through Adam all die, even so through Christ shall all be made alive." Dia properly signifies through. Thus the same all who die by or through Adam, will be made alive by or through Christ. But every man in his own order; Christ the first fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming. Afterward the end, or the rest of the dead * * * For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death." Verses 23, 25, 26. I. Christ and they that are Christ's belong to one order. Every sheaf in the harvest was of the same nature or order of the first sheaf. If the first sheaf was wheat every other sheaf was wheat also. The qualifying phrase every man in his order denotes different orders, bands or companies, which would not be the case if none but the righteous are referred to; for both the company and the captain are band or company. 2. The Greek preposition eita is translated at 24th verse from the same word that at the 23d verse is rendered after. Thus afterward the end or the resurrection of the rest of the dead; for the apostle had been speaking of nothing but death and resurrection; he must, therefore, have referred to the end of the dead by a resurrection, or by the destruction of the last enemy that held them under the dominion of death. According to Revelations xx. 5, one thousand years will intervene between these two resurrections. The apostle did not adduce the resurrection of Christ to prove a partial resurrection, but to prove the possibility of a resurrection; for if there can be no resurrection of the dead, then Christ was not raised. But it may be objected that this view would prove that all the dead will be raised spiritual, glorious, incorruptible and immortal, and about victory through the Lord Jesus Christ. To this I would reply that not only has the apostle shown that there will be different orders, bands or companies, but a difference in the time of the resurrection of those who are Christ's and the rest of the dead. Not only so, but he has clearly defined the class who shall have part in the former resurrection. Thus to put man in his proper place. The apostle says, "But some men will say, how are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come forth? Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die. And that which thou sowest thou sowest not the body that shall be, but bare grain; it may chance of wheat or of some other grain. But God giveth it a body as it pleaseth him, and to every seed his own body. All flesh is not the same flesh; but there is one kind of flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, another of birds, and another of birds. There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial; but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another. There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead." Verses 35, 41. Please consider,

1. The primary meaning of the verb sow is used in the sense of placing the grain in a proper condition to grow or to be made alive, which necessitates its being put in the ground and covered up; thus the raising of it must relate to its coming out of the ground.

2. After having been put into the ground it must die, or be dissolved before it can be made alive, or in those conditions be produced by which it will absorb the life principle from the atmosphere; for the atmosphere is the great reservoir of all life.

Of the same import is the following language of Christ, when speaking of his death and resurrection being necessary in order to a future life; he says:

"Verily, verily, I say unto you, except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit." John xii. 24.

By this figure Christ teaches that before any seed is in a condition to grow it must be put into the ground. All agriculturists understand this. Our Savior illustrates the same thing by the following figure, when speaking of the good and bad:

"But other (seed) fell into good ground, and brought forth fruit." Matt. xiii. 8. Also in the 22d verse, "but he that received the seed into good ground," &c.

According to all these illustrations, seed must be put into the ground before it can grow or be made alive. Thus the theory teaching that Paul means by the word sow, in 1 Cor. xv. 42, 44, to sprout, or spring out of the ground, is utterly inadmissable. Even if it were true, the seed must die before it can be quickened; because according to Paul and Christ, that which is sown is not quickened except it die.

3. The bare or naked grain must be sown.

4. God gives it such a body as pleases him; but he gives to every seed its own body.

This teaches—if it teaches anything—that God will give to every man his own body, and not another's.

5. The flesh denotes the nature of man, beast, bird and insect; and different kinds of flesh the difference in the physical nature of the body sown, and the same body when raised.

6. The difference between earthly and heavenly bodies, and their different degrees of glory, illustrate the difference in positions of glory, honor and power, between the body buried and the body raised.

We are now prepared to listen to the apostle's answer to his own question, "how are the dead raised up?" "And God hath both raised up the Lord, and will also raise us up by his own power." 1 Cor. vi. 14. Compare with Romans i. 4: "With what body do they come forth?" He answers, "with an incorruptible, glorious, honorable and spiritual body. Again he says: "Thou sowest not the body that shall be." What is the difference between the body sown and the body raised? The apostle Paul explains the difference by figure, by the different kinds of flesh and different degrees of glory. The different kinds of flesh show the difference between a corruptible and an incorruptible, an animal and a spiritual body. The body raised differs from the body buried just as much as an incorruptible and spiritual body differ from an animal and corruptible body. The difference is in the physical nature of these bodies, not their identity. The same "it" that is sown is raised, but it will be raised with a body having just the opposite nature from what it had when buried. The body raised will differ from the same body buried, as a glorious body differs from a weak and dishonorable body.

"It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption." "It is sown in weakness, it is raised in power." "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." If the apostle fails in these points and the application of them as soon as what body the dead come forth, and the difference between the body sown and the body raised, in vain may uninspired wisdom undertake the task.

7. That the apostle refers to none but the righteous dead in the qualifying words, incorruptible, glorious, honorable, spiritual, and immortal, is clear from the 49th verse. Referring as to Christians as represented by the first personal pronoun, we, and us, and to the class also whom he had just described, as being represented by the two Adams, he says, "and as we have borne the image of the earthly, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." Again he says, referring to the same class of dead ones, "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead (he had just definitely shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption." Of the same import is the triumphant song of the redeemed millions. "But thanks be to God, which giveth us (the saints) the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. That by the qualifying words, we, us, and our, the apostle only refers to the saints, and not to all mankind, is clearly evident from the foregoing. We good and bad saints! Us saints and sinners! That the worst class of sinners who have ever lived should mingle their impious voices with those whom they have tortured and killed, in the triumphant song of thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ,' is blasphemous to-day.

The apostle and Church of God at Corinth represent all Christians, living and dead. These will not all sleep, but they will all be changed.

Field Notes.

Since reporting last of labors done on the field, it has been my privilege to visit the little town of Lincoln, Miami county, where we made several discourses. One on "Human Agency in Religion," three on the subject of "Spirit," two on the "Gospel and Kingdom," and one on "Practical Christianity."

[illegible] here we, for our first time, met Bro. J. F. Waggoner, who has the reputation of being an able co-laborer in the Gospel. We found him to be a brother of good social qualities, and of course, good company. Our visit with him could not be otherwise than pleasant. Also, we had the pleasure of visiting Bro. W. J. B. Fennimore, and spending much of our time very pleasantly with him.

In Lincoln and the near country around, we learned of twenty-four persons who have been members of the church. Of these, we visited nineteen, all of whom are anxious to enter into an organization. Also we had expressions from persons of the world who say they are desirous of becoming church members, and will do so as soon as the brethren there place themselves by organization into proper shape. We think the general outlook at Lincoln is good. We will return there for meeting, May 27th and 28th.

While talking there, on the Kingdom, and after having made an induction of the Scriptures upon the time of its organization, we then drew some conclusions. Among these, we stated that the Scriptures did not mention one single organic act that ever transpired on the notable day of Pentecost, not even that of a church, much less than a kingdom. Then we stated that we felt willing and competent to defend our statement, in case any one desired to call it in question. Like the Savior's expression, relative to the rich, this was a hard saying; who could bear it? The next evening rendered it evident that the Disciple brethren could not bear it, as they informed me that they would have a man to discuss our differences with me. So propositions were submitted, and at no very distant day we will have our armor and strength tested by the Almighty.

April 29, we made a stay of three hours in Rochester, Fulton county, and visited brother and sister Anderson, and promised them to return and hold a few meetings for them in the court house, at a time when Cæsar would be absent, as he is now scraping.

From Rochester we came to Argos, and stayed over Sunday with the brethren, who are always ready for meeting.

Who are Blessed?

Think not those are blessed alone
Who tread the earth to wealth and splendor,
The proudest monarch on his throne
His pomp and pow'r must soon surrender.

The worshippers of gold may shine—
Their wealth of heart is all too meager;
Who bows alone at Mammon's shrine,
Is poorer than the poorest beggar.

The man is rich and blessed indeed,
Who seeks in Christ the golden mean,
Pursuing right with steam endeavor,

Though toil and pain are his to bear,
His heart may feel the weight of sorrow,
To throne and realm a fellow-heir,
With Christ to-day—a king to-morrow.

What boundless love of God is this
That flows to us in ancient story?
We feel a foretaste of the bliss,
And joy to hail the coming glory.

JOHN L. WINDE.

The Coming King.

(Altered Some.)

O, let us wait for the coming King,—
When all the saints His praise shall sing;—
O, how we long to see that hour
When on the clouds He comes in power.

Then saints and angels robed in white
Dwell in that land where comes no night.
His coming waits;—'twill not be long
Till we shall sing the victor's song.

Then let us watch and pray;—for soon
He comes to bring the promised boon
Of endless life;—then raptured hands
Clasp those we've loved in Canaan's lands.

Correspondence.

DEAR BRETHREN;

Brother Amos Sanford has visited us in Champaign county, Ill. He commenced meeting on Saturday evening, April 8; gave two lectures on Sunday, and continued meeting over the following Tuesday, in our house. He gave two lectures in Pesotum on What is man, and The Resurrection, showing by the Bible that man is mortal and cannot inherit eternal life except by a resurrection from the dead. He gave one lecture in the old school house east of our place—subject: What must I do to be saved.

The meetings were well attended, and good attention was given to the word. I think much good can be done in the future.

Yours, in hope of eternal life.

AMELIA RUSSELL.

PESOTUM, Ill.

DEAR BRETHREN:—Having been so situated that I did not receive the RESTITUTION for some time, its face, again is all the more welcome. When I read the short editorial that led the column in the issue of the 12th inst., I just said in my heart, God bless you, Bro. Reed. I am glad the gates are not closed, the stakes set, and the declaration made, "thus far shalt thou go and no farther," in the search for truth. Of how little value is everything else in the world, compared with the truth as it is in Jesus. Religion is more than a form of words, or a mental acceptance of certain truths, but the truth must take hold of the heart. We may have all knowledge, but without love it profiteth us nothing.

This is a time for work, for earnest work. We are asleep, and it is almost morning.

The brethren and sisters here were cheered by the presence of Sister Kerr and daughter from Dixon, Illinois, who have been spending the winter with us. We have met together every Sunday morning to talk over the things of the kingdom.

If any of the brethren traveling East or West will arrange to stop over the Sabbath with us, we will entertain them to the best of our ability. I think if you would adopt the plan of sending out the RESTITUTION on three month's subscriptions, our brethren would find it the best possible way of spreading the truth. Better than books, better than tracts. Let each one select a list of friends, and persons we think care anything for God's truth, (for there are many in darkness to whom, if the light should come, would willingly receive it,) and send his list with 50 cents for each name, and have the RESTITUTION sent to these persons for three months, and the seed thus sown will bear an hundred fold.

Yours in the truth,

HENRY S. SEAMAN.

ERIE, Pa.

Dear brethren of the like precious faith, I left home the 30th of March, went to Wabash county, held meeting one week in the town of Laketon, with good effect, had three additions to the body, by baptism, and much prejudice removed. The people were quite anxious to hear the Word, and I think, there is foundation for future good to be done, at that place. At the close of my meeting, Bro. Beebe took me in his spring wagon, and conveyed me to Bro. Messimore's. Held meeting some days. There were six immersed into the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of their sins, making in all nine added to the body. The next first day of the week I spent some four miles from Bro. J. L. Wince's. Brother and sister Wince were out on Friday night, and Sunday. We had a good meeting; the brethren and sisters from Brother Messimore's neighborhood came up on Sunday morning, as had as the roads were, six miles. They are alive to the truth. I wish we had more such brethren and sisters as they are. Also brother and sister Wince, they are all alive to the truth. They were at my other meeting also, and added to the interest of the meeting. May God bless them, and save them in his everlasting kingdom. I returned to Laketon on my way back and held meeting two nights, with full house. I return there some time in June and hold meeting again. Returned home after an absence of twenty-five days; found all well.

J. S. HATCH.

DEAR BRO.:—THE RESTITUTION makes its welcome weekly visits. I am pleased with its spirit and teaching. I should feel lost without it. The most of the so called preaching is sectarian. The fact is, this vicinity is flooded with any amount of preaching, a large per cent. of which is anti-Scriptural, and the singing the same. I have no voice for singing, "but blessed is he that hath an ear to hear." I am looking for life when Christ the life-giver shall come, and I hope to enjoy that life with all that shall have died in Christ, and all that are his at his coming.

JAMES C. RICHMOND.

I have been so long in renewing my subscription, that you may perhaps have concluded me a backslider, but when you know the reason, I think you will sympathize with me. Death, that enemy of our race, has laid his icy hand on her who has been my companion through life for fifty years. But I thank God through our Lord Jesus Christ, that I sorrow not as those who have no hope. I consigned her to the tomb in the firm belief that we shall meet again, when our Lord comes to wake his sleeping ones to life eternal, to part no more for ever. But as these views are not, to my knowledge, entertained outside of my own family, our neighbors wondered what preacher would perform the funeral service, or, as they put it, what preacher would bury Mrs. Williams. I had even been asked if I believed in a future state, by some parties who were ignorant of the Word of God.

The sects are represented here by Catholics, Lutherans, Presbyterians, Methodists, Episcopalians, Baptists, Dunkards, etc., but of course I could not with a clear conscience have any of their preachers to perform that ceremony, however much I respected many of their followers. So I determined, by God's help, not to allow the assembled friends to leave the house without giving them my reasons for differing from them on so important a subject. I read the Apostle Peter's affirmation to his brethren concerning the Patriarch David, that he was dead and buried, but not ascended to the heaven, as was now taught by modern preachers. So my companion was dead—not animated by the breath or spirit of life, which had returned to God who gave it, but that she herself that wonderfully dust-built body, would return to dust as God hath said. So if there was no resurrection, there could be no future life. But, thank God, the promise of future life through our Lord Jesus Christ is as sure—the conditions being fulfilled—as is the punishment of sin, which is death. "He that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live," said he in whom our life is hid. Discarding the opinions of uninspired men we put trust in the inspired word of holy apostles and prophets who spoke as they were moved by the Holy Spirit. The Book, then, and nothing but the Book, as it came down from heaven, to be the life of man. Amen!

Thus I briefly stated my reasons for not complying with the usual custom here, and I thank our Heavenly Father for support. For many years I have been a firm believer in God's Word; and as I am now drawing near to the end of life's journey, I feel great comfort in holding on to the Inspired Word of God, knowing he is faithful who hath promised.

With great respect, yours in the truth,

JAMES WILLIAMS.

ASTORIA, April 26.

JASPER COUNTY, Iowa,
April 24, 1876.

DEAR BRETHREN:—I give you the following report of our meetings. We have monthly meetings. Our faith is increasing in the blessed truth. We have some encouragement. Our worthy brother, C. Waldo Aulls, has visited us. He came the 22d, and stayed till the 24th.

On Saturday evening it rained. We had meeting. Bro. Aulls said a little water would not hurt any one. As there was a good many young people out Saturday evening, Bro. Aulls preached to them, and I hope they never will forget the good advice he gave them,—and I guess he meant a little of it for the older ones. While we were singing, Bro. Aulls shook hands with all in the house. We then were seated. Then our brother called on the brethren and sisters to speak; one after another arose and spoke. We had such a good meeting. We then dismissed, to meet again at 4 o'clock Sunday afternoon, as Bro. Baker, Seventh Day Adventist, occupied the house at 11 o'clock.

Sunday afternoon it rained again. There was a good many come through the rain, two miles, to meeting. Bro. Aulls preached at the door of the church. He gave us a noble exhortation on Brotherly Love. Bro. Vanmeter followed him. We had a good interest. We are few in numbers, and the harvest is great, and we prayerfully invite any and all working brothers and sisters to assist us at any time they can. We will be glad to see them.

Our meetings are on the second Sunday in every month. We want to be remembered in your prayers at all times, as we are commanded to pray without ceasing. Finally, brethren, pray for us, that the word of the Lord may have free course and be glorified even as it is with you. Amen.

A. G. WINCHESTER.

BRO. REED:

In the RESTITUTION of April 12th, I find my Catechism spoken of as "a little creed." The volume treats of various related subjects, and they are put into the form of questions and answers in order to be the more easily learned by children. But if it can be called "a little creed," it seem to me that any succinct statement of the Gospel, whether printed in a tract, a weekly paper, or an unwritten discourse, must be called "a little creed" also. As to saying "we don't believe he has made a perfect creed," allow me to reply that I do not claim perfection for it. The Bible,—the law of the Lord is perfect." Psa. xix. 7. No uninspired work can be. The Catechism was intended only as an aid to the study of the Bible. I could have said this in the preface, if I had not thought that such a self-evident truth would have been taken for granted by every reader. As for making it a "password to the golden city,"—I had not imagined that anybody under the sun would venture to make such an use of it! The Bible is my only rule of faith and practice, as you may find stated pp. 34 and 35 of the Catechism.

Respectfully, &c.,

WILEY JONES.

NORFOLK V., Apr. 15, 1876.

BRETHREN:—Thinking that there might possibly be some of the readers of THE RESTITUTION who would like to hear from our little flock, in Kosciusko county, I have determined to pen a few thoughts for their encouragement.

We love the paper and the truths it advocates, and are trying to live that we may be accepted of Christ at his coming, for "unto them that look for him will he appear the second time without sin unto salvation.

Brother Hatch has been laboring with us again, with good success. Last Thursday evening, just as the sun was sinking beneath the horizon, we assembled upon the banks of a stream of sparkling water, for baptism. Six believers went down to the watery tomb and came forth to walk in newness of life, ready to give a reason for the hope within them. From thence all repaired to father's residence, for social meeting and breaking of bread. Our little flock now numbers twenty-three.

"Come Lord, and tarry not,
Bring the long-looked for day;
Come, for thy saints still wait,
Impatient of the day."

In hope of the soon coming kingdom, I am your sister,

CYNTHIA MESSIMORE.

HEYWORTH, McLEAN Co., Ill.,
April 18, 1876.

BRO. REED:—I commenced a meeting here last night, in the Christian church, to continue over next Sunday. No brethren here, but a few friends of truth. Bro. C. P. Graham came in last night, eight miles, and rode home on horseback after meeting. He thinks I will not get away from this section of country soon, as doors are opening for us on every hand. People who have heard of the truth, want to hear it direct from the source of all light.

I will remain in McLean and DeWitt counties as long as I am persuaded that the good of the cause they may seem to demand, and then I go to Monongah and Fulton counties, where I was brought up, to proclaim the good news to them also.

But I sat down to write a letter of transmittal, simply, of the within extract, from an editorial in the Globe Democrat, of St. Louis, dated April 16th. It is quite a concession to be found in a leading Gentile paper.

Yours for the truth.

AMOS SANFORD.

"The news that Turkey is willing to compromise with its Hebrew creditors by giving them land in Syria or Palestine, in exchange for the bonds they hold, recalls to mind a measure which for ages was dear to every Hebrew heart. For centuries after the Jews were taken from Palestine and dispersed throughout the earth, the hope most fondly cherished by Jews was that of returning en masse and once more possessing their land. Barren though Judea was—rocky, arid, almost desolate—separated from it often by thousands of miles, in imagination they still looked to it as to a promised land, one peculiarly their own, and which they were destined at some future day to inhabit under the beneficent rule of the coming Messiah. Throughout the persecution of the Middle Ages this hope never deserted them, but never before did there appear the least prospect of its realization. Now, if the desire for possessing and inhabiting Palestine still actuates the Jews as a mass, and exerts its influence alike on the rich as well as the poor, it is possible that the scepter may yet return to Judah, and a Hebrew again rule over Shiloh, the City of the Great King. The Rothschilds could buy the whole of Palestine with Turkish bonds, and not suffer the least embarrassment in their business, while the contributions of the millions of Abraham's sons would go far toward accomplishing the same object."

Stopping at Pesotum, Ills., I gave five lectures at Brother John Russell's house, (two miles from the depot); two at the school house in town, and one at a school house four miles distant. There are twelve faithful members of the Church of God near this place, and I enjoyed their society very much. The M. E. Church, which some of them helped to build, is closed against them, but they "contend earnestly for the faith" as best they can. Outside interest is good and encouraging.

AMOS SANFORD.

To Brother A. B. M.

Will Brother A. B. M. allow me to ask three questions?

1. Had he seen or read the Catechism before he wrote that article so hotly condemning it?

2. If he had neither seen nor read it, how could he find it in his heart to write of the book in such a tone?

3. If it is proper (and I think it is eminently proper, provided they advocate nothing but "sound doctrine,") to have the assistance of speakers, evangelists, discourses, lectures, books, tracts, papers, periodicals, publishing associations, etc., for grown persons; why not at least some of these aids for children also? Are children more strong-minded, and in less need of such assistance in studying the Bible, than grown persons? But if we deny such aids as books, papers, etc., to children, why not to grown persons also?

It seems to me that it would have been much better if Brother M. had learned the exact nature of the "notes," and read the explanation of the purpose for which the uninspired writers are quoted, before speaking of those "notes" as he did.

To all critics, I would say, try the Catechism on its doctrinal merits or demerits. If the doctrine be untrue, assail it. "If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil; but if well, why smitest thou me?" Jno. xviii. 23.

I do not know whether all of the brethren are favorable to Sunday schools or not; but I, for one, believe them to be of God, when the Word of God is faithfully taught in them. Of course it is not to be supposed that any but apt and qualified members of the church will engage in teaching the children that attend the school.

I would like to take an early opportunity of saying a few words on the duty and method of imparting religious instruction to children.

Respectfully, &c.,

WILEY JONES.

Dead in Sin.

The Lord God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree in the garden thou mayest freely eat but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." (Margin: dying thou shalt die.) Gen. ii. 17.

Adam, by his act of delinquency, and the sentence upon it stood attainted, and because a dead man in law, though he was not executed, till about nine hundred years afterward.

DIED.

PICKETT—In the second Monday of December, 1875, Clark, son of George Pickett and Sister Pickett, aged 9 years.

He was a good and obedient child. Although young in years, he was old in talent and understanding. He seemed to talk a great deal about the Kingdom. He was a mild, peaceable and truly child; yet for all that, Death laid hold of him and he had to go.

A funeral sermon was preached by the writer, from 1 Thess. iv. 13, to a large and interesting congregation, on the Tuesday afterward, before Clark was buried.

He left a father, mother, and three sisters to mourn after him. I saw Brother Pickett's family last Sunday. They were anxious to have the death of their child published. They are still mourning. But they need not to mourn as those who have no hope. They will meet Clark again in the Kingdom, where there will be no more death.

JOHN FOORE.

GALESBURG, Kan.

JOHNSON—November 14, 1875, in Bourbon county, Kansas, Mary Johnson, wife of George Johnson, aged 60 years, 8 months, and 16 days.

Sister Johnson was born in Pennsylvania, moved to Pickaway, Ohio; from there to Miami county, Indiana, and thence to Marshall County, Indiana, where she was baptized into Jesus, by Brother Hughes. From thence she moved to Illinois, and from there to Bourbon county Kansas. There she remained with her husband and rest of her children, until she fell asleep, and is now awaiting her summons to awake and come forth.

A funeral sermon was delivered on the 9th day of April, 1876, to a large concourse of people, from John xiv. 19.

JOHN FOORE.

JOHNSON—March 27, 1876, Andrew Johnson, son of George and Mary Johnson, aged 23.

Brother Andrew Johnson was baptized by brother Higgins twenty-two years ago. He moved to Illinois with his father and mother, and there was married to a Baptist lady. She, of course, had a Baptist preacher to preach his funeral which was done the same day that Brother Johnson's mother's funeral was preached at 11 o'clock a. m., while his was preached at 3 o'clock p. m., by a man by the name of Johnson, a Baptist. But he had heard me in the forenoon, and I heard Mrs in the afternoon and showed those people that they had to wait till the resurrection, till Christ should come back and wake them up, that they were asleep.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

CHANGE OF APPOINTMENTS.

As many persons are liable to be disappointed in our Big Weekend, we will defer it after consulting all parties, we have concluded to defer the trip two months. Our visit then will be—

Lanark, Ill., July 1 and 2.
Ripley, Brown Co., Ill., July 8 and 9.
Moberly, Mo., May 20 and 21.
New Hope, Howard Co., Mo., July 22 and 23.
West Lebanon, Ind., August 5 and 6.

O. M. MYERS.

The Michigan church conference will hold their annual meeting at the brick school house three and one-half miles north of Meadon, St. Joseph county, Michigan. It will commence Thursday evening, June 1, 1876, at 7 o'clock p. m., and continue over Sunday.

Brother Myers and others from Pipestone, Ind., will be there to assist in preaching the word. All who love Jesus and his appearing are cordially invited to be with us. Every church in the state should be represented by as large a delegation as may be. Brethren should arrange their business beforehand so as to meet in conference and worship at least once a year.

E. HOYT, Secretary.

The next quarterly conference of the brethren of the Abrahamic faith will be held at Windfall, Tipton county, Indiana, commencing on Friday before the second Lord's Day in June, being June 2, 1876, and held over Lord's Day. All are cordially invited to attend.

By order of COMMITTEE.

The annual conference of the Church of God of Northwestern Kansas will convene at Acton, Cloud county, Kansas, June 22, 1876, at 1 p. m.

A general invitation is extended to all lovers of our soon-coming King to meet with us and participate in this annual gathering.

We confidently expect that Brethren Orem, Kinsey, J. K. Thompson, will meet with us. We want to make it one of the best meetings we have had here. Why can not all the lovers of the coming King attend? Our gathering when he comes will be sure. Let us have a little foretaste in our voluntary meeting here. Come one, come all. Acton is 7 miles south-east of Concord.

By order of the church.

LOTT CLOVER.

The will be a meeting of the brethren of the Church of God, four miles south-west of Osage Mission, at a school house known as South Liberty, beginning on Friday before the third Sunday in May, 1876, to continue over Sunday.

Come one, come all. Come, Brethren Orem, Kinsey, Wilkins, Hayden, Bringer, Batt, Hayworth, Smith, and all.

Those coming by rail may write to O. B. Bennett, Osage Mission, Neosho county, Kansas. Those coming to Galesburg, write to John Foore, Galesburg, Kansas, saying whether they will arrive on Friday or on Saturday. Teams will be in readiness. Let there be a general attendance.

JOHN FOORE.

There will be a meeting held at Hickory Grove school house, in the south-west corner of Hogsett county, Iowa, commencing Friday evening, May 19, 1876. Brother A. F. Brigger is expected to be with us. Cannot Brother John L. Prime, of West Irving, be with us at this meeting? Also, Bro. Wright, of Pleasant county; Amos Callaway, Hillsboro, and Bro. Hubbell, of Union county. Come brethren, one and all.

Those wishing to attend may correspond, if they wish, with G. W. Jarred, of Ingalls Grove, Iowa, who will give any information they may wish.

THE AMERICAN CYCLOPEDIA.

A Comprehensive Library in Itself.

A Great National Enterprise in which every American may Take Pride.

Published by D. APPLETON & CO., 549, 551, Broadway, N. Y.

The Cyclopedia, now in course of publication, is entirely rewritten, and appears with about 4,000 maps and illustrations. To be completed in sixteen volumes of 800 pages each. Fourteen volumes now ready.

In the experience of book making and selling, the work is without a parallel. With the multiplication of steam presses, the publishers are still unable to meet the demand.

The sale has already reached over 300,000 volumes, and this in panic times! The demand for the work is but fairly commenced; the orders are largely multiplying and the indications are that the sales of the work for 1876 will greatly surpass those of the previous year.

Thus the most sanguine expectations of the publishers are more than realized.

The publishers again repeat to the public that no expense has been spared in the writing, editing, or publishing departments of the American Cyclopedia.

The cost will be more than $300,000 to produce the sixteen volumes for the price.

SOLD ONLY BY SUBSCRIPTION.

Is Your Lamp Burning?

SONG.

Say, is your lamp burning, my brother?
I pray you look quickly and see;
For if it were burning, then surely
Some beams would fall brightly on me.

Straight, straight, is the road, but I falter,
And often fall out by the way;
Then lift your lamp higher, my brother,
Lest I should make fatal day.

There are many and many around you
Who follow wherever you go;
If you thought that they walked in a shadow,
Your lamp would burn higher, I know.

Up the dark mountains they stumble;
They were bruised on the rock, and they fe
With their white, pleading faces turned upward
To the clouds of the pitiful sky.

There is many a lamp that is lighted:
We behold them above and afar;
But not many of them, my brother,
Shine steadily on like a star.

I think, were they trimmed night and morning,
They would never burn down or go out,
Though from the four quarters of heaven
The winds were all blowing about.

If once all the lamps that are lighted
Should steadily blaze in a line,
Wide over the land and the ocean,
What a girdle of glory would shine!

How all the dark places would brighten!
How the mists would roll up and away;
How the earth would laugh out in her darkness
And joyfully welcome the day!

Say, is your lamp burning, my brother,
I pray you look quickly and see.
For if it were burning, then surely
Some beams would fall brightly on me.

Future Age.

REPLY TO MOSES SMITH.

[The following article was refused a place in the Advent Times, and has been sent to us for insertion. The correspondent is a patron of the Times and a believer in the heresy of the world to come.—ED.]

Brother Burr, I have read carefully a piece in your paper, written by Moses Smith, against the age to come. With your permission, I should like to say a few words in regard to it.

I conclude the brother thinks he has handled the subject in a masterly manner; like "a workman that needeth not to be ashamed," from the fact, that he proposes to print the same in a tract for scattering abroad over the land.

Now, as God reveals the Gospel to my mind by the Spirit, the brother has some truth and some error; but, on the whole, more error than truth. He fails to rightly divide the word of life, and so "gives the trumpet an uncertain sound; and who shall prepare himself to the battle?"

I have yet to learn that the doctrine of probation in the future age, includes the resurrection of the wicked and a repreaching of the Gospel to them and their general submission to its precepts. For aught I know, some may believe and declare such wild and vague sentiments, but I have not, as yet, come in contact with them. Neither is this the future age probation doctrine, as believed in, and published by the body of that faith.

To represent such as their faith, and then endeavor to demolish it, is like building up a man of chaff for a scare-crow to frighten and alarm, and then using fire-arms of large and small calibre for its destruction. But though the target shots may have been applied seven times, or even seventy times seven, within the space of an inch in the centre of the ring; yet no blood flows, because there is no life there. The frightning image still stands, a sure token of labor in vain.

Why argue to refute a doctrine so futile? The wicked dead go down into their graves sinful men and women. They remain in their prisons wicked as they went down, till called forth. They come forth sinful beings as they went down. Death does not refine them. The grave does not change them. They remain sinners, and that without the offer of mercy, till the execution of their sentence. They are not brought forth to hear the Gospel as a message of salvation, but as the sentence of their final condemnation, which, when executed, they become extinct; become "as though they had not been." "Their place is not to be found."

Our brother in his zeal to overthrow a doctrine not believed in by any baptized professing body, has confounded things together. He has compounded, mixed and commingled the work of different ages, and different parts of ages, and of the same age into one motley mass of matter. He has failed to give a distinction of sonnets, so that unlearned and superficial readers cannot tell "what is piped or harped;" and, cannot, as a consequence, shape themselves to the music, or in other words, fit themselves to the work.

The writer in his zeal appears to have overlooked the great fact, that there are yet ages to come; not one future age merely; but ages to come, in which God will "show the exceeding riches of his grace, in his kindness towards us through Christ Jesus." This economy of God constitutes the necessity of changes, because there can be no alteration from one age to another without a change.

And there will also be changes of less magnitude, even in the same age, as may be seen, by looking back over God's order of mercy as recorded in the past history of his church. It requires more than one age, or two ages even, to develop the vast depth of the wisdom and mercy of God towards our fallen race. The great Apostle of the uncircumcision when bringing to light the fulness of God, in his great mercy in the future age, which my brother utterly excludes, as his heart enlarged and expanded over the extensive field of light, exclaims, as he reaches the zenith of his thought, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!"

Where my brother? Where do you place the great day of millennial glory foreseen by the piercing eye of the prophets and foretold by their inspired pens? sung of by the wise bards in all preceding ages? believed in by our fathers, talked over and prayed for, and desired with intense desire by the wise and good for generations gone by? reiterated in our ears by chosen apostles, and confirmed by the Great Law-giver himself? declared to be the truth of God by the Spirit of Holiness, and again confirmed by signs and mighty works? I find no place for it in your theory. That glorious day will come; it has not yet come, and must therefore be in the future. Sinners will yet flock to the standard of truth, "as doves to their windows." They will come in such multitudes, as to be compared to clouds moved by the wind. "The isles shall wait for his law."

My brother's remark as to the reward which Christ told Peter and the rest of the apostles should be given them, as the followers of him in the regeneration, reminds me of the answer given by the scribes, rulers and chief priests, to the Savior, as to the origin of the baptism of John. They could not tell. The plain and obvious authority for it, they knew was against them. So the plain meaning of Christ's remark to his apostles, lays the no future age probation theory, with one stroke of the age, prostrate in the dust. The meaning he cannot tell. But it may mean they will occupy some honorable position in some future time.

As to the contest of the devil and our Savior for a long period of time, our brother labors to prove that the number given to Christ as the reward for his sufferings, labor and voluntary humility, will be small; few in number. He gives more to Satan as a compensation for deception and lying, than to the Savior, as the reward of truth, sacrifice and righteousness. Where is the justice of God in such an arrangement? Shall disobedience be greater than obedience? Forbid it Lord.

God says the prey of a great spoil shall be divided between the two, and "the lame take the prey." This testimony gives Christ the greater portion. God does not give the exact numercial number given to either. But he says liars and deceivers shall be a great multitude to cover the earth like a cloud; "in number like the sand of the sea." But the incorruptible seed he says, shall be "like the stars of heaven and the sand upon the sea shore." Now if my brother can compute the grains of sand, he may compute the purchased seed in part. And if he can tell the number of stars, which Abraham was not able to do, and put the two together, then he can tell whether the devil will have more in number than the great Prince of Light. Then he can tell whether the subjects of good, will be more numerous in the end, than the subjects of evil. N. S.

Early Christians.

And upon the first day of the week, when the disciples were come together to break bread, Paul preached unto them, ready to depart on the morrow; and continued his speech until midnight. Acts xx. 7.

Bishop Pearce, in his note on this passage, says: "In the Jewish way of speaking, to break bread is the same as to make a meal; and the meal here meant seems to have been one of those which were agapæ, love-feasts. Such of the heathen as were converted to Christianity were obliged to refrain from meats offered to idols, and these were the main support of the poor in the heathen cities. The Christians, therefore, who were rich, seem very early to have begun the custom of these agapæ, love-feasts, which they made on every first day of the week, chiefly for the benefit of the poorer Christians; who, by being such, had lost the benefit which they used to have for their support of eating part of the heathen sacrifices. It was towards the latter end of these feasts, or immediately after them, that the Christians used to take bread and wine in remembrance of Jesus Christ; which, from what attended it, was called the eucharist, or holy communion."—Harder.

Doers of the Word.

DEAR BRO. REED:—I was glad to see that in a recent number of your paper you ask for contributions on the subject of practical Christianity. Knowledge is a good thing, but without practice, it "puffeth up," and it is only of use so far as it leads to action. There are some texts of Scripture that often come with great force to my mind, and one of these is: "He that hath suffered in the flesh, hath ceased from sin." I should like to hear your opinion of this text.

It cannot refer to our Lord, for He has not ceased from sin in the only sense in which he ever had connection with it. When on earth, he atoned for the sins of others. Now he intercedes for their forgiveness. My understanding of it is this: that the Christian life is a continual warfare, and the enemy that we have need to war most constantly against, is our own sinful flesh. All of us who have made any progress in the Christian life find how gradual and unrequitting this process is. We have good reason to be encouraged if we find we are making a struggle with any of our evil propensities, that we are able to overcome them with less of conflict than formerly, and if we can find by the habit of subduing them, any are giving way, and cease to have power over us let us rejoice, and be encouraged through God'd help to attack others. I was much struck with a remark which I saw some days ago—in looking over a school book—a manual of instruction in drawing. It was as follows: "It is expected that these directions will be repeated, until the pupils have learned to follow them from habit. When a certain way of thinking and doing has become a habit, then, indeed, it is thoroughly mastered and not before." Such, I understand, to be the Christian warfare. I heard a brother once say, "When I get into the kingdom, I expect to triumph over sin, not before." The Bible seems to teach that that is the place to receive the crown of victory—a victory that has been accomplished in this life. Our work is given us, not all at once, but a piece at a time. Our Master is the wise teacher, who takes his scholars on gradually. We may be able to do next year what we are not able to do this year, and that encourages us to perform well the allotted tasks of each day. If we choose to take our instruction in our own hands, constantly neglect the duties laid in our path for us, and aspire to those for which we are yet unfitted, what wonder that we fail?

The salvation of man is part of God's great system, every part of which is in perfect harmony. For instance, if we take up any work on the science of mind, we will find the faculties of man divided into the three compartments—"the understanding, the emotions, and the will." The phraseology used, may be somewhat different, but it is all the same in meaning. Now you may take up any author on the subject of the Gospel, and you will find that the subject is divided into these three heads. Take, for instance, from Dr. Thomas' Eureka, p. 225, which the writer opened at random, and anywhere through that book or any part of the Dr.'s writings, and as he attaches less importance to emotional religion than almost any one who could be cited, he is a good example for illustration. What is his description of the method of salvation?

1. We must believe the Gospel, (the understanding them.) 2. Have an Abrahamic disposition (the emotions), and these will lead (3.) us to obey it (the will).

Is it wonderful that the process of growing in righteousness is also in keeping with God's universal laws? By no means. It shows the plan to be his own, by accord with his general laws. Let us not think, dear brethren, that any of us shall derogate the harmony of the universe. If Christ is made unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption, it is only by tracing Christ formed within us—the hope of glory. Christ is without, to every sinner awaiting him with offers of salvation, but it is only with such as take up the cross daily and follow him, that we become worthy of him. Remember the promise, "If ye suffer with him (not unless) ye shall also reign with him." We must crucify the old man of the flesh. Christ came—let us all remember,—to save us from our sins, not to save us in our sins.

With the earnest hope that the body of Christ may every day become more and more like Christ, "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners," and may thus be ready for their Lord, at his coming. Yours in the one faith and hope of the Gospel.

SARAH MAGRUDER.

WINCHESTER, VA., April 12, 1876.

—Many think themselves blessed if others only call them so.

—Let those remain fools who will not be made wise.

Organization that Cannot be Improved.

THE CREED.

First then, what does Paul say? "I therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you, that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called; with all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love; endeavoring to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace. There is one body, and one spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all." Perfect, believe it. But, Paul, how can we raise money to pay expenses?

Upon the first day of the week let every one of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him. That's enough; we need no more.

Now, Paul, what is the Gospel to be believed? "Know ye, therefore, that they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham. And the Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed. So, then, they which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham. For ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. And if ye be Christ, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise."

How are we to deal with a disorderly brother? "And if any man obey not our word by this epistle, note that man, and have no company with him that he may be ashamed. Yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother. But now I have written unto you not to keep company, if any man that is called a brother be a fornicator, or a covetous, or an idolator, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner; of such an one no not to eat."

Now, John, how are we to fellowship each other? "That which we have seen and declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us: and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. If we say that we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth: but if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us all from sin."

Now, Paul, must we write out some guide as a creed? "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."

That's enough; I want no more. If I am thoroughly furnished unto all good works, there can be nothing better.

G. P. ALGIRE.

Prophecy.

A sermon on prophecy was lately preached in Christ Church, Belfast, Ireland, by the Rev. Wm. Stewart Ross, the incumbent, to a crowded congregation. The subject was Ezek. xxviii.

He said that the words which he had read were clearly prophetic, and had long rung among the nations of the earth as an alarm of war. The awful events here predicted will be the culmination of that time of trouble foreshadowed in the 12th chapter of Daniel, "Such as had not been from the beginning," and upon which Christ put his own broad imprimatur in the 24th chapter of Matthew, where the disciples were told that a time of tribulation should come, such as was not from the beginning of the world to this time, nor ever should be. Some persons seek to spiritualize these passages of inspired truth, and others say that the events foretold by the prophets have long since become historical, and are, therefore, not prophetic; but these passages are clearly prophetic, as nothing has ever occurred, either before or since they were given forth, which in any way resembles what is recorded here.

So far from a moral improvement taking place in the world, disintegrating and deteriorating forces are increasingly prevalent both in communities and in nations. Although civilization and science and art have most certainly ameliorated and ennobled the condition of mankind, and thrown immortal lustre upon the human race, we can not shut our eyes to the fact that civilization too often has lead and will lead to selfishness, sciences to atheism, and art to pride. Selfishness, atheism and pride. Here we have a fatal triad! So far from civilization leading to peace, war must inevitably spread her blood-stained wing over the nations. The terror of the time of blood will again cover the earth, only that more fearful will be the portents and more awful and fatal will be the vengeance of heaven than ever before.

The portents spoken of in Scripture certainly have not yet taken place. From the light which modern erudition has cast upon the passages referred to, we arrive at the conclusion that the present dispensation must soon end, and the thunderbolts of divine wrath be hurled upon a ruined and apostate world.

The whole of prophetic Scripture points to the one grand universal empire which shall then overspread the earth, and whose characteristics shall be love and righteousness and peace. But this happy end must be preceded by the troublous times of which Daniel speaks. The combination of nations referred to in the 38th chapter of Ezekiel, as interpreted by Lowth, Gesenius, Chamberlain, and others, shows that Rosh, the "northern nation," is probably the Russian empire of the present time, and the period predicted is that of the restoration of the Israelites to the promised land.

The political situation of Europe, the union that is being formed at present between the three great northern powers—Russia, Austria and Germany—and the condition of Turkey, indicate the nearness of these events. We are evidently approaching the solution of the long-pending Eastern question by the dismemberment and partition of Turkey. Turkey at this time is sick unto death. It is only a question of time, and God only can tell how short the time may be when the Russian eagle, which has so long hovered over the sick and dying man, will swoop down upon his dominions. The treaty of Paris, purchased by British and French blood and treasure wasted on Crimean plains, only secured the peace of Europe for a very short time. It has been ruthlessly torn in pieces by the Czar; the double-headed eagle now proudly floats over the dark waters of the Euxine with rapacious gaze. Russia has designs upon Palestine and upon Jerusalem, and the highway to this great prize is, of course, through the fertile provinces of the Turk, and Constantinople is the gate to Jerusalem. The predicted confederation of European powers will soon be marshalled.

Mr. Ross concluded by an eloquent appeal to his hearers to embrace the present opportunity of coming to Christ.—Christian Herald.

Jesus Is The Christ.'

John i. 14: "We have found the Messiah, which is, being interpreted, the Christ." (Margin, or the anointed.)

Matt. xvi. 16: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God."

Mark viii. 29: "Thou art the Christ."

Luke ix. 20: "Peter answering said, the Christ of God."

These texts show that Jesus of Nazareth is "the anointed of God," or the Divinely anointed "King of Israel"—"King of the Jews"—'King of kings, and Lord of lords."

John xx. 30–31: "And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of His disciples, which are not written in this book: but these are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and believing ye might have life through His name."

Elder Walter Scott wrote over the door of his academy, in the inside, the words, "Jesus is the Christ." A few extracts from his life will serve to show how this great central truth was the mainspring of whatever good there was in what was called the "Reformation," under the leadership of Elder Scott and the Campbells.

"It was not long after Mr. Scott's return from New York, in 1821, that his mind became possessed by what proved to be the great thought of his life; namely, that the great central idea of the Christian religion is the Messiahship; that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God; a proposition around which, in his esteem, all other truths revolve as planets around the sun."

* * * * * * * * *

"No one certainly ever devoted a life so earnestly and persistently to the elaboration of a single truth, as he did, to what he was wont in after years to call the 'Golden Oracle,' that Jesus is the Christ."

* * * * * * * * *

"His mind had long been perplexed with the question, 'Is there more than one way of preaching Christ?' The practice of the day, and the different, and even contradictory views views set forth, from the various pulpits, favored the affirmative, but with the Bible as the standard, and the apostles as models, he soon settled down on the conviction that while there might be many false or imperfect ways, there could be only one way of preaching the way of life and salvation, and that way, of necessity, must be that pursued by the apostles in making known to both Jew and Gentiles the gospel offer."

* * * * * * * * *

"He treated all who claimed to be the disciples of Jesus as his brethren as his Father's children."

It is painful to observe in these last-day "perilous times," that many calling themselves "Christians," and "Disciples,"—members of a so-called "Christian church,"—who actually deny that Jesus is the Christ.

1 John ii. 22: "Who is a liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ?"

Rev. xxi. 8: "And all liars shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death."

Brethren, let us "put on the whole armor of God" and continue to "earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints," the "one faith" which precedes the "one baptism" that Jesus is the Christ.

AMOS SANFORD.

The Existence of Deity Shines Forth in His Works.

Observe the variety of voice, features, and hand-writing among men. Had man been formed by any but a wise God, this variety could scarcely have existed. The same structure of parts would have produced the same effects. But now we never find two faces exactly alike, nor the tones of two voices alike, nor the hand-writing of two men alike. Children of the same family differ in their features. The same parental voice is before them for imitation, and hundreds are taught by the same writing master.

Were it not for their variety, constant confusions would occur in society. Men could not distinguish their friends from their foes, nor would written contracts furnish any security. But now we distinguish men by their features in the light, by their voices in the darkness, and their writing when distant. Surely, this must be the arrangement of a great, intelligent cause.

What is the atmosphere of our globe? A subtle, penetrating fluid, necessary to the existence of plants, of health, and of men, promoting health and comfort in all orders of creatures upon earth, and adapted by its constituent elements to this end. It is the medium by which the birds are borne aloft on beauteous wing; the organ of sound now breaking forth in all the majesty of the rolling thunder, and now delighting the ear in the soft and harmonious tones of the instrument and the voice; carrying through all places, by reflection, the light of the sun, and modifying its influence upon vision, by the early and the latter twilight; again, roused into violence, and for the blast, the storm, and the hurricane to disperse and purify the noxious vapors that otherwise would make the world one entire burying-field. Would any upon reflection, be so bold as to assert that a substance surrounding the earth, and yet so different from the earth itself, and subserving such important ends, happened to come into existence? Does it not display contrivance and design? Whose is the mind that designed this instrumentality? Intelligent nature with one voice exclaims: "This Being is God!"—Messiah's Herald.

Gospel Success.

Bro. John Foore, of Galesburg, Kansas, reports the baptism of three persons near Parsons, Labette county, recently; also the baptism of seven persons at Big Creek, Neosha county. In these localities two or three years ago there were congregations of the Christian (derisively Campbellite) church, numbering 100 and 130 members, but the Spirit (not immortal, but) of investigation, has entered in among them, and their preachers are no longer enabled to interest them.

A recent letter from Bro. J. W. Lovesee, of Ft. Scott, Kansas, states that three baptisms is the the result of one discourse delivered in that place. Also that the prospect for good there, is good, as the people manifest a great desire to hear.

During our last visit in the vicinity of Maxenkuckee we had one addition, and succeeded in organizing the congregation which now numbers 33 members. The regular time and place for meeting is at Marmont, and on the 3d Sunday and Saturday evening before in each month. Social meeting on the 1st Sunday. G. M. MYERS.

Two committees have been at work for four years on the revision of the Bible, one in this country and one in England. The work of each committee is submitted to the other for approval. The English committee, at work on the Old Testament, has reached the thirtieth chapter of Jeremiah, and the American committee, engaged on the New Testament, has reached the seventh chapter of 2 Corinthians.

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Indiana.

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christian King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

The Resurrection.

BY C. F. SWEET.

To the brethren and sisters scattered abroad, greeting: As the Christian courtesy and forbearance of the official managers of THE RESTITUTION have allowed me a corner in the paper, I propose to speak to you, and all the readers of the same, occasionally, and although subjects are many, and also important, yet none more so than the Resurrection of the dead.

And as I meditate upon the subject, and also perceive the fact that there are some, to all appearance good men—Christian men of seeming candor and soundness in faith on all other points, perhaps, that still deny the resurrection of the wicked dead. And by them the subject is being agitated with, no doubt, more or less effect, which facts lead me to make the subject of "the resurrection" the theme upon which to write in the first place, a few numbers.

As I have considered, reviewed, and investigated the whole subject, of course there must be a result, and that certainly is, unless something different is presented to my mind from proofs, texts, arguments, or evidences, as yet seen by me. I must set the sentiment along side of others of like nature, as being, according to my candid and better judgment, only supported and sustained by inference and assumption. I admit that when a doctrine is fairly and positively established, by absolute testimony, that then, and not until then, have its advocaters any right to one or any inferential text, or testimony. But to my mind, the no-life to the wicked, by a resurrection from the Adamic death, does force a construction upon certain texts quite contrary to the real intention of their author. As, for instance, John iii. 36, Jesus says, "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, and he that believeth not the Son shall not see (to supply the ellipsis it would read, everlasting,) life. Now, for me to say that this text is positive, or absolute proof that the wicked will not receive a resurrection to a corporal and animal life from the death entailed by Adam, is to force an unnatural, unwarrantable, and illegitimate construction upon the text. For this testimony looks at the kind of life qualified by the word "everlasting," which evidently refers to the gracious gift of Jehovah, as a reward of well doing, to be bestowed at the judgment, as the "gift of God through Jesus Christ."

Therefore, the doctrine in question, has no parentage here, and in fact is no more sustained by this class of texts than as though they were not in nor a part of the Gospel. As we are all to be judged by the Gospel, let us take care how we treat it, lest we 'o-ing now, while on trial, its perverters. Its simple, plain, and unambiguous statements, as the rule of judgment, then, shall condemn our conduct, when too late for reformation, and repentance may be hid from our eyes.

"He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." Here is another text that demands our attention, namely, Isa. xxvi. 14: "They are dead, they shall not live. They are deceased. They shall not rise. Therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them and made all their memory to perish." Now, says the advocate of the doctrine in question, "Is not that positive?"

We answer "Yes, very positive." And is also very pointed proof that the wicked sons of Adam will be destroyed, as a punishment for their own individual sins, when God visits, in judgment, and rewards them, every man according to his work.

But, says the affirment, "Adam's posterity were made subject to corruption by being excluded from the tree of life: (It was) not * * * a penal infliction on them."

In reply to this statement, I will call upon the old apostle to the Gentiles; perhaps his testimony may be of some account in this controversy with those who fear God and tremble at His word. Mark! the assumption of the opponent is, that death resulting from the circumstances of Adam's progeny being excluded from the tree of life, was not to them penal. Now, father Paul, how is that? "Wherefore as by one man sin entered the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men (in whom—margin,) "all have sinned." Verse 18. "Therefore, as by the offense of one (man Adam) judgment (sentence—McKnight) (condemnation—Syriac) (sentence—Whiting) came upon all men to condemnation."

The Lord our God saith, "Come now and let us reason together," importing that God's dealings with men commends itself to man's unperverted reason. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" says the opponent.

We answer, "Yes;" and ask is it right to pass the sentence of death upon the uncondemned—the Gentiles, and those without fault or forfeit; and not only pass the sentence of condemnation, but execute the judgment with unrelenting vigor? Is such administration in harmony with man's unperverted reason? We can but say, no! How, then, in the name of unperverted reason, shall we account for the death of the unoffending infant? We answer, it has not offended any law by its own acts or agency as an independent individual. But its life was a part of its father—Adam's life at the time he sinned, and no part of Adam's life was exempted from extinction by the sentence of, and judgment by, the penal law of condemnation to physical death. Adam's entire self, life included, whether in himself, or in his offspring that came out of his loins (Gen. xlvi. 26) as constituted by the law of pro creation, is under the sentence of condemnation, as a death penalty for his sin. Shall I not repeat this very important truth that, that part of Adam's life that his children possess from him, as their progenitor, is forfeited as fully by his act in them, as in him, hence, no part can escape the penal infliction of law.

Hence, we see the propriety of death passing as a penal infliction on all the race, as father Paul has testified, and also the force of Job's inquiry: "Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? not one." Therefore, as our father Adam's life in full was under judgment, how can his progeny be brought out of his loins, and possessed of his life, and at the same time not be subject to the same physical penalty of death with himself?

Unperverted reason says it is impossible, for the children's life being a part of the condemned, while undivided, being afterwards divided into separate parts does not exculpate any part from the penal infliction by the law. If it did, why not exculpate all the parts as well as any, and in that case where would be the majesty of law? The assumption that the death of Adam's posterity is not a penal infliction on them, in consequence of Adam's violation of the law of God, is far-fetched, and I think very dear brought. It may do for some, but it is opposed both to the word of God (Rom. v. 12-18) also (1 Cor. xv. 22) and unperverted reason.

Now, "If the foundation be destroyed, what shall the righteous do?" or if the foundation of the doctrine is thus laid in sand, is it safe to invest capital in the edifice, or if the premises are false, will they bring the enquirer to a just conclusion? Here again, unperverted reason says no!

That all the sons and daughters of Adam are by nature the children of wrath, penal infliction of physical death; and need the interposition of the grace of God, through Jesus Christ, to give them that salvation therefrom that is common to man, and will obtain without their agency as really with all, and unto all, as with and unto any.

But, says the objector, "You have not answered that text, namely, Isa. xxvi. 14, to my satisfaction, I admit with you that it teaches a complete and positive destruction of the wicked. But as I understand it they are now dead and destroyed, never to be raised from the dead any more than brutes, for the text shows that the work is already in the past tense."

To that assumptive argument I would only say, "God the eternal, with whom all things are present, calleth those things that are not (yet accomplished) as though they were," for as all things are present with him, that is included in his eternal counsel, and purpose, and as the death and final destruction of the wicked is included in his counsel and purpose, he here speaks of it as though it were in the past, for to him it is in the present or past, as really as in the future.

On this principle of Scripture interposition, I claim that Isaiah xxiv. 21-23 and xxvi. 14, are in harmony, and one explains the other; for as in the xxiv. it is clearly shown that at the coming of the Lord "the hosts of the high ones, kings, etc., that have been wickedly oppressive, will then be punished with national punishment, as other nations and kings have been punished before them, and after thus punished they are imprisoned in the pit, (no doubt Sheol or Hades is the place indicated) and after many days (doubtless 1,000 years are here alluded to, synchronizing with the judgment and reign of Christ over the world,) shall they be visible."

For what purpose shall they be visited, I ask, but to execute the purpose and counsels of Jehovah, and reward them with a personal and individual reward for their own individual acts, and deeds done by themselves, entirely independent of their corporate or national relation, or acts, and also independent of any entailment of condemnation by their progenitor, Adam.

Hence, it is very manifest that Isa. xxiv. 21-23 is the key to a correct interpretation and understanding of Isa. xxvi. 14. And the visitation of God upon the wicked kings and oppressive rulers of the former, after the many days, looks forward to the closing scenes of the judgment day of a thousand years, which God has appointed in which he will judge the world by Jesus Christ, for the realization of the latter, when all things, now so much out of harmony, and so very much disjointed, shall all be made newer, and this world of sin and sorrow, now groaning under its heavy curse, shall be so filled with the excellent glory of the Shekinah, that it may be with heaven itself, and will be their inheritance forever and forevermore.

The conclusion of the whole matter, therefore, is that Isa. xxvi. 14 affords not an inkling nor one particle of proof that the wicked children of Adam will not be raised from the death entailed upon them by his sin. But in my future numbers I hope to relieve the subject of all mist and fog that has, and does still prevail on some, no doubt, good and sincere minds.

Laying Up Treasure.

A friend related, in my hearing, an incident of our late war, which illustrates the way it may be possible to lay up for ourselves treasures in heaven. The son of a wealthy Northern gentleman was taken prisoner while fighting for his country, and held by the confederates. Happily he did not fall as many did, "among thieves," but found among his jailors men whose worldly wisdom saw (far in the distance it may be, but sure) the final triumph of the Union cause. They had ventured all they had when they took up arms against the government; and now, houses, lands, stock, slaves, were only represented by what would soon be worthless paper. Here was an opportunity to turn some of it into gold, and store it up in Northern coffers. "Take all you want of our money," said they; "we promise to do well by you, but you must promise in your turn that your father shall put to our credit at his bank in the North, all that you spend here. Then, when the war is over, all our riches will not have taken wings.

He did so. The confederates dealt out the money it took to buy his daily food, and he sent home the account. A father's love was keeping register of all they spent for his beloved son. And when the war was over, there was treasure laid up for those who had foreseen the evil and hid themselves, as the Bible says a prudent man does.

Have we a bank account in heaven? How much of this world's filthy lucre have we given here to find it there transmuted, by God's wonderful alchemy, into imperishable riches? —H. M. I., in New York Observer.

Life.

How much is included in this single expression. In meditating on this subject, we love to begin with the beginning of life. The infant in the cradle is watched with interest, and with anxious eyes We see the thoughtful and loving mother bending over its cradle, and wondering what passions may be folded up within this tender bud. How carefully she watches the unfolding of every passion. How careful she is to check every development of evil. If she be a mother in whose breast dwells purity; and how rejoiced she is, if she sees in her child strong marks of love and purity. We see the mother portraying to it the gladsome receptions that await it if it pursues the proper course, and the dishonor that awaits if it trampies under foot the love of right. It listens with rapt attention, for such is the nature of the child.

We see it passing on through childhood filled with childish desires, and acting, in infinite play, the things it will act in after life. Still the maternal eye is upon it, and in fact, the mother almost invariably moulds the character of the child.

Its mind is filled with golden fancies; bright air castles are built; and the tottering and falling of many does not cause it to relinquish its airy architecture.

But the time comes for it to launch out on the sea of life. Sadly he takes leave of the parental roof; but though his eye moisten with tears which he has no desire to suppress, his heart beats light with expectation. The world remains yet untried to him.

We will pursue the average youth. He rides upon the wings of phantoms; he mounts to giddy heights and is often mortified and grieved to think that his flight has only been imaginary. We need not follow him through his numerous day dreams. Let it suffice to say that they never cease through life. But then there are many pleasant and painful realities connected with his course. He forms new acquaintances, and makes new friends. They grow dear to him till his happiness seems to depend upon their happiness. But life is subject to changes. Death tears many of them away; he is grieved at the separation, but fate inflicts no wound which time cannot heal. New friends take their places; the old ones are forgotten, and his boat glides on. But losing friends by death is not the only manner in which he is separated from those he loves. Fortune calls many away; but he grieves not as when death summoned; for, through life, a strange magnet acts to check his grief; he expects to see the loved ones again. But the saddest and most bitter parting is when they are torn from him by hate. The pangs pierce his soul. Everything connected with their memory has its pang. He may sustain injuries from those who once sought to do naught but good. Again, there is another class seeking to do him evil. How carefully they watch every movement. Every act is recorded and set forth in disparaging colors, so that he often grows weary of the burden they delight to lay upon him. But he speeds on down the stream of life. He has crossed the meridian, and has learned much by experience. New cares have presented themselves. Children now play about his knee, as he once played about the paternal knee. He now feels the anxiety once felt for him. He is now grieved with the little acts of rebellion that once grieved his father; he looks forward to the time when his children, too, must go out into life, as he went out in his youthful days, and he carefully warns them against the rocks on which he ran, and never ceases to instruct them how to proceed until they are beyond his reach; and though they have been rebellious, yet his sympathies are with them. Their griefs are his; and their joys likewise. And then comes advanced age, when he has retired from active life, and seeks comfort in seclusion. The noisy whirl of business, which once animated him, is now annoying; the children's prattle, which once pleased him, is now banished from his home; he seeks comfort only in living on the past: he recites to the young his many achievements; the mind that once was vigorous is now decayed; the hand once strong is now weak; the eye once bright with the fire of love, or of expectation, is now dim: the head once covered with smooth and glossy locks, is now whitened with the frosts of many winters; the elastic step is exchanged for the tottering step that speaks a speedy departure from this life. We will watch him on to his last step. The present world, with all its changes, its joys and sorrows, its defeats and triumphs, is growing dim. Mourning friends and relatives draw around to receive his last farewells; the curtain of life drops; we see him removed to his final resting place, wrapt in his last sleep; the grave closes over him; he is laid away to be forgotten by all but God, who has promised to bring him forth unto judgment.

And so, in view of the life of man,
Which at longest is but short,
We should take hold with willing hand,
A philanthropic work.

The Strait Gate.—No. 3.

"Enter ye in at the strait gate; for wide is the gate and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be that go in thereat; Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it."—Matt. vii. 13, 14.

We have endeavored to show in our former articles what we must not do; and that by thus doing, we run the fearful risk of losing our eternal life, and the promised inheritance in the kingdom of God. We now propose, in the affirmative, to show, or set forth, what we must do in order to enter through the strait gate, and the narrow way, which leads into the future and everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. We do not expect to tell you many things you do not already know; there are but few, that read the RESTITUTION, but what have had line upon line in the way of sound Bible instruction; and if they miss the kingdom it will not be for not knowing. The three first prerequisites are, repentance, faith, and obedience, in baptism; all after these are additions. Add to your faith all the Christian graces enumerated by the Apostle and when this is done, there will not be room nor occasion for overloading ourselves with the business, cares, and riches of this present life. This brings the followers of the meek and lowly Jesus into a very strait and narrow way. The path of self-denial is a very difficult one to travel in. Must I carefully and truthfully observe and do all those things the great teacher has so carefully, and minutely stated? Answer this one question; for in it you will find an answer; for what, or for whom, they are written. We may have a vague idea that the great teacher does not mean all his words express; be not deceived, God is not mocked, what a man sows, that shall he also reap. Sooner will heaven and earth pass away, than one jot or little pass from the Lord, till all be fulfilled. Inasmuch as ye have not done it unto the least of my brethren, ye have not done it unto me. Will the Master require an exact account of our stewardship? That is plainly answered in the 19th of Luke, when the nobleman returns from a far country, he reckons with the servants for the improvement of the talents, and rewards every one as his works shall be.

We wish to be definitely understood, as to what we believe and teach, as to the necessary qualifications to enter the strait gate, and the narrow way, that leads to eternal life. We hold out no false issues to men, nor use the endearing appellation, dear brother, to men who refuse to come to the feet of the dear Redeemer, and be buried with Christ in baptism, in the likeness of his death. You may call us uncharitable, or radical, or what ever you please, it won't hurt us a bit. The Master has given us the rule, and set us the example, and commanded us to walk and work by that rule. Amen.

Where is there any authority for believing that any man or woman will enter into the kingdom of God, without first having heard the word of the Kingdom repeated, believed the covenants of promise, or the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of the anointed One, and been baptized upon an intelligent faith into the name of the holy ones for the remission of sins? Yes, we believe what you say, or rather what the Scriptures teach in laying the foundation on the rock. Must I carefully live out to the letter all the teaching and the commands of the Master? Who ever enlists in a military campaign but makes up his mind to don the military garb, and conform to military law and discipline? Shall the king be less exacting with those whom he proposes to make joint rulers with himself in the kingdom of God, over the world for the ages? Will the Divine Father be less exacting with us, than with his well beloved son? Don't let us make the fatal mistake, and flatter ourselves that we have made a good confession before men, if we are a little loose in our faith. There is no harm in getting many in adding house to house and farm to farm even if I do not need them all just now. Do we not know that the Scriptures work against heaping up treasures? and they that will be rich, fall into a snare, etc. We do know, from careful observation, that there is but very few that God can trust with gold and silver. Call to mind your own knowledge and experience; where men have embraced the truth, in the love of it. In humble circumstances, as they have increased in the good things of this world, are they as ardent for the truth, are they as ready to give according to their means, as when they had but little? I have not so understood it. The gate is strait, and the way is narrow, from the first to the second advent of Christ, from the opening of the door, to the close of the times of the Gentiles; and so with each individual. No man, that puts his hand to the Gospel plow and looks back, is fit for the kingdom of God. In the early days of Methodism, a lady came forward and joined the church. She was very enthusiastic, and after the meeting was over, she started to go out, but turned back and said, "I want it understood I have joined the church for life." Even so must it be with the believers of the good news of the kingdom. No time for loitering; by the way, none for heaping up riches, none for worldly aggrandizement, or for gratifying the old man of the flesh; but a time for close discipline, a time for much secret and fervent prayer, a time for holy, godly living. Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh. NEWELL HONK.

Exposition of the Law.

And after the reading of the law and the prophets, the rulers of the synagogue sent unto them, saying, Ye men and brethren, if ye have any word of exhortation for the people say on. Acts xiii. 15.

The custom of reading the law, the Jews say, existed a hundred and seventy years before the time of Christ. The division of it into sections is ascribed to Ezra. The five books of Moses, here called the law, contained fifty-three sections, so that by reading one each Sabbath and two in one day, they read through the whole in one year finishing at the feast of tabernacles, which they called "the rejoicing of the law." When Antiochus Epiphanes burned the book of the law and forbade the reading of it, the Jews, in the room of it, selected some passages out of the prophets which they thought came nearest in words and sense to the sections of the law, and read them in their stead; but when the law was restored again, they still continued to read the prophetic sections, and the section for the day was called the dismission, because usually the people were dismissed upon it, unless any one stood up and expounded the Word of God to them. This is the reason of the message sent to the apostles, "Ye men and brethren, if ye have any word of exhortation for the people say on." —Exchange.

Let facts and not faces be known in judgment.

Let Him rule than who said, Let us make man.

Let us do our duty, trusting in God for safety.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT

☞ Bro. Wiley Jones writes us a friendly note about the non-appearance of his protest. He will find it in last week's issue. Time solves many difficulties.

☞ Sunday was a day of progress to our society in Plymouth. In the afternoon three were baptized by Bro. Myers. Our congregation is growing, and the people seem to take a deep interest in the Gospel of Christ.

☞ Brother Magruder's article will appear next week. We give Brother Sweet's this week on the universality of the resurrection, and one from another of our brethren who concludes none but the righteous will be raised. Brother Sweet and Brother Magruder will probably furnish one or two more articles each.

☞ Bro. A. F. Dugger, who was at one time a Sabbatarian, then out, then back in again, and then out, is again in. Bro. D. is all right when he is with Paul, but when he gets back to Jerusalem with James, he is head and heart with the law. Please see Acts xxi. 20. When Bro. D. finds that we are "not under the law, but under grace," he will probably get out.

The Law and the Prophets.

Perhaps no one phrase in the New Testament is more generally misapplied by a certain class of expositors than the one named above. It is claimed that the phrase, "law and prophets," as used by our Lord in Matthew v. 17-19, means the ten commandments and the prophets. This is not only a wild guess, but a positive denial of the testimony. Let us examine a few texts where this phrase occurs, and see just what is meant by it.

Matt. vii. 12: "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets."

Matt. xi. 13: "For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John."

Luke xvi. 16: "The law and the prophets were until John; since that time the kingdom of heaven is preached, and every man presseth into it."

Luke xxiv. 44: "That all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me."

Acts xxiv. 14: "Believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets."

Rom. iii. 20: "But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets."

The foregoing quotations are sufficient to show that the phrase, "the law and the prophets" does not mean the ten commandments and the prophets. The phrase applies to that system of things revealed through Moses and the prophets, which was in force during the Judean polity. It is no strange that honest men will persist in reading in the phrase, "the ten commandments," "the moral law" and "the ceremonial law" and the like, when no such phrases can be found in the New Testament. The same remark will apply to the idea that God had two laws in the Mosaic age.

To show the fallacy of such reasoning, we have only to substitute their definition which is purely human. "For if they which are of the ten commandments (law), be heirs, faith is made void and the promise of none effect." Rom. iv. 14. If the reader will only place the idea of the ten commands in his mind while reading the New Testament, he will find it impossible to make the theory successful. But it seems almost useless to write upon a point which is so plain to the student of the new covenant. Men are yet misled as Barnabas was by those who claim that all in the transgression of law when the Book says, "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin."

Political Corruption.

In an editorial of the last issue of the New York Observer, under the significant heading—"Decay of Public Virtue"—we notice the following statements:

"But he must be mentally and morally blind who does not see that the political condition of the United States is rotten to its core, and through it. So wide, deep, and universal is this corruption, that we have come to accept it as a matter of course; we cease to be horrified by the daily developments of wickedness that are made; we regard the revelations of frauds, of embezzlements, of bribery, of sales of influence and office, as part of the spoils, and to be expected of men who have the chance to make money by getting into power.

The leaders of the people, men high in station and in power, have been drenched in corruption to their very souls, and the wickedness has been made known; but the people are not alarmed—scarcely indignant—and apparently love to have it so. They do not rush to arms, as they would if a foreign enemy were coming in like a flood. They are more concerned—we say it very deliberately—the newspaper press of this country and the people generally, are more concerned about these things as to their effect on the party to which they belong, than upon the national life. At this very moment, when the odor of unearthed corruption "is rank and smells to heaven," he is regarded as timid and craven who prophesies evil, and insists that positive danger to our civil institutions is imminent. But the truth is, that bad men have conspired to rule this country, and good men must combine to overthrow them."

This is a fearful state of things, indeed! Let us, however, hear another witness of a different nationality and religion;—the editor of the Jewish Chronicle in the last issue of that paper. His editorial is headed, "THOU SHALT NOT STEAL." He speaks of Moses, that inspired prophet, whose face shown with the reflected glory of the Eternal, as being faithful in giving the above words, and adds:

"But Moses, who was what to-day is a very rare thing, an honest, conscientious official, certainly never dreamed a time would come when dishonesty should race like a pestilence throughout a great land, affecting high and low alike, and dragging into disgrace the most honored men of an entire nation. It really appears as though we should never arrive at the bottom of this iniquity, as though every public man were more or less saturated with the filth of peculation. Every form of deceit which promises to bring in money; bribery, the selling of votes, the peddling out of offices, forgery, embezzlement, fraud in all of its forms, seemed to be practised, and it really looks as though no man could be trusted. Congressional investigating committees unearth new frauds, daily, no week passes that some bank official does not decamp with the accumulations of other people, and the daily press is burdened with a record of the violation of the eighth commandment."

We are not writing for political effect. We have taken no part in politics for many years past. In fact, our own convictions are, that the two political parties, now contesting for power and place, have alike a sad record to present to the world, in this our centennial year. The better part of the people, belonging to each party, are becoming despondent and anxious about the future of our beloved country. We give one more extract on this head from the New York Observer:

"Ex-Governor Horatio Seymour, a venerable statesman of the Democratic persuasion, is reported to have said, very recently: 'The Republican party has lost the confidence of the country, and the Democratic party has not gained it.' We do not affirm, either that he said so, or that he said truly, if he did so say. But the utterance is the heart conviction of many who are saddened by the revelations of the hour, and who are continually asking, in the words of the prophet, 'What will ye do in the end thereof?' It is well to look toward the end, to put on the brakes, to avert coming calamities, and by prudent measures save the future."

We believe that each party has, within its pale good and honest men; men who would prefer the general good of the country, to mere party success. The evils complained of in our extracts should not be attributed to parties, as such, but to the prevailing laxity of moral sentiment and want of principle. It is, in our view, a sign of the times. God has given man an opportunity to demonstrate the utter impossibility of delivering any nation from the wrong and ruin there is in the world, by any form of human government. Republicanism will prove a failure. Sin has entered into the world, and, while thorns and and thistles grew rank in the natural soil, the moral fields are covered with plants of a more obnoxious growth. The benevolent Redeemer sows wheat, but the enemy sows the tares. The growth of the latter is becoming strong and luxuriant. The Patriarchs age of Uz long ago discovered, that—"The earth is given into the hand of the wicked."

The rich and the poor have expressed dissatisfaction, and sighed for the higher unattainable good. Antagonisms have rendered the oppressor and the oppressed alike miserable; and conflicting elements distract the political as well as the natural and moral worlds.

But the Supreme One has made known his determination to establish a kingdom of peace, purity, and righteousness upon this earth. The now-absent Nobleman will, ere long, return from the far country, and assume his vested rights as King of kings, and Lord of lords. The true princes will then wear robes and crowns of royalty under King Messiah. Then paradise will become world-wide, and fair as the Eden that bloomed in the childhood of humanity. Creation now groans in the throes of travail for the resurrection birth, and manifestation of the Sons of God. In the crowning ages of glory, man shall no longer be the slave of demagogues and brute forces, but shall attain his long-lost dignity and power, his inheritance and kingdom, in the glorious restitution of all things.

Will the Wicked Dead Ever be Raised?

BRO. REED:—I wish to occupy a small space in your valuable paper, to give my views relative to the destiny of the wicked. In doing so, I do not wish to raise any controversy for its own sake, but it seems due to myself and friends that I should vindicate what I now consider the Bible teaching on the subject, viz.: The non-resurrection of the wicked. By a thorough, and I trust a prayerful investigation of the Word relative to the subject, I was compelled to change my views in relation to this subject about two years ago, but have said but little, and wrote but one article on the subject which has not been published, and for what reason I do not know; possibly it did not reach its destination. My silence on the subject, seems to have given occasion for some of my friends to think, and some even to say, that I do not more than half believe it, not that any of my friends, and but few even of my enemies, believe me to be hypocritical on this or any other subject which I am ever called upon to advocate; sometimes delusion is the cause assigned; but I wish to be as brief as possible, and waive all further apology and proceed at once to the subject under consideration. 1st, I think that the 15th chapter of 1st Cor. in almost every verse is a complete refutation of my former views and the popular ideas now entertained. The two first verses gives the key note to the whole, viz.: Declaring it, i. e., the resurrection to be "the Gospel" by which we are saved by a belief and obedience to the same; no qualifying of the term resurrection to fit to the condition of the wicked. Query now, is the resurrection of the wicked, (admitting it for arguments sake to be true) "the Gospel," or even any part of it? The Bible rule of interpretation, recognized by all at least who belong to the household of "the one faith," forbids it, viz.: That it is "not yea and nay." And something must be "added" to the word to favor the popular view. Who will incur this responsibility? The Gospel, as defined by all the Bible writers as the glad tidings of the kingdom—the hope of Israel—which is the hope of the resurrection—which is the new birth—the spirit birth,—the induction of the candidate into eternal life, the only life which Christ ever promised to give to the obedient; for it must be remembered that to them only, the promise applies. The wicked possess no germ of eternal life; all the life they possess, they inherited by the first Adam. Christ, who is styled the second Adam, gives eternal life to his followers. The Bible, and common sense even, forbids the idea that the resurrection of the wicked can constitute the "hope of Israel," for which Paul was bound with a chain. What is understood by the term, hope? Answer, it is the relying on some promise made, in which both desire and expectation center. Does the resurrection of the wicked constitute a desire for a moment to be cherished? It must be, to constitute hope.

Again, if there is any text in the word that speaks of the resurrection otherwise than something to be desired, I am not aware of it, i. e., where it is sustained by the context. I anticipate two or three will occur to the reader which formerly constituted the great citadel, or bulwork, in which I formerly took refuge, and which all who still cling to this doctrine still think is proof invulnerable, viz.: Daniel xii. 2; John v. 28, 29, and probably some others, I will notice hereafter. But first we must seek an interpretation which will harmonize the whole teaching on this, as well as on any other subject. Unless harmony can be found, no instruction is at all amiable, and the labor spent in search of the truth on any given subject is lost. In studying the Bible, as well as the writings of any author, we must find the central idea of the same. Keeping this in view, we may, and do often find harmony, where otherwise we should find chaos and confusion.

We have found what the great central idea of the Apostle Paul was in the texts adduced, as we shall find in all the writers on this subject, consequently there can be no discrepancy between his writings and the rest, and also with himself. He does not even hint of any resurrection, but what is something to be sought after—conditioned, and also greatly to be desired—"If by any means I may attain unto the resurrection of the dead," or as in some translations, out from among the dead ones.

Query: Would he be willing to become a martyr in order to attain the resurrection which the wicked will have, on the hypothesis our opponents assume? where no condition is either expressed or implied?

The first objection which I will notice, is found in Daniel's prophecy, twelfth chapter and second verse. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life and some to shame and everlasting contempt. This does not even imply that all men, irrespective of character, will awake from the dust; the context does not necessarily express or imply a resurrection of dead men from the literal death state, but of a natural resurrection of Daniel's people, the Jews or the children of Israel, the same as in Ezekiel xxxvii. concerning the dry bones, which the prophet declares to be the whole house of Israel. The learned Prof. Bush translates it thus: "And many of the sleepers of the dust shall awake; these (the awakened) shall be to everlasting life, and those (the unawakened), shall be to shame and everlasting contempt." Eben Ezra, a learned Jewish Rabbi, says: "Those who wake shall be appointed to everlasting life, and those who wake not, shall be (doomed) to shame and everlasting contempt." Gaon, another learned Rabbi, says: "This is the resuscitation of the dead of Israel, whose lot is to eternal life, and those who do not awake are the forsaken of Jehovah."—Bush on the resurrection.

Dr. Adam Clark says, this text "has been referred to the future restoration of the Jews."

Many more learned linguists might be cited to prove that the restoration of Israel was the theme of the prophet, but these must suffice.

John v. 28, 29, is brought forth as the grand key-stone of the arch, the grand climax of the whole of the argument to sustain what is thought to be invulnerable, viz.: "Marvel not at this, for the hour is coming in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of condemnation." The people whom Christ addressed were Jews, and his object was to convince them that he was the Messiah foretold by their prophets. He always addressed them as a nation and not as individuals, taking them down the vista of time into the kingdom state, or age to come. They did not believe he [Christ] was the center of prophecy, and invested with power to raise the dead.

I have extended this article much longer than I intended and shall be obliged to close soon without bringing a tithe of the testimony which might be adduced for the purpose. I shall, therefore, introduce but one text more. Acts xxiv. will furnish what many think an unanswerable argument. Having hope toward God * * * "that there shall be a resurrection both of the just and the unjust," by connecting the context, we see that Paul was arraigned for preaching the resurrection through Christ and him alone as the ground of his, and Israel's hope, and it doth not appear that the apostle endorsed the Pharisees resurrection at all, i. e., so far as the unjust are concerned; but as much as to say, why do you make so much ado about my preaching this doctrine, when you pretend to believe in the resurrection of the aged of Abraham, even going one degree farther than I can go, i. e., to include the unjust; but they wanted some pretext for thus arraigning him.

M. I. LEWIS.

The Ascension.

Can the popular theory be true that man is immortal, and that the spirit leaves its tenement of clay at death, to be transported by an angel to the courts of heaven, when the ascension is declared, in the Scripture, as taking place, not at death, but at the last trump?

Let me call your attention to a few expressions of 1. Cor. xv: In ver. 51 the apostle says, "Behold I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, (or die), but we shall all be changed." When does this take place? at death? No; for Paul says, "In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye." When? "At the last trump." Then is when we are to receive our reward; "For the trumpet shall sound, and we (the living) shall be changed." It is plain from this language that deliverance is not at death, but at the last trump.

Again, Col. iii. 3-4: "For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory."

Turn now, again, to 1 Cor. xv. 19-25, which reads: "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable. But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept. For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." Remember; "But every in his own order; Christ the first fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming. Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet."

So it is evident that Paul's hope of a future life depended on the thy resurrection.

I might quote numerous other passages, my dear reader, to prove they must be raised from the dead and be judged before he is permitted to enter the abode of happiness. But I believe this is enough to satisfy the reader.

O, my friends, let us search the Scriptures, and center our hopes upon the resurrection. For soon Christ will come to gather his lost one's home. Your brother in Christ,

JOHN W. AGNER.

Notes by the Way—No II.

While in West Irving I preached seven sermons, and visited among the following brethren: Levi Marsh, H. Cady, John Kitys, Sister Adams, and also Bro. Marshman's, all of whom I found alive in the cause, and prepared to give a Bible reason for the hope within them. Myself and Bro. J. F. Prime, by request, visited a point four miles north of West Irving, where we preached six discourses. While there, we found a very pleasant home with Bro. Levi Sugart, who is a member of the church at West Irving, but lives in the country, and is a well to do farmer, and a whole-souled Christian. His wife, Sister Catharine Sugart, during our meeting, took her stand in favor of the truth. May she ever continue faithful, and in the end receive and wear the crown of life that fadeth not away.

March 8th, preached in Belle Plain Benton county, Iowa. Here I found a number of brethren who are looking, for that blessed hope. We were made to feel at home by Brother and Sister Wiswill, who are intelligent in the things concerning the kingdom of God and name of Jesus. We also enjoyed a very pleasant visit with Brethren H. M. Gibbs, Thomas Hollis, George Cruson and his estimable wife. I do not know as I have ever enjoyed a meeting better than with these brethren in Belle Plain. After preaching, quite a number spoke of their hope in Christ, and determination to prove faithful unto the end.

March 9th, took the train for the west; arrived at Rock Creek 4 p. m.; found a Baptist minister had been reviewing me on the question, is "Man a Free Agent;" he taking the position that he is not. In the evening I spoke again on the subject, showing both from reason and Scripture that he is; also on the evening of the 10th continued the same.

March 11th, took the train for Newton, from which point I had arranged for conveyance across the country to Colo to attend the conference, but was disappointed. However, I have no one to blame but myself, as I failed to write to the parties, as I should have done. When I arrived, finding them gone, I concluded to walk across, so I left Mrs. V. B. Dugger with Sister Mary Aulls, and struck out on foot. Walked twelve miles; but it was so rough and turned so cold that I gave it up, and like Lot's wife, looked back and was content to return, promising myself that I would do better in the future.

March 14th took the train for Xenia, Mo., where we arrived March 17th, almost worn-out, having had no sleep for two whole nights in succession. We were greeted by Brother and Sister Isaiah Huffman, who keep a pilgrim's home, and show by their works of faith, labor and love that they are interested in the blessed truths which are so near and dear to us as a people. After one night's rest, I found myself able to fill my appointment at Xenia. We had out a full house, as is usual for this place.

A. F. DUGGER.

Our Hope is Sure.

Let us rejoice that ultimately the object of all our prayers and efforts and desires, and of the work of Christ will be accomplished. The work will be done. Jesus our Lord must reign. All his enemies and ours must be put down. Humanity must be redeemed from sin and Satan's power. The earth, too, must be redeemed from the curse that now rests upon it. The birthplace of Jesus, the scene of his suffering, must yet be the place where the triumphs of his grace and his glory and power shall be displayed. This earth has been baptized by the blood of the Son of Man. Here, too, his saints' blood has been shed in honor of his name. That blood is the pledge of earth's future and glorious redemption. Here, where the Church of our Lord has fought and has won her spiritual victories, will she be crowned. Crowns of glory await the now contending Church. We shall be crowned. Our Lord shall reign and with him we shall reign on the earth. Come Lord Jesus; come quickly.—Rumsey.

Spirit of Christ.

The apostle is clear on this subject. He says: "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his." Rom. viii. 9.

Have we the Spirit of Christ? Are we meek and lowly in heart as he was? He says, "Come unto me, ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls." Matt. xi. 28, 29. What an excellent spirit is the spirit of meekness! The meek have the promise, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." Matt. v. 5. A person may be meek, and not be a Christian, but no person can be a Christian and not be meek; for meekness is an essential element in the formation of the Christian character. Without it there can be no true piety, not even the semblance. Meekness is mildness, willingness to forgive. It is, as Paul says, "Forbearing one another and forgiving one another. If any man have a quarrel against any, even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye." Col. iii. 13.

Are we the servants of the Lord? Then we are meek, teachable, kind and good. "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom, teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and hymns, and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord." Col. iii. 16.

Let us note and put in practice the injunction, "teaching and admonishing one another." If we do this, we shall learn to love the brotherhood and shall enjoy the peace of God ruling in our hearts.

"And the servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patient, in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves, if God peradventure will give them repentance unto the acknowledging of the truth." 2 Tim. ii. 24, 25. Gentle unto all men! What a lovely character! Such are the faithful and wise servants of the Lord. They proclaim the Gospel of the Kingdom, a message of peace, and of its spirit drink.

Brethren, let us come to the fountain-head, and drink freely of the Spirit of him who said, "Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you, bless them that curse you, and pray for them which despitefully use you. And as ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise." Luke vi.

This is the Spirit of Christ. What a noble Spirit! If we have not this spirit, we need not flatter ourselves that we are his. This is the light which, like a city set on a hill, cannot be hid. No, if we possess it, it is not hid, but it shines out and gives light to all that are around us.

A. F. DUGGER.

The Coming of Christ.

J. C. KIMBEY.

Jesus saith unto him, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? follow thou me. John xxi. 22.

This was said to Peter concerning that disciple whom Jesus loved. And if the coming referred to was the vision of Patmos, we have something definite, something that upsets men's theories of his coming to Sinai to gather together his saints; for just where one like to the Son of Man was seen by John, there will he appear in person. And this was in the midst or center of the candlesticks, and the seven stars are over the seven churches. The midst or center church is Thyatira—and this church is that wife, Jezebel, the church that was wedded to the nations, that said, "I sit a queen, and am not a widow." She is not a virgin, for she has daughters, but she is that wife Jezebel, and is not a widow until divorced; for she was wedded to the nations. And then she asserted her rights, and reigned over the kings of earth.

If the figures of prophetic visions mean anything, then this is the place where Jesus will appear, and here will the elect be assembled to him. And this woman is the dead body around which will the eagles be assembled. The eagles—the nations that destroy, eat her flesh and burn her in fire.

Americans may quiet their nerves about the old lady of kingdoms taking up her headquarters here, for she leaves not the back of that scarlet beast till he is given to the burning flame. And that beast that has the seven heads and the ten horns, is not America. Catholics may multiply here like grasshoppers, but still Rome will be their headquarters till the end.

But the coming of Messiah for his saints, is not his coming to Jerusalem, and all the saints with him. First the gathering, then the the triumphant march to Jerusalem.

Man's breath is in his nostrils, and won't be there long.

Memory is said to be the daughter of attention.

The World to Come.

There is a bright world by the prophets we're told.
Where no sickness invades and none shall grow old;
The sun will not fade from its heaven of blue;
I long for its glory to burst on my view.

No poison will lurk in its sweet, balmy air:
No thunders will mutter, no lightnings will glare;
No storm-cloud in wrath will sweep over its skies;
No floods will devour, and no tempests will rise.

No simoon will blast with its message of death;
No demon of hate fire the passions of men
Till earth is dyed red with the blood of the slain.

No cannons will roar, and no camp-fires will burn;
The sword from the carnage to tillage will turn;
No war-flags will be to the breezes unfurl'd.
But the banner of peace will wave o'er the world.

From the mountain of God will issue the word,
And nations will bow to the will of the Lord,
And the kings of the earth their honor will bring,
And lavish their wealth at the feet of the King.

For knowledge shall cover, as waters the sea,
This fair earth of ours, and the curse shall not be;
In the place of the thorn the fig-tree shall grow,
And rivers of gladness in deserts shall flow.

Correspondence.

BRO. REED:—Having read Brother Hobbs' "Landmarks and Keys to Prophetic Interpretation," and then comparing those thoughts of his with my own printed in the RESTITUTION years ago, on the subject, I ask is the new covenant now in force?

Well, I must hold out my hand to Bro. H., and say, Amen! God bless you. Bro. Reed, I and began to feel very lonesome in the writing and the preaching and the talking of such unpopular doctrine or teaching, but since reading Bro. Hobbs' article, I will take fresh courage, and desire to ask of you a few questions.

1. If the old covenant is actually found recorded in the 20th chapter of Exodus and 5th chapter of Deuteronomy, and not once found in the Prophets, beginning at the 1st of Isaiah to the last of Malachi. Then I ask of you, S. A. C. and J. M. S., and others, why do you call the Psalms and the writings of all the prophets, the old covenant or Old Testament?

2. What covenant is referred to in the 9th chapter of Dan., especially in the last five verses?

3. Are you certain the covenant to be confirmed (or established) for one week, can ever be the new covenant spoken of by Jer. xxxi. 31?

4. If Jesus of Nazareth ever confirmed (or established) a covenant now or old, for one week or one thousand years, where do we find the record?

5. Why do you refer to the writings of the apostles, as the new covenant? when neither one or the other of them ever wrote what the new covenant of Jer. xxxi. 31. was.

6. How could God make the new covenant with the house of Israel (the twelve tribes) when in the condition as described in James i. 1?

7. Why do our brethren claim to have left "Papacy or Babylon," and yet cling to her division of the Scriptures of the old covenant and the new, when speaking of the prophets and apostles?

My brother, ought the Scriptures to be divided then, by those who claim to have been planted upon the foundation of apostles and prophets? Not on the old covenant or the new covenant!

I have asked those questions of you to be answered as soon as convenient for you or any other brother to do so through the RESTITUTION. And if the 5th, 6th and 7th are answered in the affirmative, and the chapter and verses to prove it thus saith the Lord, I shall then be able to hand that "paper" containing such evidence to my inquiring children, for the inquiry is, "I can find the old covenant recorded in Exodus and Deut, but where can we find the new covenant that Jehovah promised to Israel after those days? Yes, we know the apostles allude to, yea refer to it, and Jesus himself, yet what is it? and the words of it, that shall produce such marvelous results spoken of by Jeremiah and Paul. Where shall we find it? We want to "rightly divide the word," but not as "papacy" does it, no, no, no!

S. S. HAYDEN.

BRO. REED:—It has pleased God to spare my life through another winter, but I feel that my time here is short and uncertain. I am in my 82d year, and have many warnings that I am but mortal.

My only hope of immortality is through Christ, our law giver, at the resurrection of the just. If there is no resurrection, I despair of a future life; but the theology of the present day ignores this doctrine, and renders it altogether superfluous. There is no promise in the Bible of any sky kingdom, "beyond the realms of time and space," that people prate about in their fancy, for it is nothing better than the "baseless fabric of a vision."

The earth restored, made new, and purified from all the corrupt governments that have for 6,000 years entailed death and misery on our race, will be heaven enough for me, with Christ and his saints, kings and priests executing judgment and righteousness in the earth. Those who prefer a far off realm of disembodied ghosts, that they tell us are immortal, and do not occupy space, etc., and no one knows its location, are welcome to their dream, if they can find it, which I think is very doubtful.

I see by the RESTITUTION, some are anxious to find out how large heaven is; but if our D. D.s are correct, it is a matter of little importance, for one half acre would contain all the human race that ever lived, and leave room for another world or more; so that unlimited space may in time become a "vast howling wilderness," when we all get into the spirit world. Oh, for something real and tangible, let us not forsake the word of God, and turn to fables.

J. PARRY.

Let me say to the dear brethren of the one precious faith "that we of like faith" in the town of Bavanna, Mo., and vicinity, are trying to be in a condition to receive the welcome applaudit from the Master when he comes. We are trying to keep in the narrow way, and relying upon the sure words of prophesy, having implicit confidence in the captain of our salvation if we keep in memory and live in accordance to his admonitions, we will pass through the strait and land safely in the harbor of Kingdom of our God and his Son. We meet every first day and partake of the bread and wine, believing if we fail to do so that we forsake the assembling of ourselves together as the manner of some is; and too, if we fail to eat the flesh of the son of man and drink his blood, then there is no life in us; and if we fail to come together to admonish one another of duty, then we fail to occupy, and by a failure in occupancy we will fail to get into the Kingdom. The bread and wine as left us by the Master is our "Tree of Life," and if we fail to eat and drink thereof we die no alternative.

Since I have written any word to the RESTITUTION, we have been made to rejoice by having brother and sister J. W. Helm and family, and brother Daniel Howard, brother Amos, and brother and sister Hobert come and cast their lot with us; and I had the pleasure of immersing brother Amos wife during the winter just past. These, together with the brethren and sisters formerly here constitute a very respectable "little flock." We would be glad to have other brethren who are zealous in the cause of the Master to come and labor with us. Your brother in hope that He may soon come.

J. E. CALLAWAY.

Finances.

Reasons why I am opposed to the non-elect law of giving a certain per cent. of one's income, as a basis of church organization and a test of church fellowship:

I am not opposed to the proposition that every member of every church, who chooses to do so, should give one, or forty per cent. of their income for benevolent objects, but I contend that every other member should have the same liberty of giving, without respect to the per cent. plan in the days of the apostles.

The per cent. law is made a test of church fellowship. No one can be admitted into the new church—no one could be tolerated there who should not agree to obey this law. A man might be an obedient believer of the Gospel of Christ, and been baptized into him, and have full evidence that he had passed from death unto life, and yet be shut out of the church.

I am, therefore, opposed to this scheme, because, (1.) it demands submission to a mere human invention as a condition of becoming a member of the church. One can pass all the tests required by the Bible—can, by faith and obedience, become a member of the body of Christ, and yet be shut out of the new organization that works so beautifully. Any man, by faith and a Christian character, can be accepted of God, and be finally saved, and yet he is not qualified—is not good enough for membership in this very select Ecclesia. (2.) The law of the Christian dispensation does not require us to give in this way. If we were away back in the Jewish dispensation, we should be bound by the law then in force to give ten per cent. of our income. We should have "to give tithes of all we possessed." But we all believe that the laws of that dispensation passed away with the dispensation.

If the law of Christ demanded of us a certain per cent., we would cheerfully submit. His command is to call no man master. Hence we decline to receive this new law at the dictation of any man as master. The general law of Christ is to love our neighbor as we love ourselves. We are to do unto others as we would have them do unto us. Does this law require one per cent.? I would not have others give a one per cent.; hence, I am not bound to give that particular sum to others. But it is contended that Paul's instruction, (2 Cor. viii. 13) "For I mean not that other men be eased and ye be burdened, but by an equality, that now at this time your abundance may be a supply for their want; that their abundance also may be a supply for your want, that there may be equality." That this law of equality binds us to give one per cent. supplemented by four of net income, I can't see it in that light. For, first, the equality spoken of was not an equality of giving among the members of the church at Corinth for their brethren at Jerusalem, but the equality was between the church at Corinth and the church at Jerusalem. The brethren at the latter city should not be eased, and the brethren at Corinth burdened. The equality consisted in the repayment of this charity by the brethren of Judea, when those in Corinth should be in want. This passage has been entirely misunderstood, and misapplied. It is not equality of giving by the members of either church, but between the two churches, when the church of Corinth should be in want. This financial scheme does not produce equality. Different brethren with the same income differ widely in their circumstances from each other. Some have much more expense than others and more at one time than another. Hence each one must judge for himself how much he should give at any given time, and for any specified object. The law is, "He that soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly, and he that soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully." "Every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give." "For God loveth a cheerful giver." If we are wise in this matter up to what is written, we shall not have to answer for not going beyond what is written.

I am opposed to this scheme because it always lays a heavy burden of figuring out the income and outgoes, especially on many brethren who are farmers and advanced in life. They do not feel called upon to tithe the mint and anise—all vegetables and grains, and set down every item at the close of the hard day's labor. They have enjoyed the liberty of the Gospel too long to come under any such yoke.

There is danger, too, now as anciently, that in "tithing the mint and cummin," scrupulously, it will become the chief thing and the weightier matters of the law—judgment, mercy and faith will be neglected.

It may be said that our old mode of raising money to spread the Gospel, by subscription, has no law for it. True, it has not, and therefore we would not make it a condition of church membership. We have apostolic example for voluntary contributions, and any member may decline to subscribe if he chooses and give his word or pay the cash. Lastly, I am opposed to pressing this scheme because it does and will divide the body of Christ. There are already too many divisions among those looking for the Lord. A majority cannot endorse this plan, therefore it should be withdrawn.

The Eastern Trouble.

It is impossible to say from the current dispatches what the precise drift of the insurrectionary demonstration in Turkey really is. What is reported as a great success of the insurgents on one day is claimed to be a Turkish victory on the next. The Carlist war in Spain was not more prolific in shifting and contradictory rumors than has thus far been the insurrection in Herzegovinia. The one thing that is clear, however, is that the rebellion is not only far from being quelled, but is manifestly on the increase. The Turkish commander in the field, telegraphs to his minister of war: "The Prince of Montenegro openly made war upon us. About seven thousand well-armed and regularly organized Montenegrins had joined the insurgents." The Russian government has also been informed that the Servians mean to take the field in May. There is every reason to believe, therefore, that all the disaffected provinces are on the point of making common cause in the effort to throw off the Turkish yoke. That the Porte has a vivid apprehension of such a contingency is apparent from the rumors of an intention to raise what is called the standard of the Prophet, that is, to make a fanatic appeal to the Mohammedan population to come to the rescue.

It is very obvious, however, that it is not its own subjects alone that the Turkish government has to fear. That power that is always in the background of Turkish troubles, which not only hides its time for realizing its traditional aspirations for an outlet through the Mediterranean, but is ever ready to hurry up the moment when Constantinople shall be its own, is hovering on the outskirts of the present complication. It cannot be proved, of course, that Russia is supplying either means or encouragement to the Herzegovinians and their insurgents, but they certainly act as if they had nothing to fear from St. Petersburg. All the efforts of Austria to allay the pending trouble seems to be paralyzed through some mysterious influences, although that government has the apparent co-operation of Russia.

It is well known that the German policy, as it has been called, has been rapidly on the wane in Russian councils of late, while the Slavic influence which urges the building up of another nationality on the ruins of Turkey, has spread from the Russian masses to the governing orders. Hence come the rumors of the Czar's intended resignation and the accession to the throne of his son, who is the favorite of the Slavic party. It is not probable that this party will induce the government to push its policy by means of war at present, but it induces a disposition to keep Turkey in continual dissension and difficulty as the surest means of relaxing the hold of the Mohammedan power in Europe and hastening its escape to Asia. It is the play of these great agencies and contiguencies which invests the present disturbances with lively interest, and makes it well worth while to note every change in the unfolding drama.

Gleanings.

Bro. Amos Sanford writes: "Commencing April 11th, I gave nine lectures in the Christian church, at Heyworth, McLean county, Ill. Mystic Babylon became thereby aroused, and the immaterialists talked loudly and bitterly against the truth, on the streets, but none of their champions would come out and discuss the questions at issue.

Their efforts were intended to keep people away, but notwithstanding, all their opposition and the busy season of the year, the attendance of worldlings was good.

Judge H. A. Karr, with whom I stopped, is not a member of any church, but is interested in the truth with several others, and I have hope of some fruit in the future.

A sectarian correspondent of the Bloomington Appeal gave me the following complimentary (?) notice in the Heworth items, last week:

'Just now a fanatic is inflicting upon our town, in small doses, the soul-sleeping nonsense.'

He wrote this before I had said anything on 'soul-sleeping,' and while I was speaking of 'the things concerning the kingdom of God;' but with the sects of this place, the Gospel is 'nonsense.' It will be a witness against them, in the day of judgment, unless they repent. Brethren, pray for the success of "the word of the kingdom."

Anti-Christ.

BRO. REED:—I wish you, or some one prepared to do so, would write an article or two on anti-Christ, as I am not clear on that point. Is it not absurd to be looking for Christ's second coming if anti-Christ is yet to arise, and do the work that is assigned to him? If the word anti-Christ signifies opposed to Christ, as Christianity; how can a believer in Christ be anti-Christ? Does the latter part of the eleventh chapter of Daniel refer to the anti-Christ? If so, has not Mohamet, or the turkish power fulfill it? Does he not rule over Egypt? Has he not planted the tabernacles of his palace between the seas in the glorious holy mountain? Yet he shall come to his end, and none shall help him. Does the second chapter of 2 Thessalonians refer to the same power? Paul says that he is to exalt himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped, so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God. Does not the Mohammedan mosque at Jerusalem fulfill it? Yours in hope of the coming kingdom.

West Lebanon, Ind., August 5 and 6.

W. M. STEPP.

The Michigan church conference will hold their annual meeting at the brick school house three and one-half miles north of Mendon, St Joseph county, Michigan. It will commence Thursday evening, June 3, 1876, at 7 o'clock p. m., and continue over Sunday.

Those will meet the trains at Mendon village, and convey all who come to the meeting.

Brother Myers and others from Plymouth, Ind., will be there to assist in preaching the word. All whom Jesus and his apostles have constitutionally invited to be with us. Every church in the state should be represented by as large a delegation as may be. Brethren should arrange their business for the occasion so as to meet in conference and worship at least once a year.

E. HOYT, Secretary.

The next quarterly conference of the brethren of the Abrahamic faith will be held at Windfall, Tipton county, Indiana, commencing on Friday before the second Lord's Day in June, being June 9, 1876, and held over Lord's Day. All are cordially invited to attend.

By order of COMMITTEE.

The annual conference of the Church of God of Northwestern Kansas will convene at Arion, Cloud county, Kansas, June 22, 1876, at 2 p. m.

A general invitation is extended to all lovers of our soon coming Lord to meet with us and participate in this sacred gathering.

We confidently expect that Brethren Green, Kinsey, J. F. Thompson, will meet with us. We want to make it one of the best meetings we have had here. Why can not all the lovers of the coming King attend? Our gathering when he comes will be sore. Let us have a little foretaste in our voluntary meeting here. Come one, come all. Arion is 7 miles south-east of Concord.

By order of the church.

LOTT CLOVER.

There will be a meeting of the brethren of the Church of God, four miles south-west of Osage Mission, at a school house known as South Liberty, beginning on Friday before the third Sunday in May, 1876, to continue over Sunday.

Come one, come all. Gano, Beethem Green, Kinsey, Wilkins, Hayden, Stringer, Bott, Hayworth, Smith, and all.

Those coming by rail may write to O. R. Bennett, Osage mission, Neosho county, Kansas. Those coming to Galesburg, write to John Foore, Galesburg, Kansas, saying whether they will arrive on Friday or on Saturday. Teams will be in readiness. Let there be a general attendance.

JOHN FOORE.

There will be a meeting held at Hickory Grove school house, in the south-west corner of Ringgold county, Iowa, commencing Friday evening, May 26, 1876. Brother A. F. Draper is expected to be with us. Cannot Brother John F. Fisher, of West Irving, be with us at this meeting? Also Bro. Wright, of Fremont county; Amor Calloway, Robinson, and Bro. Baldwin, of Union county. Come brethren, one and all.

Those wishing to attend may correspond, if they wish, with G. W. Jarred, of Logan Grove, Iowa, who will give any information they may wish.

THE

AMERICAN CYCLOPEDIA.

A Comprehensive Library in Itself.

A Great National Enterprise in which every American may Take Pride.

Published by D. APPLETON & CO., 549, 551, Broadway, N. Y.

The Cyclopedia, now in course of publication, is entirely rewritten, and appears with about 4,000 maps and illustrations. To be completed in sixteen volumes of 800 pages each. Fourteen volumes now ready.

In the experience of book making and selling, this work is without a parallel. With the multiplication of steam presses, the publishers are still unable to meet the demand.

The sale has since it reached over 200,000 volumes, and this in hard times! The demand for the work is but fairly commenced; the orders are largely multiplying and the indications are that the sales of the work for 1876 will greatly surpass those of the previous year.

Thus the most sanguine expectations of the publishers are more than realized.

The publishers again repeat to the public that no expense has been spared in the writing, editing, or publishing departments of the American Cyclopedia.

The cost will be more than $300,000 to prepare the sixteen volumes for the press.

The Doctrine of Immortality. By James H. Whitmore. This is a work that has been in market several years. But it is an exhaustive treatise upon the subject of Immortality, and sets forth the Bible view in a masterly manner. Every student should have it in his library for reference as well as use in loaning to those who are feeling after truth. It contains 300 pages. Paper covers, 40 cents.

Emphatic Diaglott containing the original Greek Text of what is commonly styled the New Testament, according to the Recension of Dr. B. F. Griesbach, with interlineary word for word English translation; a new Emphatic Version, based on the Interlineary translation, on the readings of eighteen critics, and on the various readings of the Vatican Manuscript, (No. 1209) in the Vatican Library; together with illustrative and explanatory foot notes, and a copious selection of references, to the whole of which is added a valuable alphabetical appendix. 853 pages, 18 mo. bound neatly in muslin. Price $1. Extra binding, $1.

Waiting the Beauty to Come.

Not all earth's sweets would we enjoy,
Nor gather all its flowers while passing over
Life's strange, enchanting vales. For having all
Of sight and sound to please,—and deep engrossed
In siren Pleasure's smiles; with dallying ease
In Satan-slippered feet, close walking
By our side, and pointing with her soft
Voluptuous hand to quiet bours of easy rest,
'Mid birds, and flowers, and playing fountains;
With canvas, marble, bronze, and lettered page,
Their deep enjoyment; and pleasant rooms
Wrought into harmony's sweet, inharring
Imagery;—the journey's end, that goal,—
For which true wisdom lays up store, and bends
Her every energy to reach,—that goal
Would be forgotten. Far better we Should take the humble way, and walk content
With poverty; should bear the sneers and scorn
Of wealth's proud votaries,—or taxes,
Like Lazarus, from pity's hand, our daily bread,
Than ride like Dives in carriage of state,
Soft-cushioned o'er, and silk-clothed, and set
With ornaments of gold; and nothing have
Beyond. To spend our little day with playthings
And throw improvident away, that life
To come, with its enduring substance,
Is worse than childish folly. We can wait
For lovely things, until the dawn shall come,
And shadows flee, and in the living glow
Of splendors eye hath never seen, re-bilded
We live. He, who runs a race, stops not
To gather flowers. So we run all
To win the crown, and willing, bide the time
Our God has set to name the victors.
And to adorn the brow of each with well-earned laurels.

S. ROXANA WIXOM.

The Cross.

BY REQUEST OF A. DREW.

Will you come to the cross,
That I died on for you,
To save you from death,
So justly your due?

'Tis the Savior that calls,
It is God that implores,
For sinners to turn,
And be sinners no more.

O, flee from this world,
Its temptations and care,
And take up the cross—
It manfully bear.

There's a mansion prepared
For the poor and distressed;
Where death enters not,
And the weary find rest.

Theological Notes, Noted—Their Omissions Supplied in Brief.

1. "The house of Jacob" Luke i. 33, were the people subject to David and to those who sat "on David's throne in Zion." True, I add. But all these are as distinct from "Christians," who are called out, from both Jews and Gentiles, as the law and Temple worship, and kingdom of Israel, were distinct from the Gospel! I should as soon confound earth and heaven! See Luke ii. 32; xxii. 29, 30; xxiv. 21 and 44.

Christians are not to be subjects; but co-heirs, co-kings and "reign with Him." Rev. v. 10; xx. 7; Rom. viii. 14–19; Luke xii. 32. Do think!

As Rome has reigned over Israel, desolated her city, sanctuary and land, and worn out the saints—Christians; as foretold by all prophesy; through this "age" this "reign over the house of Jacob" (Israel) must be future, as sure as "the Lord is God!" Amen.

Babylon, the beast and the devil "that deceived the nations," must be burned or bound ere this "reign" can be enjoyed.

II. "The lost ten tribes," or "the kingdom of Israel," is "known unto God;" and, hence must appear in due time, distinct from and yet with Judah. One hated, the other was cast far off. Yet "He hath sin; I will make her that halted a remnant; and her that was cast far off a strong nation and the Lord shall reign over them in Mount Zion forever!" Micah. iv. 1–7; Ezek. xxxiv. 31; xxxvii. 1–28; Jer. xxxi. 31–34; Heb. viii. 8–12; Rev. vii. 1–8. "The twelve tribes" are distinct from the Gentiles. Verses 9–17.

III. "Age to come—(he says) is not a Bible phrase; but ages to come is without limitation." I reply, this word for "age" (world or dispensation) is used over 600 times in the Bible. Its form of relations vary; but all "notes" on the Bible should recognize "the Bible phrase;—this world (age) that which is to come." Matt. xii. 32; Mark x. 30; Luke xviii. 30.

Here are three times from three Evangelists, the Bible word, with its proper and necessary "limitation!" Nay more the fourth Evangelist uses it (for ever John vi. 51–58; xiv. 16) from the lips our Lord and Judge.

The "limitation Brother F. denies to it in its plural form," (ages to come) becomes open and apparent error at once by St. Paul's "other ages." Eph. iii. 5. These "ages" had then passed and having been limited by the necessity of the case, they demonstrate the absolute error of the "notes."

Please note the necessary "limitation" in all like cases, where a series embodies the fact of limitation; as nations, Sabbaths and Sabbathic years, or "ages to come." They must be limited or there could be no succession!—no plural! Eternity unbounded duration, has no plural.

"Probation" has existed among men and angels. It has varied much with human conditions from Adam in Eden to our present Gospel age but while "this age (world) has its end," Matt. xiii. 39–40; xxiv. 3; xxviii. 20; yet there is still another and a varied condition revealed Zech. xiv. 16; and often implied from the promise to Abraham Gen. xxii. 18; and quoted all through the Psalms and prophets; the Gospels, Epistles and Revelations. It belongs to "the kingdom." When "the rest of all the nations shall go up to Jerusalem;" and pay their homage to "the King the Lord of Hosts!"

My space forbids enlargement; and I need only to add:—"Known unto God are His works from the beginning of the world," Acts xv. 18, and he inclined us of just this state of the remnant "nations;" and of the penalty they will incur so far as "they come not up to Jerusalem to worship the King." Zech. xiv. 17–19; Isa. lx. 12; Psa. lxxii. 11–17; Rom. xv. 8–13; Rev. xv. 4; xx. 3–7. The only objection lies in our darkened imagination, that assumes the opposite against all Scripture and all the reasons of faith to the contrary! Mark! some portions of truth belong to the past "ages;" more to the present; and yet "the burden of the word of the Lord" belongs to "the age (world) to come." Heb. vi. 5; Matt. xii. 29, 32. True, all portions belong to us for instruction as to God's ways, but we need "rightly to divide the word." Amen.

The preaching of Paul to the Gentiles was to the objecting Jews, as the half heathen "language of Ashdod;" but their objections rebounded with terrible severity on themselves, which will reach to "the end." Let us beware! Thess. ii. 16; 1 Cor. x. 1–11.

IV. "The hope of Israel," was the hope inspired by the promise of the Messiah as a whole and his kingdom. To this hope, of course, the resurrection of the just was essential to "the reign of the saints and the restitution of all things spoken by all the prophets." Acts iii. 21.

"Knowledge is easy" to some; but not possible to others, who take impression in place of the word that alone gives light on all such essential parts of truth.

V. "Judging the twelve tribes of Israel, Matt. xix. 28, a judicial action (says our author) and not an executive or regal work." This note of his omits all notice of "the twelve thrones" which are the correlative of royalty and of "executive and regal work!" It also omits the Bible usage of corresponding terms;" David reigned over all Israel; and David executed judgment and justice unto all his people." 2 Sam. viii. 15. This is also the prophetic announcement of Christ's reign, "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous branch; and a king shall reign, and prosper, and execute judgment and justice in the earth." Jer. xxiii. 5–6.

Nay more; "the saints" are to be "kings,"—the holy twelve not excepted! "Thou hast redeemed us—and made us unto our God kings and priests; and we shall reign on the earth!" Rev. i. 5–6; v. 9–10; xx. 6–7. Now, own up Brother F., the truth is clear.

Surely the author of such "notes" needs some one to note and supply his omissions, which are far more abundant in truth, and grace, and glory than his notes embrace. His note, if made the measure of his future honor, would forfeit his royal title, and his "regal work," as king altogether! For "according to your faith be it unto you!" My "little faith" takes in the regal title and regal work!—"an abundant embrace, and a full reward!" Amen.

VI. "Restore again the kingdom to Israel; Acts i. 6, the kingdom (he added) will never be restored to fleshly Israel."

In noting this I would recall the correction needful, which I made long since. "Fleshly, earthly," and like terms fall off from all whom God takes up in grace as rulers or subjects of the kingdom. All we need to know in order to believe is to read and rely on God's ever abiding word. When he says that "Christ shall reign over the house of Jacob," it should suppress all objections and "fleshly" evasions! When he says "In his days (Christ's) Judah shall be saved and Israel shall dwell safely;" I do not indulge a doubt but that when they "shall be saved" their fleshly, veiled hearts will be unveiled. Then they will bow to Jesus and "obey thine" as their Messiah, and say, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Matt. xxiii. 39.

The official honors of "the first born—the sovreignty, was taken from them; and now through grace it belongs to the seed—the called to Christ. Matt. xxi. 43; Heb. xii. 23. But how strange that this truth to a believer, should even seem to annul or falsify all other Scripture which names "the twelve tribes" and "Israel and Judah:" as subjects of "the great king." "Let God be true" and trustworthy altogether. Please note, "Israel—the twelve tribes"—must be subjects, as surely as Christ and his bride shall reign! These two facts are interwoven and inseparable in all Scripture like our text. i. 33; Jer. xxiii. 6.

What would "the twelve thrones;—and thrown of glory," be besides empty words, except "the king of kings," and his co-kings are to reign and do "regal work," and so often revealed? In the name of all that's true, I ask, is it our mission to cut away and throw aside all such associated and combined Scripture pertaining to the reign of Christ and his saints? Is it a worthy work to reduce the texts in these notes to the smallest one part of some other text? Are "we" so great that "we" ought to prune away the exuberant ideas of "thrones—regal work" and subjects? No! no! "The counsel of the Lord that shall stand." Amen.

Jesus and the Intermediate State.

In the RESTITUTION for March 22d, a writer makes reply to an article of mine upon the above subject, but he has, perhaps, unintentionally enlarged upon what I do not dispute, and remained silent upon the point I laid strong emphasis upon. I regret this, because it is to these overlooked points the brethren need their attention called. As earnest searchers after the truth, we should not blind any enquiry or fear to look fairly in the face any aspect of a question which we feel infiltrates against our position.

We do not yet know all truth, and we cannot imagine we are beyond mistake. Will you, therefore, Mr. Editor, permit me to put in as brief a way as possible, what I think really needs examination in regard to this parable (and not only it, but the multitude of passages bearing upon the question of an intermediate state).

I do not dispute that the parable may be a "rebuke against the evil of riches improperly used and a divine portraiture of the judgment scene." It may mean all that and more. It was not to what it precisely signified, but to the utterly strange incongruity observable in Jesus ever making use of such a parable if he believed there was no intermediate state of consciousness, and that to hold such ideas was a perversion of the faith. I asked if any of the brethren would invent a similar parable, and took leave to affirm they would never dream of it.

I do not argue that the scene in the parable ever will or can take place exactly as represented. That you ought to know is not essential in the construction of parables, but you will admit, surely, that the drapery of such word pictures is largely drawn from actual fact in this or that department of human life or the fields of nature. I pointed out that the parable expressed the common or popular belief of the Jews, a factor in the enquiry not of a minor but of major moment. No example like this would be followed by any brother in relation to popular belief now, and it would be considered as playing into the hands of the purvertors of Scripture to do so.

My argument is that Jesus believed in an intermediate state of consciousness. Hence he was perfectly consistent in using such a parable. To suppose otherwise is to suppose him imprudent and misleading in his illustration, to say the least of it, and to do what no sound reader of the RESTITUTION would do. I cannot conceive it possible for any one of our readers—argue for an unconscious interval after death—using the parable simply to teach the evil of an improper use of riches, and at the same time remain absolutely silent, so far as warning their hearers is concerned, not to think they meant to teach there was consciousness after death. I repeat it emphatically it would not be done. The use of such a parable, therefore, has to be accounted for by you fairly, honestly and logically. Who will attempt it?

My remark in answer to the supposed difficulty about tongues, eyes and other members of the human body being referred to in the parable is also quite overlooked. It is apparently concluded that spirits cannot possible be spoken about as being either parts or members. How is this arrived at? Is it supposed a spirit is necessarily a nonentity so far as form and shape is concerned? I pointed out the apostles' idea of a spirit as shown on the occasion when they were affrighted at the sudden appearance of the resurrected Lord in their midst. They clearly believed that a spirit had all the form and proportions of a human being when visible.

I would put it to the candor of the readers that an argument is not answered until it is answered at its best or strongest. It is useless and futile to reply to what may be the weaker or more easily disposed of links in a chain of reasoning, and leave the larger and stronger ones remaining intact. Besides, I would call attention to the fact that such a style of argument as "we feel bold in saying that the parable of the rich man and Lazarus refers," etc., is inadmissible in the absence of anything like proof, and this followed by the assertion—"having fairly shown that Jesus was not talking about the disembodied souls of men," etc., will never pass muster for argument with any mind capable of distinguishing between proof and assertion, but though having much to say I must desist, feeling I cannot ask more of your space at present. I ask, however, calm and dispassionate examination of the whole subject, and especial attention to the points I have specified.

We are all entirely familiar with the blasphemous absurdity of literal hell fire, torments, pre-judgment, etc., and to dwell upon these is like "beating the drum ecclesiastic" to drown a questioner, who may be considered troublesome. If I thought it were so I should cease at once troubling any who are content to remain as they are; but I fancy the RESTITUTION means progress in truth, and liberty of speech to all who seek it in the love of it.

I am yours,

WM. HICKS.

F. S. I am referred to Eccl. ix. 10, to prove that there is no knowledge, etc., in the grave, while it seems to be forgotten that I adduced that the same chapter as evidence that the dead have neither reward nor resurrection. It proves too much if read literally; see verse 6. I fear the matter only receives surface reflection. W. H.

A Time For All Things.

A time to weep, and a time to laugh; a time to mourn and a time to dance. Eccl. iii. 4.

In the foregoing we will only consider the expression "a time to dance." We think we can hardly do justice to the subject, on the account of ill health and not being very well versed in the Holy Scriptures; and being young in the cause, and in life. But nevertheless, we will proceed. We find, by reading the Scriptures, that they never danced only after a victory, assisted on the part of the Lord, over their enimies; for the Lord anciently, always helped his children through their troubles (or, stood by them). We find in Exodus xv. 20, where they danced; "And Miriam, the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand; and all the women went out after her, with timbrels, and with dances." We find here that it was after the Lord had conquered their enemies that they danced; and they did not dance as they do now; it was with praise to the Lord, and only the women danced. We find that the Lord turned David's mourning into dancing. He says: "Thou hast turned from me my mourning into dancing; thou hast put off my sackcloth, and girded me with gladness." Psa. xxx. 11. David did not dance as they do now, but with praise to the Lord. Do they praise the Lord by dancing now? no, they do not. We will quote a few more passages that speak of dancers. "Again I will build thee, and thou shalt be built, O, virgin of Israel; thou shalt again be adorned with thy tabrets, and shalt go forth in the dances of them that make merry." Jer. xxxi. 4, Luke xv. 25, Job xxi. 7–12, Rom. xiii. 12, 13, Gal. v. 21, Phil. iv. 8, Judges xi. 34. The reader will please refer to the preceding quotations. We find it is to them who by patient continuance in well doing who seek for glory, and honor, and immortality; that eternal life is promised. Rom. ii. 7. Did one ever hear of any person ever being converted to the Lord Jesus in the ball room? no; but, on the other hand, from bad to worse, and finally so so far that they will never return. Would one of those that had spent their days in the ball room when on the dying bed, send for their dancing master to comfort in their distress, in their last moments? no, they would send for the best Christian they knew to sing with and pray for them in their dying hour, although before this they laughed the Christian to scorn, ridiculed him, called him old fogy, etc. But we hope the day will come when all people, nations, and languages will turn to the Lord. "The Lord is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance." 2 Pet. iii. 9. And the Apostle Paul says "Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we persuade men." 2 Cor. v. 11. But there are those that will not be persuaded; they turn a deaf ear to all appeals of holy writ, and say "go your way, and at a more convenient season, I will call for thee, I want to enjoy more of the pleasures of this world; I want some more of this world's goods, etc. But the day of the Lord will come upon them as a thief in the night, and in an hour when they look not for him, and he shall appoint their portion among hypocrites, there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. I hope for the long prayed for time to come when the Lord's will shall be done in earth, as it is in heaven, Amen.

Bones And Blood.

With all our gettings we have at last got the relics of a saint, even of Saint Benedict. We have a cardinal, and one of the cardinal doctrines of the cardinal's people is faith in the bones and blood of the saints. His church has shed more of their blood and broken more of their bones than any power since the pagan empire was superceded by the bitter despotisms of Popes. And there is a sort of grim hypocrisy in giving up the Church to a strong delusion and the belief of a lie; so do I now, in the face of the civilization and light of this century, and of enlightened America, these blinded people still venerate the relics of men, whose existence is a matter of doubt, and whose bones and blood are no more likely to be preserved than the toe nails of Adam or the tears of Eve on leaving the garden of Eden.

In Spain and Italy they are still humbugged by the priests who trade in these miserable fictions. But it is pitable indeed to know that on the heights of Weehawken, within sound of New York church bells, such nonsense is perpetuated, and even gloried in. One of our city papers, of April 24th, thus records the scene:

"The Brothers of the Passion have constructed a beautiful altar dais in the chapel of the monastery at West Hoboken, for the reception of the relics of St. Benedict. Portions of the body of this saint, with a vial containing some of his blood, have lately arrived from Rome, with a wax image of the size of life, of the martyr. These relics will be deposited in an opening made in the side of the statue. The vial will be in a chalice, and visible. The solemn dedication of the altar consecrated to these relics will take place May 14th, and they will then remain for the veneration of the public."

Respectable Protestant office holders or anxious seekers of office, participate in such mummeries as this, and thousands give money to support a religion which teaches the ignorant people to venerate these pretended relics of a man! There is something in it so disgusting to the soul of one who worships a risen and glorified Redeemer, that it is scarcely possible to speak without indignation of the performance of these impostures in the very midst of our centennial celebrations.—*N. Letter From a Converted Priest.

To Mgr. Bourget, Bishop of Montreal.

Monseigneur: After a long and terrible struggle with my reason and conscience, and with prejudices formed in my education, the great and merciful God has finally gained the victory in my heart and understanding. He has severed forever the bonds of iniquity which led me to the feet of the Pope as priest of the church of Rome. For I desire to inform your lordship that, born in the church of Rome, in France, in 1834, I was ordained priest at Paris, on the 21st of June, 1856, by cardinal Morlot, and remained for 12 years in the parish of the Mission of Saints Anne d'Amiens. I have therefore, monseigneur, had time to become acquainted with the theories and practices of this monstrous society called the Church Catholic, Apostolic and Roman. And I may say without fear of making a mistake, that if its head is upon the earth, among men, its roots and feet are planted in the deepest abysses of hell. The church of Rome is only a vast conspiracy against all the laws of God and the dearest rights of humanity. The grand and single aim of the church of Rome is to reign by darkness, ignorance and terror. The eldest daughter of Satan, she has learned from her father to lie with an incredible audacity. It is by virtue of her supreme cleverness for lying that she has invented the idolatrous and impious dogma of transubstantiation, by which she causes to be adored, a god made daily by the hands of a servant, and by means of a little flour and water mixed and cooked between two hot irons. It is also by virtue of her incomparable power to lie that the church of Rome has invented the monstrous dogma of purgatory, from which she will only redeem souls at the price of the gold with which her blind slaves fill her treasuries. And auricular confession—this all powerful engine of slavery, of degradation, and of immorality, is it not also the fruit of lies and blasphemies, the inexhaustible source of which is behind the blackened walls of the Vatican? But blessed be the God of heaven forever, in the name of the Lord Jesus! after having been for too long a time, shall the slave and victim of these impostures; after having not only believed but preached them to others, the light of the Gospel has shone in upon my soul. I have discovered my errors; I have had strength to break my chains, and I came yesterday to throw myself into the arms of one of the kindest friends I ever met on the earth, father Chiniquy, whom the Lord made instrumental in dissipating my every doubt. I now come therefore, monseigneur, to present to you the solemn act of my abjuration of the errors of Romanism, to no longer serve, know or love any but Jesus and him crucified.—Benjamin Ouriere, in Advent Sabbath Advocate.

Baptism.

DEAR BRETHREN OF THE RESTITUTION:—Please allow me to give my views on baptism in answer to all enquiring brethren. Should we be baptized into Christ? Let us see; hear ye him, Matt. xvii. 1–5; And after six days, Jesus taketh Peter, James and John, his brethren, and bringeth them up into a high mountain apart, and was transfigured before them; and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light. And behold there appeared unto them Moses and Elias talking with him. Then answered Peter, and said unto Jesus, Lord, it is good for us to be here; if thou will, let us make here three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moses and one for Elias. While he yet spake, behold, a bright cloud overshadowed them; and, behold a voice out of the cloud, which said, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him.

St. John x. 1, 2: Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that entereth not by the door into the sheep fold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber. But he that entereth in by the door, is the shepherd of the sheep.

Verse 7: Then said Jesus unto them again, verily, verily, I say unto you, I am the door of the sheep.

Verse 9: I am the door, by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and find pasture.

Verse 14: I am the good shepherd, and know my sheep, and am known of mine.

John iii. 5: Jesus answered, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born of water, and of the spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. Hear ye him.

Luke iii. 21, 22: Now when all the people were baptized, it came to pass, that Jesus also being baptized, and praying, the heaven was opened, and the Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape like a dove upon him, and a voice came from heaven, which said, Thou art my beloved Son; in thee I am well pleased. Then can we be baptized, and leave Jesus' name out?

Mark i. 9–11: And it came to pass in those days, that Jesus came from Nazareth of Galilee, and was baptized of John in Jordan. And straight way coming up out of the water, he saw the heavens opened, and the Spirit like a dove descending upon him. And there came a voice from heaven saying, Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

2 Tim. ii. 10: Therefore I endure all things for the elect sakes, that they may also obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus with eternal glory.

1 Pet. ii. 21: For even hereunto were ye called; because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow his steps (into the water.)

John iii. 17: For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world thought he might be saved. Then are we saved if we are not baptized into his name? We are not. Christ is the door, and the way, and if we are saved, we must be baptized in his name—faith, then obedience.

Heb. ii: How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation; which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard him; (hear ye him).

There was a young man that wanted to be baptized, and his father told him he had better leave it off a while. One day his father said to him, there was a little branch out in the field, and for him to go and bring the sheep and lamb to the house, and put them in a pen. The young man brought the sheep and lamb,—put the sheep in the pen, and left the lamb outside. The little lamb cried for its mother; the father called his son, and said: Why did not you put the lamb in with its mother? The son replied: "Oh, I thought I had better leave it off a while." Brothers and sisters, be baptized into Christ, and don't leave it off a while. Now is the accepted time.

Yours in hope,

C. WALDO AUSS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Turkey's Decline a Sign of the Advent of Christ.

Passages from the Rev. Canon Home's New Book, "Rome and Turkey."

The condition of the Turkish Empire is one of the greatest interest at the present day and is engaging more than any other public subject the grave thoughts of thinking men. I propose, therefore, to consider three questions:

1. Has the present state of Turkey been foretold in prophecy?

2. Does it teach us any lessons respecting our spiritual position?

3. Does it throw any light on our hope of the coming of the Lord?

With reference to the first question—Has the present state of Turkey been foretold in prophecy? I have not the least hesitation in expressing my own conviction that it has been foretold in a most remarkable manner, and that the present state of things is nothing more than the fulfillment of what God predicted little less than one thousand eight hundred years ago.

Turkey in Africa has almost ceased to exist. Turkey in Europe may last a little longer, but is going fast. As for Turkey in Asia, it has ceased to be a power to any distance east of the Euphrates; and I fully believe that on the west of the river, the drying-up process will be steadily continued till the floods recede from Palestine, and that beautiful land is set free from the blight of Turkish misgovernment, and handed over to be once more a land "flowing with milk and honey to its rightful possessors, the seed of Abraham, the nation to which God has given it.

THE THREE FROG-SPIRITS OF EVIL.

Now there are two events, apparently quite distinct in themselves, which are connected with each other under the sixth vial—the drying up of the Euphrates, and the appearance of certain most dangerous and seductive spirits going forth to gather men together for the battle of Almighty God. If, therefore, it be a fact that the Euphrates is now being dried up, then it follows as a sure and certain consequence that the unclean spirits are soon, if not already, going forth to do their deadly work. Whenever the Euphrates is drying up, there is to be a time of great spiritual seduction; or in other words, the exhaustion of the Turkish Empire will be accompanied, or quickly followed, by a remarkable development of mischievous spiritual power.

This is described in Rev. xvi. 13, 14: "And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet. For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty."

There is not one spirit only, but there are three acting together. We are taught, therefore, at the time of the drying up of the Euphrates we must be prepared for subtle and seductive powers of various forms and characters. If there were only one spirit the danger might assume only one form; but as there are three spirits acting together, we should be on our guard against every possible combination. We are not merely to look out for three distinct and separate forms of error, but, as all the three act together, they may combine in every conceivable variety. One may act on one mind, two on another, and all three on a third, and so produce the most remarkable and most inconsistent combinations.

These spirits are prefloted as gathering men together for battle. When they are, as all truth and error will be, thrown into antagonism. The Lord Jesus Christ will be collecting his forces, and Satan his; there will be on both sides the mustering of the host. Those that are on the side of the Lamb will rally round his banner, "called, and chosen, and faithful;" and those that are under the influence of any of the seductive spirits will throw themselves into the ranks of open opposition. The characteristics of the day will be, not sloth or indifference, but zeal, eagerness and conflict.

Now no one can have watched the progress of men's minds during the last half century without observing that this has been most remarkably the case. The two processes have gone on side by side. Turkey has been drying up, and almost every state in Europe has been aroused to religious conflict.

THE SECOND ADVENT OF CHRIST.

What light does the decay of the Ottoman Empire throw on the prospect of the near approach of our Lord's return? Has it any bearing on our Christian hope? and may we regard it as a signal from God that the times come when we may expect the second advent of Christ.

I believe that we are at this present time living under the sixth vial, and that the great public, political event of the sixth vial is the drying up of the Ottoman Empire, which we can all see to be in progress. There can be no doubt about the great political fact; it is confirmed by every newspaper, and is forced on the attention of England by the sore distress brought on many families through the Turkish bankruptcy. Then it follows that if we are living under the sixth vial, the seventh is all that remains of the great prophetic series.

The seventh vial is the close of the series, and under it we are to expect the final victory of the Lord Jesus Christ (Rev. xvi. 17.) The conclusion is therefore plain that if the exhaustion of the ottoman empire is the event symbolized by the drying up of the Euphrates, it is high time we awake out of sleep; and we must soon expect to behold Christ himself, with all the joys of his kingdom and all the terrors of a crushing victory.

We appear to have reached what Daniel terms "the time of the end;" so that now it is high time to awake out of sleep, for we already begin to see the first streaks of morning dawn. We have already witnessed some of the great events that must very shortly precede the advent, and we may begin to look out full of hope for the actual return of the Lord himself.

This conclusion is confirmed by the words of our Lord himself. I need not stop to prove that he is the speaker in Rev. xvi. 15, but we must carefully observe his words. What does he say when the sixth vial is poured out, and the Euphrates is drying up, and when the three evil spirits are gone forth through Christendom? What is the warning voice which he himself then gives out with reference to his coming? What lesson would he have us learn from these great events? Of what are they his signal? Does he not say, "Behold, I come as a thief?" Rev. xvi. 15. Does he not call us to a double watchfulness, and teach us not merely to watch against the seductive influence of these foul spirits, but to watch also for his own appearing, and for the bright hope of joyfully meeting him? But if this be the case, and if the prophecy of the sixth vial is really being now fulfilled, as we believe it to be, by the drying up of the Turkish power, then every fresh symptom of decay in that power, every loss of territory by the Turks, every fresh insurrection, and every proof that the empire is reduced to homeless bankruptcy, is like a clarion blast of the trumpet of God ringing through the ears of Christendom; and proclaiming, with a distinctness which cannot be mistaken, "Behold, I come as a thief."

It is the world that will be found asleep, and to whom Christ will really come as a thief. But some man may say, "If there be these signs before hand, will they not arouse the world as well as believers? Will they not awaken society? Will they not compel men to prepare?" I answer that by another question, Do they? There are certain signs already given; do they wake up society? Have they produced such an impression as to arouse the great masses of worldly men?

There are the Jews preserved as a separate people, in fulfillment of a prophecy given more than three thousand years ago; what effect has such a fulfillment of God's word had in the city? There are all the politicians of Europe at their wits' end because of the decay of Turkey; but how many even of yourselves have been led thereby to look out for the near approach of our blessed Savior? There is Rome stripped of its temporal power in fulfillment of great prophecies given, some of them more than two thousand years ago; but how many are there that have been led by that fulfillment to look out even for the fall of Babylon?

The simple fact is these great fulfilments, though conspicuous to the eye of those who study them, completely fail to produce the least impression on the deep sleep of the unconverted world. The prophecies are not read; the facts are not compared with them; the lessons are not learned, and the soul is not aroused to preparation. How many are there even in this very town on whom the fulfillment of God's prophetic word has never produced the slightest effect? They are living just as they would have lived, or rather sleeping as they would have slept if there had been no prophecy to give the warning, and no history to confirm its truth.

Oh, think what it will be to be found naked when all the saints of God are standing around you in their resurrection robes! We have lately read of poor people startled in the night by shipwreck, and rushing as they were to the deck, utterly unprotected against the bitter blast of the severe winter's snow storm. Think what it would be to be suddenly aroused from your own deep sleep, to see all that you have in the world wrecked around you, and to find your poor soul quite naked, while the terrible storm of God's most just judgment beats upon you and breaks down every hope of escape! Oh, dear brethren, may it never be so with you! May you be amongst those who can peacefully look for Christ's appearing, because you are clothed in his righteousness! May you be kept walking in the light, and cleansed from all sin through his most precious blood! Then you will have nothing to fear, but everything to hope for, in the thought of his second coming.—Christian Herald.

Religion a Natural Need.

Notwithstanding all philosophy, man is being born to believe, to reverence and adore, as well as to think and feel; and the more the faculty of extra belief (i. e., belief which does not rest on pure reason) is crushed out of a man's being, the more fatally it will reappear in the conditions of daily life, or in superstitious occurrences. There would be neither scope, nor depth nor progress in human life, if the intellects of human beings were forever wrapped in the tightest swaddling cloths which metaphysicians and analysts can prepare. The poetry of life is perpetually bursting out, and neither in the affairs of this world nor the next can the spirit of a man be restricted from believing and hoping and imagining more than it can either see or know. Religion has been, in all ages, races, and climates, a universal instinct of mankind. It is the master-passion of the human race; it has been the basis of laws, of governments, of customs and institutions; it has torn and lacerated society in all its forms; it has been the curse and consolation of mankind. We may denounce its particular manifestations, but that the spirit of man clasves to the world to come, is as true as that he stands erect in this.—Blackwood's Magazine.

When sin is in the house, we may fear ruin is at the door.

Does the Bible teach the Resurrection of all the Dead?

BY ALLAN E. MACREDER.

Your correspondent, J. M. S., in the RESTITUTION of April 5th, contends for the affirmative of the above question, as the truth. His reasoning in support of that position is specious, if not strong and plausible, though not conclusive.

His statements deserve a reply. Let us "prove all things, that we may hold fast that which is good."

Some writers of the opposite conclusion—that there shall be "a resurrection, (as Paul teaches,) of the just and unjust," and consequently as among the dead there are undoubtedly multitudes who were neither just nor unjust,—such as irresponsible adults and unenlightened pagans, who (as Jesus teaches, in John ix. 41,) "being blind, have no sin,"—I ask leave to "show my opinion," and submit the ground of it to the candor of our very intelligent brother, J. M. S., and your readers.

"Before citing the testimony which, in my humble opinion, sustains the conclusion he assails, I will consider the interpretation he puts upon certain passages of Scripture which, proving too much, as he thinks, "prove nothing." Of this class, he says, are Job vii. 9. Is. x. 20, 21; and Isa. xxvi. 14. Commenting on these, he argues that "they prove with equal cogency and force, the non-resurrection of any of the dead." Even if this be granted to him, the reply is at hand that these passages are a very small part of what is written in the Bible on the same point; and of these other passages, not cited by him, clearly and plainly teach the contrary, and in opposition to his construction; or if it be shown that the view he opposes is sustained by a preponderance of Bible testimony, and is proved to be in harmony with the general tenor of the Scriptures, obviously and logically, that which is obscure and ambiguous must give way to that which is clear and plain. J. M. S. is too sound a logician not to concede this conclusion. Indeed he admits its propriety, in the words following, taken from his article: "The Bible standard of reasoning is to compare Scripture with Scripture, and then, as the result, to adopt a conclusion that will harmonize all the plain statements of Scripture without one note of discord."

But, in truth, let us enquire whether he is sustained in his reasoning on the citations from Job and Isaiah, by the text and contexts. I submit, with deference, that his reasonings here are not satisfactory. He overlooks, in his citation of Job x. 20, the fact that the word wherein, on which he hinges the major part of his conclusions, is not in the original, and therefore does not authorize him to impute to it the sweeping conclusion that "Job will never return" from the land of death. The context, and the 7th chapter of Job cited by him, can all be gratified, in its sense and meaning, by reference to the subject of debate between Job and his friends, which was not, at that time, the resurrection, (which was not reached until a later period of their discourse, viz: Job xix.) but death and the state of the dead.

With this design and topic of the speaker before us, we can well understand what is meant when Job says he should "go to and not return" from that state (so as to be with them here,) having escaped from the bondage of the grave.

Such is the simple and natural explanation of the discourse. Surely we may distrust any argument which would make Job—an inspired servant of God, whose teachings on this occasion God approved, saying, "My servant Job hath spoken of me the thing that is right," xli. 7—maintain, in flat contradiction of himself, his non-resurrection in Job x. and vii., declaring directly the opposite.

Not more successful is the effort to press, by parity of reasoning, Isaiah xxvi. into the service of resurrectional universalism. The citation by J. M. S. of this text is not comprehensive enough to present the whole premises before us. He quotes it thus: "They are dead, they shall not live." Why stop here and omit the very next words following and forming the 14th verse, thus: "they (the heathen lords over Israel) are deceased, they shall not rise; therefore thou hast visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish." Now, to omit the latter part of the 14th verse, which is indeed the largest part, as the quotation of the whole of it shows, is hardly fair play to the Divine Record. It is almost as damaging an omission as it would be to read the Book of Acts and leave out all that is written of Peter, James and Paul. It is the play of Hamlet with the Prince of Denmark left out!

Will our brother pardon me for borrowing an arrow from his quiver, in this connection, by quoting the language he applies to the opponents of his opinion? "A theory which necessitates the figuring away of so many unequivocal texts of Scripture must rest upon a sandy foundation."

Again, "Any view which requires even the weakening of the force of one 'Thus saith the Lord,' is not Bible truth," &c.

To this I respond, Amen! Is it not, therefore, unfortunate for the strength of his argument, and the consistency of his position, that he should have weakened the force of Isaiah xxvi. 14, by omitting to quote the words so pertinent to the subject, as, "they shall not rise"?

Against his citations of Eccl. ix. 5, and Ps. xlix. 16, as authority in his favor as "proving too much," because they declare that "their memory (of the dead,) is forgotten, and they shall never see light." I oppose, in reply, his language, in construing the real meaning of such passages, as follows: "Such terms are used to denote indefinite periods of time, also the powerlessness of the dead to rise up or to come back from that bourne whence no traveler returns." This is a satisfactory interpretation of such language and does not weigh aught against those who maintain that the just and the unjust only will appear by a resurrection. For, of a truth, the dead, both righteous and wicked, are powerless to rise up or come back, of themselves; but God can restore to life whom he will.

Again, J. M. S. insists on the literal interpretation of the passages cited, in order to involve his opponents in the conclusion of the "non-resurrection of any of the dead," but does he not see that thereby he falls himself into the very pit he has digged for them? for if his literal interpretation proves that there shall be no resurrection of any, does not the same interpretation disprove his position that there shall be a resurrection of all? If none are to be raised, how can all be raised? Is not his argument a logical suicide? If he abandons the literal interpretation to escape the absurdity, then we claim the benefit of his admission that there is another and better construction. Yet, as if adhering to his literal construction, he writes: "As to interpretations, * * * If God does not mean what he says, he should send an angel to tell us what he does mean."

Now, no believer in the Bible presumes to say that God does not mean what he says, in the sense of the words and the context used; but to say, as J. M. S. implies, that God never uses words except in their literal sense, is to drive us to conclusions which shock our reason and stultify common sense. When Jesus says—I am the Door—I am the Vine—They drank of that spiritual rock that followed them, and that rock was Christ—This is my body—This is my blood—surely we are not to understand that a literal construction is to prevail. Yet God means what he says, and we do not require an angel to explain it.

In the vital matter of construing the language of Scripture, we are not to discard right, reason, or common sense. On the contrary, we are to use both. This simple and obvious rule enables us, in a childlike spirit, to comprehend the doctrine of the Blessed Book.

In regard to this particular point involving the resurrection, whether, as J. M. S. contends, all who ever lived shall be raised up again, or the opposite position, which we take, with Paul, that there shall be a resurrection of the just and of the unjust, (which manifestly implies that those who are neither just nor unjust will not be raised because they are not in the premises,) we invite our worthy brother to a class of Scriptures which if he does not forget, he ignores without just reason. Perhaps I cannot better present the objections to his theory and to his unauthorized exclusion of these omitted testimonies, than by briefly stating, one by one, these formidable obstacles in his path.

Let us state his position in his own words. It is: "The broad platform of the resurrection of all men."

Now, with the Bible before us, we feel bound to reject the position for following plain reasons:

1. Because the Word of God, as far as presented by him, nowhere affirms any such proposition. It could scarcely be true and yet the Bible be entirely silent as to its proclamation.

2. Because the Bible teaches the contrary, for Daniel says, "Many of them (not all men) that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake." Isaiah says of certain Chaldeans, xliii. 17, "They shall lie down together, They shall not rise," &c., and in Isaiah xxvi. 14, (quoted in part by J. M. S.) it is written of the same Babylonians, &c., conquerors of Israel, "They are dead, they shall not rise," &c.

Paul, before Felix, Acts xxiv., confines the resurrection, as we have seen, to the just and the unjust, which certainly does not include all men.

Jesus, in John v. 28, declares that all that are in their graves shall come forth," (arise) but immediately qualifies and restricts the word "all" to them that have done good, and them that have done evil.

Now, in presence of such proofs, should there not be an end of controversy on a subject so plain and simple? Other facts and further pertinent testimony might be largely adduced, but as it would be only accumulative, and consume valuable time and space, I forbear, and conclude by asking so intelligent a brother as we all know J. M. S. to be, to give us one single solitary use or reason for our all-wise Creator's bringing again from the dust of death, one single irresponsible individual of our race, much less an innumerable multitude of human beings, who must appear in such a scene, without any conceivable purpose or object. They cannot be rewarded, for faith in and obedience to a law of which they had never heard, and in the case of idiots and lunatics, could not learn: and, for a like reason they cannot be punished. Their resurrection is therefore a work of supererogation—a mistake—of which the argument supposes God to be guilty! Is it not to avoid any such defective reasoning and false conclusions on our part, that it is written and repeated for our instruction that as to all such irresponsibles, "They shall not rise"?

Faithfully submitted.

Seeing the Son of Man Coming in his Kingdom.

J. P. S. writes, Q. "Will you please explain Matt. xvi. 28? Does it relate to the establishment of the Christian and the destruction of the Jewish government?"

A. Verse 27 shows to what it refers; and it cannot be applied to any other event than the second coming of Christ and the establishment of his kingdom on earth. 2 Pet. i. 16-18, is inspired authority on this point. In the transfiguration they saw the Son of Man coming in his kingdom, because, it was a representation of the coming kingdom. First, in the glory of it; second, in the constituents of it—Jesus its glorified King; Moses and Elijah representing the raised and translated saints, its rulers; the three disciples representing its territory. Thus the transfiguration was a picture or illustration of the coming and kingdom. Hence Peter says that they were eyewitnesses of his majesty or royal state. Hence, too, the Evangelists relate it as a fulfillment of Matt. xvi. 28; Mark ix. 1, Luke ix. 27, and Jesus himself calls it "The Vision," in which they saw the kingdom of God.—Prophetic Times.

THE RESTITUTION

PLYMOUTH, IND.....May 17, 1875

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT

☞The Chicago Tribune spoke of Prof. Swing's discourse upon the Sabbath question as a sermon upon the third commandment.

☞Bro. J. M. Stephenson is now with us. He preached in Hensselaer last Sunday. Bro. S. expects to spend a month in Canada, soon.

☞Brother Cyrus Tabor, who has been very poorly for the last six months, left to-day for Three Rivers, Mich. He has gone to try what virtue there is in the Magnetic Springs. He has the kind wishes of us all.

☞During the last two weeks we have received seventy-five new subscribers. The RESTITUTION is gaining friends where it was formerly unknown. People want an open, free paper, and that is what we aim to make the RESTITUTION. Some thirty names have been added to our Three Months' Try List.

☞Rufus Wendell, who was for some time editor of the World's Crisis, and who afterward went over to Methodism, made application for ministerial orders in that august body recently. After some deliberation the committee rejected Rufus' application on the ground of his having been at one time an Adventist. Wendell has now been out in the cold for the last three years, and must stay out another year. It seems to take a great deal of time to get the smell of heresy out of his garments. But then Methodism has a great supply of preachers, and Rufus really is not wanted.

Crime and Doctrine.

It is claimed by some that endless misery is one of the safeguards of society, and that it acts as a barrier to crime. People are often heard to say that they would not be Christians if it were not for hell. A moment's reflection will show that such remarks are founded in ignorance and wickedness. Men are not worth much, morally, who hold to Christianity merely to keep out of hell. We have no confidence in a system of religion which works upon the policy plan, and has no principle at the foundation. The following will be of interest to our readers, as it shows that a belief in future endless misery does not keep men in the way of peace. An exchange truly says that in the Massachusetts house of correction, there are only four who pretend to be Universalists, while many other denominations are liberally represented:

Roman Catholics	2,215	Jews	17
Methodists	781	Campbellites	1
Episcopalians	722	Bankrupt	1
Presbyterians	539	Spiritualists	1
Baptists	197	Mohr	1
Lutherans	258	Moravian	1
German Reformed	33	Christian Brethren	1
Swedenborgians	2	Mennonite	1
Unitarians	4	Infidel	1
Universalists	4	No religious belief	34
Congregationalists	5
Friends	16	Total	4,855

All this does not look as if Universalism were very demoralizing, or Partialism very Christianizing.

The Intermediate State.

Our friend Hicks sees a number of errors in our mode of reasoning, and reviews us in last week's issue. The trouble with our friend is he thinks the Bible teaches an intermediate state for human souls. That is the very point we deny. It is quite easy for any one to get certain texts to apply to certain ideas and then wonder that other people do not see them in the same light he does. We do not understand that Jesus had any reference whatever to the intermediate state. Indeed there is no such State for human souls. It is to us a profound mystery that any one should try to torture the parable of the rich man and Lazarus into such a view. Every term in the parable is against rather than in harmony with the view. But our reviewer says that souls in the intermediate state have eyes, feet, tongues and fingers, and hence the parable can refer to that state. It would be a hopeless task to try and convince any one upon this point if he holds that the words comfort, torment, and the like refer to mens' souls before the judgment. The idea of rewards and punishments must include the idea of judgment. The rich man in the parable is represented as being punished for sins committed in this life. Now must we conclude that the rich man is punished before he is judged? Bro. Hicks does not believe this. To say that Jesus does not give a terrible warning against the evil of riches improperly used is to openly deny the words of the parable. Bro. Hicks must see that the warning is doubly strong if it applies to the final state rather than to the anjudged intermediate state.

There is but one other point in our reviewer's article requiring a notice and is embodied in the idea that spirits have a bodily form, etc. If it were stated that departed human spirits had bodily form then there would be great force in the remark; but that is just where the statement fails. The Bible says nothing about departed spirits. The parable talks about men in a real bodily shape and never mentions the spirits of dead men with human organs. Hence the parable is against the theory. Angels are spirits and are real tangible beings. When it is stated that the disciples mistook Jesus for a spirit it is not stated that he was a departed spirit. Bro. H. can reason better than this. Dead men do not walk on the water, or appear on earth again without a resurrection. Jesus was, on another occasion mistaken for John the Baptist, but it was claimed that he "was risen from the dead." Men have appeared in vision to human beings but they were real beings in appearance. A man appeared to Paul in vision, but he was from Macedonia. The vision on the Mount of Glory presents the same great truth. When Bro. Hicks finds that Christ was refering to final and not to the intermediate state, in the parable, he will see new harmony in the word.

The Resurrection.

People who read but little and think less have but little idea of the importance attached to the Bible doctrine of the resurrection. We are well aware of the fact that many honest hearted people are indifferent to the future return of the body from death, and yet the Bible seems to lay the greatest stress upon that event. It seems that all the promises hinge upon the resurrection. David says that he will be satisfied when he awakes with his Lord's likeness, and Isaiah calls upon the dwellers in the dust to awake and sing. It is said that the Lord's dead shall live and come forth in the full hope of immortality. Eternal life which is a priceless boon to the Christian is presented to us as being realized at the resurrection. That it is the time when the dead are to be judged and when the great recompense is to be given. This was the language of Jesus bearing upon the feasts made for the poor. Dead men are to receive their reward at their resurrection and not before. Why it is that men in our day try to get away from the Bible hope of a return from the dust we know not.

Paul says, "If the dead rise not those who have fallen asleep in Christ are perished." All hope is gone. In the light of this plain utterance we do not know how men can bolster up the dogma of endless being without the resurrection. But nothing is too strange in these days of fables. Heaven above the clouds has been substituted for Christ's kingdom. An eternal hell has taken the place of death which is God's penalty for sin. Infant sprinkling is a substitute for adult baptism and a miraculous conversion has taken the place of an intelligent belief of the Gospel which is God's power unto salvation. It becomes, every true believer of the word of God to stand up for the truth when it is invaded on every hand. But the Lord knows the end from the beginning and soon all fables and human inventions will give way to the truth of God and victory will gleam upon the banner of our Lord.

An Especial Request.

Recently we have been requested by a Disciple minister of considerable note and ability, who resides near Moberly, Mo., while on our contemplated visit west, to make in Moberly two discourses, one on the Nature of Man, and one on the time of the organization of Christ's Kingdom, and to follow each with an invitation to the audience for investigation. We do not like to make ourselves conspicuous, but having a desire to accommodate people, and especially old acquaintances when we can possibly do so, we consent to make the discourses.

Let it be understood then, by the readers of the RESTITUTION and their friends in and near Moberly, that in the forenoon on Sunday, July 18, we will make a discourse, affirming that man is mortal, and loses his conscious intelligence in death; and in the evening another, denying that the kingdom of God (or Christ) was organized on the first Pentecost after Christ's crucifixion, and will follow each with the desired invitation. G. M. MYERS.

We must not overlove the world when it favors, nor overfear when it frowns.

When we return to God in the way of duty, he will return to us in the way of mercy.

We must take Christ and his cross, as well as Christ and his crown.

When we forsake all for Christ, we will be gainers by the bargain.

When God says Zion is his rest forever, we should say, let it be ours, too.

What we do in God's service should be done by his direction.

Less sins made bold with, do but open the way for greater.

Does the Bible Teach a Partial Atonement?

As to the reply of Christ to the Sadducees, it is known to all persons the least acquainted with the Greek language that the phrase "resurrection of the dead" is translated from words denoting an eclectic resurrection, or a resurrection from among the dead, and therefore cannot be urged as an objection to the resurrection of the left of the dead.

Paul labored that he might attain to a resurrection from among the dead, thus leaving the rest of the dead to live again when the thousand years shall have expired.

We will now proceed to the investigation of those texts which clearly teach the impartial love of God in the plan of salvation. I would invite careful attention to the following language of Paul relative to the resurrection of the dead. Having denied the false charge alleged against him, he acknowledges the true one. He says:

"But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my father, (I) believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets: And (I) have hope toward God, which (hope) they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust." Acts xxiv. 14, 15.

1. The Greek word elpis signifies expectation. It is used as the equivalent of the Greek word prosdechomai, rendered by the Diaglott, "are looking for." Thus Paul looked for a resurrection of the just and the not just, which they also looked for.

2. Paul declares that the resurrection of the just and the not just was his expectation. It is I Paul confessing, I Paul believing, and I Paul having hope. They allowed or looked for the same thing that Paul looked for. He said, I have hope which they expect. A greater perversion of language never was made than to transpose the language of Paul to make it read, They have hope which I allow.

It must all be transposed, to read; "But this they confess, and they worship the God of our Fathers;" "they believing all things written in the law and the prophets." The ellipsis must then be supplied by the third personal pronoun, they, instead of the first personal pronoun I, in the first line of the 14th verse. But what difference does it make whether Paul endorsed their hope, or they endorsed his hope? Would it change the object of their hope in the least because either endorsed the hope of the other? Not a particle. Paul nowhere more positively affirms his own expectation than in the foregoing passage of Scripture; and to deny it is to deny as plain and unequivocal language as can be found in the Bible.

3. The word unjust is not an English but a Latin word, transferred from the Vulgate. This word signifies not. It is simply a negative, without defining the nature of the thing it negates. The adverb "not" does not define the nature of anything. It is its office to negate. All are either just, or not just; but all are not either good or bad. Infants are not just; but they are not, per consequence, bad. They have no characters at all. Adam was not just, when created. He had no character either good or bad, until he had acted in reference to law, either by obeying or disobeying. The same is true in reference to by far the greater part of the dead. A resurrection of the dead just and not just will raise every human being in the death state whether they have characters or not. The idea of just and unjust saints, is a contradiction of terms. To be a saint is to be just; to be not just, therefore, is to not be a saint. There are a great many bad men in the world who are hypocritical enough to try to palm themselves off for saints, but not many who can succeed. To claim that these bad saints, as they call them, are asleep in Christ, side by side with holy men of God is blasphemous in the extreme. All the saints living and dead ascend to meet the Lord, never to be separated from him. 2 Thess. iv. 16, 17. All the sleeping saints will arise from the dust and sing. Isa. xxvi. 19. They will all shout victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. 1 Cor. xv. 57.

I now propose to quote a few of the many texts that might be adduced, so plainly teaching the universality of the atonement that they need no comment. Christ said in his discourse with Nicodemus:

"For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life. For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through him, might be saved." John iii. 16, 17.

In his first epistle, referring to Christ, John says: "And he is the propitiation for our sins, and not for our (sins) only, but also for the sins of the whole world." 1 Jno. i. 2.

Paul's teachings agree perfectly with those of Christ and John. He says: "But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man." Heb. ii. 9.

Again: "For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time." 1. Tim. ii. 5, 6.

Again, the same apostle says: "For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge that if one died for all, then were all dead. And that he died for all," &c. 2 Cor. v. 14, 15.

Christ is the Savior of all men. Referring to Christ the apostle exclaims; "Who is the Savior of all men, especially of those that believe." 1 Tim. iv. 10.

The Samaritans understood that the mission of Christ embraced the world. Thus we read: "And (they) said unto the woman, now we believe not, because of thy saying: for we have heard him for ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Savior of the world." Jno. iv. 42.

John and the other apostles bear testimony to the same glorious truth. "And we have seen and do testify that the Father sent his Son to be the Savior of the world." 1 John iv. 14.

Of the same import is the testimony of the true witness. He says: "For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved." John iii. 17.

Again he says: "For the bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven and giveth his life for the world. Jno. vi. 33.

Again he says: "And the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world."

Christ will enlighten every man that cometh into the world: "That was the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." Jno. i. 9.

All men will be saved and brought to a knowledge of the truth. Referring to Christ, Paul says: "Who will have all men to be saved, and to come to a knowledge of the truth." 1 Tim. ii. 4.

Christ, in his sacrificial relation to man, will take away the sin of the world: "The next day John seeth Jesus coming unto him, and saith, Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world." Jno. i. 29. Paul tells what the sin of the world is, and the means by which Christ will take it away. He says, therefore, "As by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men in whom all have sinned; therefore as by the offense of one judgment came upon all men unto condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life." Rom. v. 12, 18. Of the same import is the following language of Paul: "Indeed the earnest expectation of the creation longs for the revelation of the sons of God: for the creation was made subject to frailty, not voluntarily but by him who placed it under, in hope that even the creation itself will be emancipated from the slavery of corruption into the freedom of the glory of the children of God. For we know that the whole creation groans together and travails in pain together until the present time. And not only it but ourselves also, possessing the first fruit of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves waiting for sonship, the redemption of our body. Rom. viii. 19-23. "For as by Adam all die, so by the anointed also will all be restored to life." 1 Cor. xv. 22, Diaglott. "Marvel not at this: for the hour is coming in which all those that are in their graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth." John v. 28. The Revelator closes the subject of the resurrection in the following language: "And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God. * * * And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hades delivered up the dead which were in them." Rev. xx. 12, 13.

Thus closes inspiration on the subject of the resurrection, and thus we close our article. If all these plain statements of holy writ can be figured away, what dependence can be placed in Bible language? If the strongest terms in the Bible expressive of universality represent the smallest minorities, then, indeed, must we understand the Bible—as far as the atonement and resurrection are concerned—to mean the opposite of what it says.

Baptism In and Into the Same.

Your correspondent Jno. A. Hughes, acts wisely, I think, in not conforming to the rite of baptism," until he sees his way more clearly. It is far better to settle these questions before than after action, as it is better to avoid an error than to correct one.

He suggests that we should not, like all the sects, baptize in the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost. In this he may be right, but hardly for the reason he assigns—that Matt. xxviii. 19 "stands in undoubted contrariety to Acts ii. 38;" for if we baptize in the name of the Father, the Son and Holy Spirit, we include the name of the Son, and cannot therefore be said not to baptize in his name. But as it is conceded by all scholars that Matt. xxviii. 19 should read into and not in the name: the translation in the king's version being erroneous; and as in the 18th verse there is distinct reference to our Lord as the source of the power or authority to baptize. Matt. xxviii. and Acts ii. are perfectly harmonized, and by putting the two together and not rejecting either we carry out the command in truth, by baptizing the proper subject "in the name of the Lord Jesus," Acts ii. 38, "into the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost." Matt. xxviii. 19.

In the article contributed by the writer in the month of April, the objection contained in Mr. Hughes enquiry—which I had not then seen—seems to have been anticipated. With the explanation already given, that Acts ii. requires "in the name," and Matt. xxviii requires "into," there seems no conflict, as they refer to separate parts of the process or formula. In Matt. Christ commands baptism by his power and authority, or in his name, into the three names; and in Acts, Peter, by Christ's authority or in his name, commands the action to be done.

Although it is not declared that he uses the words "into the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost" it is certainly not thence to be inferred that he did not do so, seeing that if he omitted so to do he would have violated the command in Matt. xxviii. 19, which is not to be presumed. To argue that because it is not recorded that the three names were invoked, he did not use them, would prove too much for those who maintain that the apostles always baptized "in the name of the Lord Jesus," for we have several examples where baptism took place and no mention of the name of the Lord is recorded, as in Acts viii. 12; xvi. 33; and in xviii. 8.

There is nothing unusual or unscriptural in the phrases "into and unto Christ and Moses," in the common version. Thus we have these texts; "As many as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ." Gal. iii. 27.

"Know ye not that as many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death?" Rom. vi. 3.

"And were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea." 1 Cor. x. 2.

These texts are all as recorded in the common version; but if we avail ourselves of the more accurate translation of the Diaglott version, we have the very phrase, "baptize into the name of the Lord," as in Acts xix. 5, and other places.

Mr. Hughes' reference to "all the sects" may imply that he thinks any use of the three names in baptism must be wrong because they so practice; and such, I fear, is the rather loose logic of some of our own brethren. This ought not so to be. All reasoning and doctrine should stand on its own merits or fall by its own weakness. Because "the sects" believe that Jesus was the Son of God, and the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth, shall we deny it? Because they baptize in the three names is that any reason we should not?

The reader will observe that there is no question as to the wisdom and propriety of baptizing in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ—in the name of the Lord—or by the authority, or by the command of the Lord Jesus—all of which are tantamount expressions or formulæ. But the real question at issue is whether we must not reject Matt. xxviii. 19, and put Acts ii. 38 in the place of it, and omitting the former altogether, use the latter altogether and exclusively. Is not this perilous ground? Can we safely take it, seeing that it necessarily requires us to renounce and reject the words of Jesus without any intimation to that effect from him or his apostles? But the construction that preserves the words and the authority of both Jesus and Peter, and rejects neither, should surely be preferred by all disciples of Jesus on every fair rule of duty and Scriptural exegesis.

Shall we not remember Paul's impressive warning to Timothy? "If any man teach otherwise, and consent not to wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine which is according to Godliness, he is proud, knowing nothing, but doting about questions and strifes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railing, evil surmises, perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds and destitute of the truth, supposing that gain is godliness; from such, withdraw thyself."

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN MARK.

"Not Personal, but Providential."

Dr. Frey in his lectures on the Messiahship of Jesus, says: "The first coming of Christ was to suffer and die, his second will be, not personal but providential, to sit upon the throne of David his father."

Jesus himself, in speaking of this glorious event, seems to entertain a different view from that indicated in the above extract. He describes it as taking place in the midst of clouds, accompanied by an angelic host, rushing in a great dispensational charge, bringing the great epoch of decision when virtue will be rewarded, and connected with a great display of glory which "all eyes shall see."

The angels are none the less explicit to the gazing disciples on Mt. Olivet. They declare in unmistakable words not only that "this same Jesus" will come, but that his coming will be "in like manner" as he went. It is difficult to understand how the ascension of Christ could be interpreted as "not personal, but providential." It will be conceded by all who read the account with any care and faith that Christ ascended literally and personally. Yes, he carried off with him to glory the very scars he had received in the great tragedy of Calvary. But though he was the same, he had been changed. He is bathed in a cloud of celestial glory, and thus clothed with beauty and worthy of a crown he "went up" through his starry pathway to "receive a kingdom," promising ere long to "return, and reign." And thus, the angels inform us, he will come. And it is not in the province of men either to dispute or to explain away their unequivocal testimony.

The theory that this grand climax of the dispensation—the second coming of Jesus—is to be simply a matter of Providence, i. e., that it is to consist in the greater diffusion of religious knowledge and the wider reign of the spirit is squarely contradicted by all the prophets who have spoken out on this point. Isaiah speaks of the final appearing of the Son of Man distinctly, emphatically, eloquently. But he associates events with it that could not possibly be effected by a reign simply providential. Daniel speaks of it, but he connects it with glory and power, that must belong to a personal and not to a providential ruler. So too do we find it through the whole of the "sacred writings" of the old economy. From Moses to David, from David to Malichi the grand culmination constantly held up to view, is the glorious, literal coming of Messiah, not to suffer, but to reign.

And we shall find no change if we consult the testimony of those who immediately succeeded the Savior. The apostles lived and died firmly grounded in the faith that Christ would "come the second time." They went everywhere preaching "Jesus and the resurrection," saying that "in the fullness of time" "Jesus Christ would come from heaven."

The idea that this event is to be accomplished by a spiritual or figurative process is entirely extraneous from the word of God and unauthorized by the greatest and best of the world's religious teachers.

The old idea that the events of the future in God's plan are just as literal as those of the past (Luke i. 31-33), is the best, as it is also the most Scriptural.

Let us stand by the old landmarks. The divine plan admits of no improvement. God has authorized no man nor set of men to write supplements or appendices to his book. The oracles have been written—let no man undertake to revise them. Yours in the love of the truth. JUDEX.

Dutch Cure for Drunkenness.

The following cure for drunkenness is practiced in Holland. The patient is shut up in a room, and debarred all communication, except with his physician. As often as he pleases, spirits—brandy, whisky, gin, etc.—are given him, but mixed with two-thirds water; all other drinks, such as beer, coffee, wine, etc., are mixed with one-third brandy. The various viands, too, that are given him—bread, meats, etc—are all prepared with brandy; consequently, the patient is in a state of continual intoxication. This lasts about five days; at the end of that time, he asks with entreaty for some nourishment, without his request being complied with, and not until his organs absolutely abhor alcohol. The cure is complete, and from that day forth the very smell of spirits produces the effect of an emetic.

Answers.

I prayed for faith, and over earth and sea
Clouds drifted low;
The sky at once as space and wind and rain,
And blinding snow;
And on my heart there lay a nameless dread;
How should I go?

I still prayed on—God surely would not cast
My prayer aside;
For he has promised in the darkest hour
To light provide:
And when the storm beat fiercest, faith appeared
My steps to guide.

I prayed for guidance, and my feet were led
A dreary way;
Down rugged steeps and over chasms wide,
My journey lay;
A desolate and lonely path was mine
From day to day.

I prayed for patience, and a heavy weight
Pressed on my breast;
The sorrow that I dreaded crept in
To mar my rest.
Joy's garlands faded, and the hopes proved vain
That I loved best.

I prayed, and God, my Father, answered me
In his own way;
He sent the darkness, that unquestioning thro' faith
I might obey.
And after night's dread tempest dnd
Love's perfect day.

My prayer for guidance, too, was not in vain;
My heart he knew;
And now the path I gladly would have trod,
Though fair to view,
Was not the narrow one that led to rest
Perfect and true.

And so he led me in his own good way;
And when I erred,
And asked for patience, then my pains, and grief
He multiplied,
That my poor heart might sooner yield its will
To his, my Guide."

Correspondence.

It seems from a line from Bro. Aulls that some one has been persistently demanding assistance from the benevolent, who is unworthy of their commisseration. We shall hereafter be a little careful in regard to appealing for help for individuals. Still our sympathies will extend to the widow, the orphan, and the distressed—but not to the indolent.

After his preface to the above purport he sends the following:

INDUSTRY.

No government, whether made by men or angels, can make and perpetuate good times in a nation of lazy subjects. If these able to labor will go to work, and cease being dependent upon working brethren, they will soon have no reason to complain of hard times. Indolence makes money scarce, industry procures it. And it is not so much money that is necessary as what money procures, as food, clothing, and other things needful. These we can produce or procure with our own labor. Industry is a source of pleasure. A man, who is not industrious may possess but he cannot enjoy: It is labor only that gives relish and pleasure. It is the indispensible condition for possessing a sound mind in a sound body. Excellence is never granted to man but on the reward of labor.

Industry keeps the mind clear, the body healthy, the heart whole, and the purse wealthy.

Man must have occupation or be miserable. Toil is the price of appetite, sleep, health and enjoyment.

Industry renders us happier with a little, than indolence could with plenty or profusion. Toil is a thousand times rewarded in the pleasure it bestows. Its enjoyments are peculiar; wealth cannot buy them, nor indolence taste them. Such as would excel in industry.

Rise early, live soberly, labor diligently, and,—one thing more,—pursue good and great objects.

God formed us to live by labor, and he would have every one employed to be truly happy or useful.

Let us then be active while the day lasts; for the night cometh when no man can work.

Therefore, brethren, let us work and not be continually asking the brethren for help.

C. WALDO AULLS.

G. M. MYERS:

Dear Brother in the Lord:—Since February I have not seen our excellent paper. Last year I was a subscriber at Mt. Union, O.; went from there to Charlotte county, Va., Dec. 1, and taught school during the winter. Bro. Jno. A. Bliss and I had a debate at the school house with J. E. Webster and others, on—Resolved, that death is a cessation of all consciousness. Much interest in the discussion was manifested by listeners. We presented the strongest evidence the Bible affords, and endeavored to keep our opponents at work on the text; but to no purpose. J. E. Webster, our principal opponent, is a Methodist, and after our quotations from David, Job, Solomon, etc., he promptly declared that our evidence was not worth the snap of a finger. At the close of the meeting an attempt was made to secure a resolution relative to future punishment for the next meeting of the society; but an influential United Presbyterian excitedly arose and remarked that if Bible questions were not kept out of the discussions, he would keep his family —a large one—at home. That altogether settled the question for the Orthodox side. Where knowledge and science are making constant progress, is it not to be wondered at that any investigation of the Bible should be so utterly routed? The West for freedom and liberality—the South and East for slow coaches and bigotry!

I should be well pleased to learn the address of any of like precious faith in this city—I don't believe there is one—and in Philadelphia.

It is but 56 minutes' ride from this place to the scene of Centennial attractions.

Please pardon me for consuming your time with so many words.

Yours, in hope of the inheritance.

AMOS P. HARSH.

Know Whereof You Affirm.

G. M. MYERS.

That one erroneous idea or false position can frequently be met, and that to some degree of success, by another, is to be admitted. But the propriety of so meeting a false issue under any circumstances, is indeed very questionable. The evils arising from so doing are many:

First—If the party arguing is sensible that he is reasoning from a false premise, to say the least of it, he manifests a want of honesty and candor.

Second—It has a tendency to sear the conscience and to weaken a sense of right and wrong.

Third—When the party to whom the argument is made, whether he be friend or opposer, a reader or hearer, is made sensible that the argument is drawn from a false premise, it has a strong tendency to weaken his confidence in the position which the argument is brought to sustain, if not to drive him entirely from the position.

Though not all, these are enough of the evils arising from such a course to enable us to see that in making an affirmation, it is very important that we know whereof we affirm.

There are a few arguments and citations of the above kind with which we have met to which we will direct attention:

The following extract, clipped from an Iowa paper of a few weeks ago, will serve us our 1.

THE THIEF ON THE CROSS.

The Cottage Bible reads, "And he said unto Jesus, Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom. And Jesus said unto him, Verily I say unto you to-day, when I come into my kingdom thou shalt be with me in paradise." This harmonizes with the teachings of the Old and New Testament Scriptures, for Jesus will come again and sit upon the throne of David and restore paradise. And my prayer is that the torch of truth may illumine our pathway through life, and that we may at last have an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

JOHN SOARDS.

STONEY GROVE, IOWA.

Now just where this brother met with this reading we cannot tell; evidently not in the Book itself, for with the Cottage Bible before us, open at the text—Luke xxiii. 39–43—we find no reading of the kind, neither in the text nor appended foot notes.

2. Relative to the same case—the thief on the cross—we have heard the statement made that "no one can prove from the Scriptures that the thief ever died!" While the Scriptures contain no positive declaration in so no many words to the effect that the thief did die, yet we are led to believe that the man who will take such a position in the midst of all the facts in the case is not to be reasoned with. If by circumstantial evidence any point at all can be proven, then this can—that the thief died. Also, it is the next thing to certainty that the thieves did die and were buried the same day that Jesus died and was buried, when we read from John and Moses:

"The Jews therefore, because it was the preparation, that the bodies should not remain upon the cross on the Sabbath day, (for that Sabbath day was an high day,) besought Pilate that their legs might be broken, and that they might be taken away. Then came the soldiers, and brake the legs of the first, and of the other, which was crucified with him. But when they came to Jesus, and saw that he was dead already, they brake not his legs; but one of the soldiers pierced his side, and forthwith came there out blood and water." Jno. xix. 31–34.

"And if a man have committed a sin worthy of death, and he be to be put to death, and thou hang him on a tree, his body shall not remain all night upon the tree, but thou shalt in any wise bury him that day; (for he that is hanged is accursed of God;) that thy land be not defiled, which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance. Deut. xxi. 22–23.

3. A writer of considerable ability not long since in an article in the RESTITUTION on the universality of the resurrection cites 1 Cor. xv. 12–13, and builds an argument upon the phrase, "the dead." After quoting the verses, he says: "The foregoing quotations express the real issue between the apostles and those brethren in the church of Corinth, for whom they were designed. It reads, 'the dead,' not a part of the dead." We will remark that the Greek text of Bloomfield, Greenfield and Griesbach of 1 Cor. xv. from the twelfth to the twenty-ninth veres eight times omits the article the preceding the word dead. Twice in verse 12, and once each in verses 13, 15, 16, 20, 21 and 29. The article is omitted, making the language resurrection of dead, or of dead ones, instead of a resurrection of the dead.

Should any of these remarks apply to any of the readers of the RESTITUTION, we hope they will give no offense. What we desire is to see arguments, like houses, builded upon solid foundations. We may have occasion soon to write more upon the caption of this article.

Testimony of the Material World.

There is one important respect in which all objects in the universe, from the atom to the arch-angel, unite—all are witnesses for God. He who made all things for himself, has so made them, that, voluntarily or involuntarily, according to their respective natures, they distinctly attest the divine existence and character. He has not left it contingent whether they give such testimony or not. The great name of the Maker is inwoven into the texture of everything he has made. So that even if the creature possess a will, and that will become depraved, and guiltily withhold its intelligent testimony to the divine existence, an eloquent and incorruptible witness is still to be found in the physical constitution of that creature; if the fool should say in his heart, "There is no God," every atom of that vital organ adds, "He is thy maker." As the natures of the material witnesses differ, it follows of course, that the manner in which they render their evidence will vary accordingly. In regard to some of them, the marks of design and beneficence are so obvious that they may be said to be ever speaking for God, without solicitation; the divine signature is visibly imprinted on their surface. In regard to others, the evidence lies deeper, and must be sought for patiently. In such cases, while the witnesses are under examination, while the investigation is proceeding from link to link in the chain of evidence, the ungodly sometimes unseasonably exult, and the timid and uninformed believer in revelation trembles for the issue. But he need not. Let him only wait confidently, as God does, till the examination be complete, till the inquiry has reached the last link of the chain, and that link will invariably be found in the hand of God. Chemistry, once the stronghold of the sceptic, has long since discovered that no substance in nature is simple and unmixed; in other words, that everything is a made state, that even the atom is an artificial, manufactured thing. An argument then for God lies in every particle of which the globe is composed; and a witness is in reserve in every pebble we pass; and a final appeal is lodged for him in the element, or first principles of all things; thus demolishing the altar which scepticism had erected to the eternity of the world, and replacing it by an altar inscribed to the Divine Creator. So that, if we hold our peace, or withhold our homage, the very stones will cry out. Geology, the voice of the earth, the Pompeii of natural religion, the witness raised from the grave of a former world, is producing her primitive formations to show that even they are in a made state, and her fossil skeletons, to show that they bear indubitable marks of having come from the hand of the one Great Designer; leaving us to infer, that, could we reach the foundation of the earth, we should find it inscribed with the name of the Divine Architect—that, could we penetrate to the central atom of the globe, it would speak for God; and thus impelling us to erect, out of the wreck of a former world, a temple to him who hath created all new things. Astronomy leads us forth into the vast amphitheatre of water, to gaze on ten thousand times ten thousand burning worlds; and are they not all witnesses for God? For are they not all in motion? This is not nature, but miracle. The first miracle was the production of matter; the second to make that matter move. Its natural state is rest; but here are innumbered myriads of material worlds in motion, out of their natural state, in an artificial, constrained, preternatural state. They are all God's witnesses. The stars in their courses fight against irreligion. Each of them obediently followed, is a star of Bethlehem, a guide into the divine presence. Each of them rushes through immensity as a miracle and a messenger from God to the universe, proclaiming, "There is a God, and the hand of God is upon me;" and all of them unite, yes, this is the real music of the spheres, the chorus of creation! all of them unite in proclaiming his eternal power and godhead. In the estimation of the Psalmist, the creation is a vast temple, and often did he summon the creatures and join them in a universal song of praise. And John heard the chorus. The noise and din of a distracted world may drown their voices here; but, saith he, "every creature which is in heaven and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them heard I, saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth on the throne, and unto the Lamb forever." Thus nature, with all her myriad voices, is ever making affirmation of the divine existence, and filling the universe with the echo of his praise.

The Validity of the Bible.

In these days, when mankind are ardently seeking novelties in nature, art and theology, when mature thought is exchanged for sensational items, while mens' hearts are literally dreading these undefined, undeveloped evils that seem to threaten the earth and those that dwell therein,—and when speculation supplies the place of theology among professed Christians, how hard it appears to be for the children of men to adhere to the plain declarations of God's word as the basis of Christian faith, hope and practice. The sublimity of that historic record,—of its developments of the unborn future,—of those glorious promises, is tortured into almost every conceivable shape to conform it to individual theories regardless of the language in which it is expressed, and thus the record of inspiration may mean something or nothing, as the case may be, in defiance of such plain and positive statements as the following: David says, the law of the Lord is perfect converting the soul. Psa. xix. 7, and Isaiah directs, To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them. (xlii. 20.) Knowing this first, says Peter, that no prophecy of the Scripture is of any private interpretation for the prophecy came not in the old time by the will of man, but holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. 2 Pet. i. 20, 21. I charge thee, therefore, says Paul to Timothy in his second letter iv. 1, before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the world at his appearing and kingdom, preach the word,—and further declares to the Galatians i. 6–9. But there be some that trouble you and would pervert the Gospel of Christ. But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other Gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed. As we said before so say I now again, If any man preach any other Gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed.

To allow that the statements of inspiration as recorded in the Bible, are not as God intended them, destroys the validity of the Scriptures, acknowledges that no golden chain of written testimony between man and his maker exists; hinges man's eternal destiny,—future life or death,—on the sandy foundation of man's word, uninspired, and grants that man has for once outgeneraled his God, substituting his own revelation for that of God. Who can believe it? Are we ready to concede that, after having revealed his will and purposes to the children of men, for their salvation, God has permitted them to so vitiate it by mistranslation and otherwise that it no longer expresses by its language, the Divine Mind? Nay, verily. If God caused the books of the Bible to be inscribed "for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works," it must of necessity be written in such characters as, to convey fully the thoughts of God, and, to be comprehended and understood by man, or the attempt on the part of Deity, miscarried. In Genesis is recorded facts as they occurred in relation to the process of creation, etc., and it is couched in just the language God intended to have used or it is not God's revelation, and the same rule must apply to the rest of the books of the Old and New Testaments, no matter by whom written or how preserved.

MARRIED.

UNDERWOOD—THOMPSON—At the residence of the bride's parents, in Plymouth, on Tuesday evening, by H. V. Reed, Mr. Arthur E. Underwood and Miss Eva L. Thompson, daughter of W. D. Thompson, Esq.

The congratulations of friends who were present on the occasion, and many who were not, are extended to the supposed happy twain. The printers and editors of THE DEMOCRAT, Mr. Underwood being the captain of the first named, were remembered with a liberal supply of sweetened refreshments, for which a spirit of thankfulness pervades the entire establishment. May their lives be lengthened, and their career prosperous and happy.—Plymouth Democrat.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The second quarterly conference of the Church of God in Iowa will, the Lord willing, be held at the Rock Creek Centre school house, Jasper county, Iowa, commencing on Thursday evening before the second Sabbath in June, 1876, and will continue over the following Sunday. The place of meeting is six miles west of Grinnell. Those coming by rail will stop at that station, where teams will be in readiness to convey them to the place of meeting. Preaching brethren are especially requested to attend this meeting, as it is a new field, where the Word of the Kingdom has lately been sown by Brethren Aulls and Daggett. Come one, come all.

By order of the conference.

J. T. PRINCE Pres.

TOLEDO, Iowa, May 8.

At Chicago, next Sunday, May 21, in the church south-east corner of Warren avenue and Robey street, morning and evening.

West Lebanon Warren county Indiana, Friday evening, May 26, at the school house near Bro. Byers. On Saturday evening, 27th, and Sunday, 28th, at the West Lebanon church.

THE AMERICAN CYCLOPEDIA.

A Comprehensive Library in Itself.

A Great National Enterprise in which every American may Take Pride.

Published by D. APPLETON & CO., 549, 551, Broadway, N. Y.

The Cyclopedia, now in course of publication, is entirely rewritten, and appears with about 4,000 maps and illustrations. To be completed in sixteen volumes of 800 pages each. Fourteen volumes now ready.

In the experience of book making and selling, this work is without a parallel. With the multiplication of steam presses, the publishers are still unable to meet the demand.

The sale has already reached over 300,000 volumes, and this in panic times! The demand for the work is but fairly commenced; the orders are largely multiplying and the indications are that the sales of the work for 1876 will greatly surpass those of the previous year.

Thus the most sanguine expectations of the publishers are more than realized.

The publishers again repeat to the public that no expense has been spared in the writing, editing, or publishing departments of the American Cyclopedia.

The cost will be more than $300,000 to prepare the sixteen volumes for the press.

SOLD ONLY BY SUBSCRIPTION.

Price $4. Extra binding, $5.

The Day is at Hand.

BY L. M. L.

Dark over earth the night of doom is sweeping,
Loud wail the winds, and ocean evermore,
Wild with despair and agony of weeping,
Billow on billow piles upon the shore.

What is this horror, every heart possessing,
What the sad thought which lurks in every soul,
Vague and perplex'd, which neither hand caressing
Nor soothing speech may lessen or control?

Surely a warning of some awful sorrow,
Such as mankind have never felt before;
Surely an earnest of that dread to-morrow,
When in a moment time shall be no more!

Vainly has all the wisdom of the ages
Wearied and spent itself in labored schemes;
Seeking through Science or in Nature's pages,
The consummation of its idle dreams.

Dreams of a world no longer half benighted,
Dreams of humanity sublime and pure,
In one grand brotherhood at length united,
Happy and peaceful, and from death secure.

Ah! they were beautiful, these hopes, and glorious;
Worthy of minds too subtile for a creed!
Man o'er himself and over all victorious—
That were a triumph and a boast indeed.

Is the world better, wiser for their teaching;
Is there less sin, or misery, or crime?
Or is it still "the foolishness of preaching"
Strikes to the heart, as in the olden time?

Hark to the answer, oft in rain repeated;
"Only one hand o'er evil can prevail—
Christ with the Father in the highest seated.
Listen, oh, listen to Creation's wail!"

What! hear ye not afore the strife of nations
The rolling of His chariot wheels afar,
Borne along space in measureless pulsations,
Swifter than sunbeam or the light of star?

What! hear ye not a voice, a whisper saying,
(Mid sighs and wonders wrought in every land),
"Be sober, O my children, watching, praying;
Night is far spent—the daylight is at hand!"

Yes, there are tokens not to be mistaken,
Tidings of judgment ever drawing near.
Time's latest sands are in his hour-glass shaken;
Trembling he sees the Great White Throne appear.

Lord, in that last dread hour of thy returning,
Grant that we all at Thy right hand may be Safe, whilst in flames a guilty world is burning,
Within the shelter of Thy love and Thee.

—Episcopal Recorder.

The Lord's Supper.

1. Our yearly brethren make a great flourish of trumpets in quoting Scripture to show that "breaking bread," etc., does not mean the Lord's supper. They refer to various Scriptures to prove this. So far as known this has never been assumed. This, then, is labor lost. I could add them in such quotations. But the Scripture, its context, and all the circumstances of the case, must be taken into the account. It is thus that they know it, and we know it in the same way. This breaking of bread in common meals is recorded, generally, because of the miraculous power of the Savior in converting a small amount of bread into a great sufficiency to feed thousands to satiety.

2. But, when they say that Acts ii. 42 and Acts xx. 7, mean "a common meal" they must show it by reason, by facts, as other things are shown. Have they done this? Can they do it? In Acts ii. 42, in its whole scope and design, their assumptions are excluded. It records the descent of the Holy Spirit, the immersion of all the disciples in it, the gifts of tongues, the unerring qualifications of the apostles for their great work, Peter's inimitable sermon, the conversion of three thousand souls, and adds that "they continued steadfastly in the apostle's doctrine and fellowship, and breaking of bread and in prayers."

3. The definite article in the Greek before each item, makes this "breaking of bread" here as much the teaching of the apostles' doctrine as either of the other items. The word apostles is understood before each item, and this necessarily excludes the idea of a common meal. If the doctrine be divine, revealed, so is the fellowship, so the breaking of bread, and so are the prayers. This, then, excludes the "common meal" theory. Did God fill the hearts of the apostles with the Divine Spirit only to enable them to teach their brethren the time and art of cooking and eating? (!)

4. But it was necessary in order to qualify them to teach the "apostles' doctrine," fellowship, breaking bread, and prayers. All these items were equally revealed by the same spirit, and therefore the breaking of bread was not a common meal. If one item be revealed all are. It is absolutely none or all. The construction of the sentence compels this interpretation.

5. But it is objected that, if this teaches the Lord's supper at all, it teaches its daily use! How? Oh! by quoting at Acts ii. 46. Is this so? By no means. Its first member affirms that the disciples continued "daily with one accord in the temple." They convened together for teaching, exhortation, and prayers; but they left the temple, separated into smaller parties, going "from house to house" to break bread in common meals, eating "their meat with gladness and singleness of heart." This explains itself. But in their religious worship they assembled together. To eat their "common meals" they went "from house to house," no doubt in small parties. The text and context demonstrate that Acts ii. 46 was "a common meal." So Acts ii. 42 demonstrates that the "breaking of bread" was a part of the process of the Lord's supper.

6. If this breaking of bread in Acts ii. 42 be the same as that in Acts ii. 46, then the apostles taught the silly doctrine that they "continued steadfastly" in eating "a common meal," and then continued "daily" in doing the same thing) that they ate their "common meals" "steadfastly," and then, for fear they could not eat enough, they "daily" continued gormandizing!!

7. The times made it necessary for the disciples to meet "from house to house" to eat their "common meals." Their Chief had just been crucified. He taught them to expect no better usage. Therefore, in this crisis, they made a common fund of all their property, so that they might be together and aid each other as much as possible. But their going "from house to house" was not to eat the Lord's Supper.

8. Therefore, all references to "common meals" in the wilderness places where Jesus fed the multitude by miracle, "meeting from house to house to eat their food with gladness of heart," "breaking bread" under such circumstances, are one and all of no avail to the yearly. And no man in his senses ever invoked these passages as teaching the Lord's Supper.

9. But it is assumed that "breaking of bread" is now here applicable to the Lord's Supper. I beg to dissent. That phrase or its equivalent is always used. (Mat. 26. 26.) "And as they were eating, Jesus took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave to his disciples and said, take, eat, this is my body." At its first ordination, after the passover, "breaking bread" is used. Also, in Cor. 11 23-26, where the Lord's Supper is named, "breaking bread" is used.

10. But as Christ is called "our passover," our yearly brethren think that the Lord's Supper should be taken yearly only, on the 14th of the first month Abid. If this were admitted, no living man could now tell when to take it. Some put this in march and others in April. We must not go to the law, to Jewish chronology, to the passover for proof of a christian institution. The apostles of our Lord were to teach "the all things" concerning Jesus and his religion. Moses must not be heard here. At Christ's baptism, God acknowledged him as his son; at his configuration the command was "hear ye him." Moses and the law have had their day. Now, Jesus and "the law of life" in him must be heard and obeyed. Circumcision, the passover, new moons, feasts and fasts, all Jewish rites only have met their completion in Christ.

11. No christian doctrine or practice may be proven by the law. If anything found in the law is to be retained in the christian system that thing is incorporated in the New Testament, and enforced by it. The yearly friends have as much scripture for circumcision, the Jewish Sabbath, feast and fast days, as they have for the Lord's Supper to be observed yearly. The law, with all these ceremonies, the passover amongst them, was only an addition to the Abraham's Faith, and were only imposed "until the time of reformation," or until the death and resurrection of the Savior. And, if the Lord's Supper took the place and time of the passover, so "baptism came in the room of circumcision."

12. The gospel preached to Abraham, God's covenant with him, through which all nations are to be blessed, was "four hundred and thirty years before the giving of the law." Indeed the law was only national, was circumscribed to a certain people and for a certain period. It never gave life but denounced death upon the transgressor. Christians are not to be judged "in meat or drink, or in respect of a holy day, or of the new moon, or of Sabbath days," nor in regard to the passover which is or was a part of the law-burden. Col. 2:16, and other scriptures effectually dispose of the whole paraphernalia of the law, and exalts Christ and his law above all.

13. What was the passover? The angel that passed over the Jews and destroyed the Egyptians. The lamb was not the passover. It was made to emblematize it. The passover was first observed a few hours in advance of that event. Its subsequent observances pointed back to it. It had no significance only to the Jews, excepting as a figure pointing to Christ.

14. Now Christ is our passover slain for us. If he is our (the Christian's passover) he is not the Jews' passover. He is not a national, but a personal, passover. The law then is changed. He belongs to the Christian dispensation, not to the Jewish. If the law is changed or abolished, we must not go to it for the time of the Lord's supper; but to the new law—to the dispensation to which Christ belongs. Now, as the lamb was slain and eaten before the actual passover, at its first ordination, so Christ instituted his supper before he was slain. The Jews did not literally eat the passover, but the lamb which represented it. Christians do not eat the passover (Christ) but the bread and wine that represent his death.

Here, the event, the facts, the law, the material are all changed. Instead of the angel we have Christ; a personal instead of a national institution; "the law of life" instead of "the law of sin and death." All Jews good and bad, partook of the passover; it is absolute sin, condemnation for any but true believers to partake of the Lord's supper. There they had a sacrificed lamb; here bread and wine. There they memorialized salvation from Egyptian slavery; here we memorialize salvation from sin and death, and eternal life in the paradise of God.

Now, as there is a change of events, of facts, of law, of material, of persons, our brethren are stopped from going to the law as to time. Ours is an ordinance of the New Testament, and not of the Old. The old is "done away in Christ." The passover represented a natural salvation; the Lord's supper, a personal salvation of all true believers, Jews or Gentiles.

15. Now Christ instituted this ordinance not at but after the last lawful Jewish passover. Had he intended this to take the place of that he would have so stated it. Nor, in that case, would he have first eaten of the passover and afterwards ordained and eaten of his supper with his disciples. Here are two separate, distinct ordinances. One had been in being fifteen hundred years, and now lawfully eaten of for the last time; and afterwards the other was instituted. The time was fixed by law for the first. The design of the last was made known; but the time was to be made known by his apostles after his resurrection. His death ended or finished the first; but, without his resurrection, the last was valueless. Hence, as it was to belong to the new dispensation, and as that was not in force until after his resurrection, the laws to govern it were to be revealed amongst "the all things" of that institution.

That it was instituted after the passover, is evident from Luke ii. 20, and other Scriptures. "Likewise also the cup after supper." What supper were they eating? The passover supper. If he took the cup "likewise," or as and when he took the bread, then of course the whole process of the Lord's Supper was after the passover supper.

16. Hence the whole matter now turns upon the time. We cannot go to the passover law, as to time; for it is "done away in Christ." We must, therefore, depend upon the New Testament. If it gives not the time, then there is no time for observance. Then we have a law demanding obedience, and nothing revealed by which we know whether we obey or not. This will not do. We, therefore, turn to the New Testament.

We have already said about enough on Acts ii. 42. That this was the Lord's Supper, I think, is evident. If so, it cannot be yearly; for "they continued steadfastly" in it. A thing cannot be done "steadfastly," or unremittingly, if only done once a year. Again, it was one of the things which the apostles taught and did. They certainly would not have stooped from their high calling to publish a cook book! or a book to learn the disciples how to eat!! But they taught "the breaking of bread" by divine inspiration, just as they taught "the fellowship" and "the prayers." This, as I have shown, was quite different from the breaking of bread "from house to house."

17. But I now examine Acts xx. 7. This must mean the Lord's Supper; for "the disciples met together to break bread." They did not meet "from house to house" to eat the Lord's Supper. Besides this was done "upon the first day of the week." Did the disciples only eat "common meals" once per week? If not, they were less gluttonous than the yearly make them, when they try to make Acts ii. 42 and Acts ii. 46 teach "common meals!" It seems there, according to our yearly brethren, the disciples did nothing but eat! But here, in Acts xx. 7, they did a whole week without eating "a common meal!" The intent, the design of meeting in Acts xx. 7, was to "break bread," and this was to be done "upon the first day of the week." The irresistible conclusion, therefore, is, that if this were "a common meal," then they ate this but once per week. So, also, if the Lord's Supper, they ate that once per week. Why all this ado by our brethren of the yearly to make this "a common meal?" Because, if admitted to be the Lord's supper, then away goes their darling yearly!

18. But the Divine Spirit has so hedged this event as to show that there were two breakings of bread—one by the church "upon the first day of the week," and for which they specially met, and one by Paul alone on the second day after preaching all night, and just as he was about to leave the disciples. Now, the disciples either did what they came together to do, or they did not. They came together "to break bread" "upon the first day," not at night, nor in the morning of the second day. Who will dare affirm that they did not do what they came together to do?

After they had done this, Paul being about to leave them continued his speech until about midnight. A young man becoming very sleepy, "fell down from the third loft, and was taken up dead." Then Paul went down, brought him to life, and "came up again, and broke bread, and ate, and talked a long while, even till break of day, so he departed." Now here is "a common meal" eaten alone by Paul on the second day. No living man can prove from this Scripture that a single soul ate a mouthful of this meal but Paul only. Paul, the man that preached, that saved the young man's life, is the same man, and the only man, that broke bread and ate after midnight. He was from home, had labored hard nearly all night, and was about to leave the church at break of day. The others were at home, and could eat their regular meals. Paul could not, and therefore provision had been made for him to eat before he left them.

19. Now this coming together here was not at the time of the passover. Paul and his companions "sailed away from Philippi" after the passover. They were "five days" in reaching Troas, and then "abode there seven days." And, after this, "upon the first day of the week" "the disciples came together to break bread." Here then, at least nineteen days after the passover, "the disciples met to break bread.

20. In 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2, Paul teaches "the collection for the saints" "upon the first day of the week." This is the "fellowship" of Acts ii. 42, and is intimately connected with "the breaking of bread," and is, indeed, a part of the order of worship taught in Acts ii. 42, and which was observed everywhere. For what Paul taught in this church he taught in every church. 1 Cor. iv. 17. Timothy was to "bring you"—the Corinthian church—"into remembrance of my ways which be in Christ, as I teach everywhere in every church." This, I think, settles the whole matter. For whatever the Corinthian church did through Paul's teaching, or his approval, all churches everywhere did the same thing.

21. But it is objected that, because both "breaking of bread and drinking of wine are not here used, it is not the Lord's Supper." This is the lamest of all lame arguments. All know, or ought to know, that a leading word or phrase, in all languages, is made to represent a whole series of action. In the same way, in law, the name of a writ represents all done under it. So here, the first and leading phrase—"breaking bread"—is made to represent the whole—the Lord's Supper. The Bible would be a curious book, indeed, if it literated and reiterated all the words and phrases of any one action, whenever that action was alluded to. If, every time the Lord's Supper was indicated, it should say, for instance, that the Jerusalem church or the Corinthian church met every first day to sing, to pray, to teach, to break bread, to drink wine, all in commemoration of the broken body and shed blood of the Savior, would we not have a most singular book? It presumes the disciples, after the institution had been ordained and known, would have common sense enough to know what was meant without reiterating all the words of the institution.

22. It is thus that it speaks of being saved by faith, saved by hope, saved by grace, saved by baptism, saved by his blood, saved by his name, saved by obedience, etc., etc. Now when the Bible speaks of any one of these as the cause of salvation, does it exclude any or all of the others? So when "breaking bread" is used, when the Lord's Supper is indicated, does it exclude the wine? Use the book in this way, we may prove anything, everything and nothing! No wonder, then, that sects and sectarianism prevail to such an alarming extent.

23. The xi. 20 of 1 Cor. and other portions of the same chapter are sometimes used to try to show that when the disciples "come together therefore unto one place, this is not to eat the Lord's Supper;" that this has no reference to eating the Lord's Supper. This chapter, I think, is strong against the yearly. In it Paul rehearses the whole, even as he had received it of the Lord. But the brethren had prevented it, had turned it into eating and drinking to excess. Some were "hungry" and others "drunken" when they approached the Lord's table. There were "divisions" and "heresies" amongst them. Indeed, they seemed to have converted this holy institution into a bacchanalian carousal. Hence Paul told them that, meeting in that way, perverting the design, viz., to show forth the Lord's death, "this is not to eat the Lord's Supper." Of course not. It was a drunken feast of their own. Wherefore" he tells them that thus eating "unworthily" they would be "guilty of the body and blood of the Lord." "But," he continued, so "let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread and drink of that cup." And, if he do this he says, "as often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, ye do shew forth the Lord's death till he come." But, because of the perversion of this institution among them, "many" had become "weak and sickly," and some had fallen "asleep" or died to their religion.

24. No Christian doctrine nor practice may be proven only from the Bible itself; yet corroborative evidences may be brought from history to show how those believed and acted at or near the times of the apostles. History in abundance may be brought to show that, for about two centuries of the Christian era, commencing with the life-time of the apostles, the Lord's Supper was universally observed every first day, and generally for about seven centuries. We will now only give one quotation. "Weekly communions did not die with the apostles and their contemporaries. There is a cloud of witnesses to testify that they were kept up by succeeding Christians, with great care and tenderness for above two centuries."

25. To sum up. The Jewish passover was a part of the law; it died when Christ ate it with his apostles the last time; that after this his supper was instituted and its design unfolded; that he gave his apostles authority to regulate it as to time, and they made it weekly; that the Scriptures fairly interpreted prove it to be weekly, and squarely against the yearly; and that there is no other time in which it may be Scripturally observed only "upon the first day of the week."

And as it is our spiritual food, as it shows our reverence and love for and obedience to the Divine Master who told us as "oft" as we eat and drink of the emblems, we show forth his death until he come again; as it is our light, our joy, our hope and life, instead of doing all we can to make it yearly, to place it under law instead of under grace, we should do all we can to unite the brotherhood upon it, and to urge all to so live as to be prepared to take it Scripturally; and that the very breathings of our souls, the outgushings of our purified hearts, should be, how "oft," O Lord! Divine Master! may we commune with thee and our brethren in that holiest of all holy institutions which cost the heart's blood of our blessed Redeemer!

ALFRED MALONE.

Worry and Its Physical Effects.

To so every-day and common a state of mind as worry, ranging, as it may, from a passing "fit of blues" up to the most poignant mental anxiety regarding life itself, little importance is popularly attached; and especially among so exceptionally nervous and rapid people as the Americans, the fact of a person succumbing under mental strain is of too ordinary occurrence to give rise to extended comment. To the list of the insane immured in asylums and brought thither through heredity or by their own excesses, thousands are added, suffering with broken minds induced by anxiety; but the great majority of people thus affected continue in their places in society, by no means lunatics, or maniacs, nor idiots, but nevertheless of brain unsound in parts. The world sometimes dubs them "eccentric" and, if they be distinguished, their odd habits, absence of mind, and like traits furnish rich material for the biographer; in other cases the eccentricities become crimes, and indiscriminating justice may declare the life forfeited because of the workings of hidden faculties, uncontrollable, because disorganized.

Worry, then, is dangerous, more so than the alcohol which kills the drunkard, for the latter involves a taste, and a habit which may be put aside; the former is the creature of necessity, and creeps insidiously into every man's life. Its physiological effects, therefore, should be clearly and adequately realized. And the knowledge of the ills may, in some instance, prevent the existence of the cause.

During the early stages of dementia induced by mental anxiety, Dr. Richardson tells us in his "Diseases of Modern Life," there is nothing more than an increased tension of the minute vessels which supply the brain. In later stages, the substance of the nervous tissue itself undergoes a modification by which its activity is permanently lost. These are the physiological consequences, most briefly summed up. The first symptom is a want of full bodily vigor; then follows craving for more work, disturbed sleep, acute sensitiveness to external impressions, and, finally, strange figures and sounds are seen and heard. This condition may continue for years, and the sufferer in time may begin to accept abnormal creations as natural. Dr. Richardson cites a case of a merchant, who for weeks retained in his vision the spectra of three lights, oval in shape, of the size of an egg, and so clearly defined to the observer that he would watch them half consciously as they floated before him on the wall, the ceiling, or in space. In this stage of the disease lies the foundation of all hypothesis of ghost-seeing, of ecstatic visions, and even of poetic frenzy. A curious instance directly in point, which came to our notice very recently, is that of a well-known writer on the press, who for some time past, has devoted attention to the subject of morbid mental conditions. This gentleman, in a letter to a daily journal, states himself to be the victim of the horrible spectacle of two men hanging from a gallows, a sight which he once beheld while acting as a city reporter. The suspended corpses are clearly brought before him by the sound of rain (the execution occurred during a rain storm), and also by the sound of laughter, since, through some uncontrollable impulse during the hanging, he was induced to utter an untimely peal of merriment. That the writer's brain is injured, possibly by the excessive mental strain peculiar to his profession, seems probable; and the lesion is manifested, as already described, by the constant recurrence of the apparition.

It is a well known fact that we have two natures, one purely organic and emotional, the other subject to the reasoning powers. The organic nervous chain exists in the body as a link between emotional mental acts and vascular supply. An impression from without, made through the organs of the senses upon the emotional centers, is reflected directly from them to the vascular expanse. The part flushes or blanches, and the heart hesitates, palpitates, rebounds, or intermits; so that these centers, excited by anxiety, or grief, or joy, or sorrow, influence the waves of blood passing through the system, and the brain promptly feels the imperfect regulation of the supply. Under varying tensions of the vessels, there are flashes, chills, coldness of the extremities, and other oppressive symptoms, while in addition appear the distressing ringing or hammering sounds in the head. These sounds are arterial murmurs, vibrations of the blood which presses with each impulse of the heart on the bony surroundings of the relaxed carotid canal, situated at the base of the skull. The canal is in direct connection, by solid conducting substance, with the organs of hearing, and thus the faintest vibration is detected. The sound produced when it is sudden and unexpected, as in moments of fear, is occasionally mistaken for a sound proceeding from without no obvious cause.

Thus the sufferer is likely to see visions and hear strange noises, impalpable so to speak, but as purely physical as the most common things in life. In some instances they are actual perceptions of real facts or objects, caught by an extremely susceptible and delicate nervous surface. In others they are an intensified recognition of movements within the body; but in the vast majority of instances they are actual impressions made, at some time on the organism and now recalled and rendered more definite by constant recurrence.

"At this point, if the mental powers be allowed rest and the fountains of care be closed, recovery may take place; but if the over strain continue, the disease assumes still graver forms. There is a smoldering desire for work, more work, coupled with the sad sensation that the physical powers are failing; and then, there are lapses of memory. The man of business forgets important details, he is irritable, distrusts everybody and himself most, makes mistakes, and yet persists in accomplishing more work on himself. The poet and novelist become over sentimental and morbid; the man troubled with remorse for guilt confesses his crime, or commits suicide. The downward course is rapid: in one case epilepsy occurs, in another paralysis, a third develops some hereditary malady—like cancer, a fourth dies from nervous failure and local disease of some vital organ. The majority, escaping these special ends, become prematurely old, and sink helplessly into death. The brain becomes disorganized, the balance is broken, and anarchy succeeds to what once was order.

"In every brain, in fact, there is set up primitively a kindly force, to which all other forces bend. The king may be good or bad, he may be an hereditary king or a usurper, but he holds the balance; kill the king, and, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, the kingdom is made chaos and dark night."—Scientific American.

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the sole dominion of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sin, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

The Jews.

REV. S. DONHOMME.

Thou shalt arise, and have mercy upon Zion: for the time to favor her, yea, the set time, has come. For thy servants take pleasure in the stones, and favor the dust thereof. Ps. cii. 13, 14.

Whatever opinion may be formed as to the especial mode in which the attempts are made to restore the Jews to Palestine, the circumstances that the attention of so many individuals, Israelites and Christians as well as some of the crowned heads of Europe, has been called to the national prosperity of God's literal Israel, cannot be overlooked by the Hebrew Nation. In view of this providential interference at this time, the Jews feel that they are no longer outcasts and despised, and they cannot remain indifferent to what is taking place.

Political changes are every year taking place in the East, which augur well for the Jews, and present appearances favor the expectations that further changes will soon so dispose the nations about Palestine, that the scattered millions of Israel may be restored to their native land.

The late projects of two eminent Jews, Rothschild and Sir Moses Montefiore, the first to purchase Jerusalem and its neighboring places, as a refuge and home to all Jews wishing to return to a land consecrated by a thousand sacred associations, and the latter to secure, by a sort of lease, the possession of several towns and villages held sacred by the Jews, for the purpose of colonizing them there, may indicate one means by which the Jew may be reinstated into more than his original civil privileges.

Sir Moses Montefiore, in 1840, on a mission to St. Petersburg, to negotiate with the Autocrat of the North, was graciously received by the late Emperor, who had favored his wishes to visit his brethren of the dispersion in Russia, and consented to the emigration of ten thousand Jews to Palestine, or some other settlement which Sir Moses may fix upon.

At that period the British Government, in the appointment of a Consular Agent at Jerusalem, gave instructions that he should, to the utmost of his power, afford protection to the Jews.

Among various other circumstances that deserve notice in this respect, we may refer to the frequent visits of Sir Moses and lady to the land of their fathers, they being accompanied on their journey by a Christian gentleman who was anxious to carry into effect a plan for colonizing Canaan by the Israelites. In the meantime a venerable gentleman and friend of this people, W. Cunningham, Esq., of England, had published a letter to Lord Ashley, in which he advocated promoting the agricultural settlements in Palestine by Israelites, by assisting them with money to defray the expenses of their voyages, erect houses, and maintain themselves for the first year, and also with agricultural and other implements.

We notice also, of Jewish colonies which have been planted by Jews in Palestine for industrial purposes, and to those whose attention have been directed to the agricultural purposes and prospects of the Holy Land, have furnished a tabular statement of the fall of the former and latter rains between the years of 1840, and 1853, which rains were withheld by Providence during the nineteen centuries of dispersion, so essential to the husbandman, and without which little can be realized in the cultivation of the soil, more especially beneath an oriental sky, a literal fulfillment of propheecy declared by the prophet Joel more than 2,500 years ago (Joel ii: 23).

The following tabular statements of the fall of rain between 1840 and 1853, as stated by Dr. Macgowan, then resident at Jerusalem, will doubtless prove interesting.

We observe next, that a party of wealthy gentlemen from England, at that period left for Jerusalem, with the purpose of commencing a colony in Jericho. At Tyre and Sidon also, an architect from England proceeded, with men and means, to commence a colony.

An eminent Jew purchased land in the vicinity of Jerusalem, and about Jaffa, upon which Jews are settled and laboring. A wealthy Jewess, the widow of a rich banker, Madame Pollack, resident at Koenigsberg, Prussia, purchased the Mount of Olives, in order to beautify the place with improvements at her own expense. The first thing she did was to plant the whole area with a grove of olive trees, and thus to restore it to the original state of beauty from which it derives its name.

The time having come to favor Zion, the rains occuring in their seasons, as of old, as well as many other signs of returning mercy to the land long desolate, has abundantly been demonstrated by actual experience and experiment in the last thirty-five years. The land is proven to be amazingly fertile and is abounding in some favored localities, as about Jaffa, Artos, Bethlehem, and about Jerusalem, with fruits capable of sustaining the people during six months in the year, and an abundance of vegetables, of the largest size and richest flavor, promising three harvests during the year.

We extract from a London paper following statement with reference to the change in Palestine. It says: "The land is looking up from her long nights of sorrow, and Palestine, once desolate, now a grain-growing country, is certainly a sign that her redemption is at hand." It further says: "There were lying, in 1861, in Falmouth harbor, forty vessels laden with grain from Syria and Palestine, to be followed by father arrivals of the same character; many more vessels, similarly freighted, are on their way to England.

And what do all these providences teach us, but that Jehovah is about to remember his covenant with his ancient people, and is preparing them to return to the covenanted land.

And in continuation of this, we notice that the late Prussian Ambassador at the court of the Pontiff, declared that throughout the vast dominions of Germany and Poland there is a general movement of inquiry, and a longing expectation abroad that something will take place to restore the Jews to the land of their fathers.

The Rev. T. Grimshawe says, in confirmation, a vast number of Israelites are preparing to emigrate from Germany and Poland to settle in Palestine; while throughout the whole of Europe and Asia, a general expectation is raised among them that the time of their deliverance is drawing near. Throughout Italy the same uneasiness and expectation may be observed. This movement of the Jews toward Palestine, whatever may be thought of it as an evidence of a literal return, is at least indicative of a state of mind not to be overlooked in our present discussion.

In turning our attention to the prospects of this people, we behold an ever active Providence in preparing the way for restoring his chosen nation to the land of their fathers, and to the favor of their God, and to their beloved their Messiah, Prince and King. The time is near at hand when this standing monument of Divine displeasure, this once high honored but now scattered and dispersed family, is to be gathered from all the nations whither the Lord their God has scattered them. Ezekiel xxxvi: 33-38; xxxix: 25-29.

When this period shall have come—come it must—it will be an eventful period for the world. (Micah vii: 15-20.) The Prophet, anticipating their restoration, says: "An highway shall be made for them, as in the days of Assyria, when they came up out of the land of Egypt." When this people went down into the land of Egypt, the Assyrian oppressed them. When the Lord was about to deliver them, he called Moses, the man of God, and said unto him, "I have seen the affliction of my people, and come down to deliver them." Every difficulty was taken out of the way, and they went out triumphantly. In like manner, when the seventy years of Babylon's captivity had expired, the Lord inclined the hearts of Darius and Cyrus, by whose decrees in their favor every hindrance was removed for their return to their own beloved land. In fact, the only plan which would tend to effectually secure the peace and prosperity of Palestine, would be the settlement of the many millions of them there; being an active, enterprising people, they would soon rid the land of the marauding Arab tribes and promote its welfare in every respect.

Recent discoveries made in Africa and Japan, among the Affghans and Chinese, will swell the number greatly. Having taken special pains within the last twenty years to collect carefully from missionary statistics furnished by the missionaries sent among the Jews throughout the world—missionaries numbering between two hundred and three hundred—a source the most reliable—the following is a table, in specified order, as to the actual number of Jews scattered:

Happy shall those be who shall be employed in accomplishing God's purposes of mercy to his ancient people, for they shall prosper, as the prophet says, who love Zion. The honor and happiness to be thus obtained, appears to be now within the reach of two maritime powers. It is foretold that the ships Tarshish, first (Isaiah ix: 9), and next, the propelling vessels of the land of over-shadowing wings (Isaiah xviii), shall be employed in conducting the dispersed of Judah and the outcast of Israel to their home; and who are likely to be employed in this service, or who should more easily accomplish it than the Anglo-Saxon nations, whose fleets have been long engaged in protecting and succoring the wretched, which have access to countries where the Jews are to be found. That the promises of Jehovah shall be accomplished by two Gentile nations is absolutely certain, and everything seems to indicate their speedy fulfillment. Who that has paid any attention to passing events for the last few years in the Holy Land, can fail of seeing that God, in his providences, is now opening a similar way for their return to the prophetic land.

For nearly 2,000 years have these interesting people been wandering as strangers in every country under heaven, mingling in society everywhere, occupying a conspicuous place in all the commercial and moneyed transactions of the world around; and yet, for all that, a distinct people, and a separate people from all others, as the generation that was first scattered, with a love for the land of Israel, as undiminished with hopes as strong, and expectations as undying, as any preceding generation.

We ask what other emigrating tribe has retained for so many centuries such a love of country, or cherished with such ardent desire the hope of return, as this singular people? But they are a peculiar people; they are, in a sense singular, the people of God; their land, the land of God; their national city, the city of God; and no matter where they dwell, whether in the icy regions of the north, or in the burning sands of the south, their eyes and their hopes are turned to their fatherland; and generation after generation has expressed its ardent love in its race of pilgrims, who, notwithstanding all the difficulties and oppressions they have for ages been doomed to encounter, have braved every difficulty for what they considered the holy privilege of dying and being buried in the land of the prophets. Of late God has removed, in a great measure, the difficulties which stood so long in their way, and the pilgrim Jew can now visit the tombs of his ancestors freed from the long accustomed burdensome tax, while Jews from every land can, undisturbed and unmolested, go there and present their petitions and their vows, if not in the temple (that the Shiloh graced) yet in the land where the temple once stood.

The Jews are allowed to build houses of worship in their synagogues, none making them afraid. Thus a highway is opening for their return.

To the student of the Bible and church history there are few current subjects of more absorbing interest or deeper significance than the events now daily transpiring which point to the repossession of the Jews of their own land. The tide of progress, after a lapse of centuries, may be said to have fairly turned in that direction, and the prayer long offered by that chosen, but now scattered people, that Judah may be saved and Israel dwell securely, and that the Redeemer may come to Zion, is undoubtedly hastening to fulfillment.—Prophetic Times.

Strength of the Christian Revolution in Turkey.

In computing the probabilities of the success of the Christian insurgents in the struggle with their Mohammedan oppressors there has always been one element of difficulty in ascertaining their real military strength, so that it has been impossible to determine whether they could maintain a war with Turkey upon their own means of aggression or defense, or whether their only hope of success would depend upon foreign intervention. Some light, however, has now been thrown upon the subject by Herr Von Wickede, an eminent German military authority, who has been a close observer of all the wars of the past twenty-five years, and who was the famous correspondent of the Kolnische Zeitung during the Franco-German war. Having recently completed a military review of Turkey for the Allgemeine Zeitung, he has now, for the same paper, made a review of the offensive and defensive capabilities of Roumania, Servia, and Montenegro, from the aggregate of which arrives at the general conclusion that these powers, even if left to themselves, would be very likely to get the better of the Turks. Some of the details of his observations will prove of very general interest. In point of military power he places Roumania between Servia and Montenegro. The Roumanians excel the Serbs in numbers, but in physique, courage, and discipline, the Serbs are superior to the Roumanians. He claims that the Roumanian governing classes are among the least worthy specimens of an aristocracy in the world. He also remarks: "Especially in the upper ranks in Roumania there reigns generally—of course with numerous exceptions—such corruption, effeminacy, and immorality that it is almost impossible for them to produce efficient officers. These young Boyars have usually devoted themselves to all the excesses of the modern civilization of the West, and often outstrip their Parisian models." The army numbers on the war footing 45,000 regular troops and 8,000 horses, with 124 guns, together with a species of active reserve of militia numbering some 23,000 men. Besides these there is the National Guard, corresponding to the German Landwehr, which embraces the remaining manhood of the country. In Servia and Montenegro the people are martial and warlike by nature, and have been thoroughly trained and organized for war. Montenegro, having only a population of 120,000, can place 25,000 men under arms. Of its little army he says:

The Montenegrins combine with their military organization the older organization by clans and families so natural in a little patriarchal state of mountaineers settled from time immemorial in the same valleys. The entire territory is divided into eight Nahies or districts, each under a Serda or Governor, and is inhabited by thirty-eight clans, who are, again, subdivided into families, intensely proud of their pedigrees. The army consists of thirty battalions, of eight to twelve companies each, according to the number of families of which it is composed, each company including the men of a single family, and the mutual affection and emulation of kinsmen are thus enlisted in the directest way in the defense of the beloved native land. The artillery of Montenegro consists of twenty-eight mountain guns, and the requisite military instruction is provided for the Montenegrin officers at St. Petersburg, where a certain number of the noblest youths are always under training. Servia, with a population of 1,500,000, is almost as completely organized.

Herr Wickede classes the Servians as among the finest soldiers in the world, who have always displayed first-class military qualities, both in the Servian and Austrian services. The regular army is small, but the First Ban of the National Guard alone includes 44,000 troops of the line, 4,000 cavalry, and forty-three batteries of artillery, numbering 258 guns and 5,000 artillerymen, all of whom are thoroughly good troops. The National Guards of the Second Ban, who are little inferior to the first, includes 40,000 men and eighteen batteries of artillery, thus showing that Servia alone can place over 80,000 effective troops in the field, in view of which Herr Wickede thinks that "Unless Austria, ceding to Magyar pressure, should hamper the Servian attack, it may be doubted whether any further force would be required to settle the larger part of the Eastern question."—Chicago Tribune.

Future Life.

John 11. 25-26, "Jesus said unto her I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me though he were dead, yet shall he live: And whosoever lieth and believeth in me shall never die."

This has been quoted as positive proof of the immortality of the soul; that it exist independently of the body; yet, if this text is properly analyzed, and every word given its proper meaning, it will be found to teach altogether a different doctrine. Let us look clearly and see what is the real meaning of this text. "I am the resurrection and the life, he that liveth and believeth in me, though he were dead yet shall he live;" future tense. "Though were he dead" is in the past tense. Here we have a man dead, and the promise, that if he believe, he shall live again; and he that liveth and believeth in me shall never die." "Jesus unmistakably was refering to the time when they that are dead shall come forth. And he that liveth and believeth shall never die. The meaning according to common sense, and a just observance of the meaning of words, would be this; that if a person believed on Christ, though he should die, he should again see life; that is, he should be resurrected; and whosoever that lived again, and believes on him shall never die. This is the understanding and belief as regards this text held by many searchers of Bible truths. If those who so strongly advocate this doctrine of immortal soulism, would search earnestly, and, resolve that they will believe the doctrine of the Bible, whether it accords with their theory or not, they would soon be advocating the doctrine, that without a resurrection there is no future life. There are many who contend that it does not make any particular difference whether the doctrine they hold is in accordance with the Bible or not, that if they believe that Jesus died on the cross, was buried, and rose again to save them from punishment, that is sufficient, no difference whether they know what this punishment is, or what the kingdom of God is, or where it is to be established, or whether it has been established, whether its establishment is in the future or not. This is a way they have to get out of an argument. For though they say, it makes no difference what your belief is, if our heart is right, and we are in earnest in what we profess, yet they think it is damable to believe that in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable; and, if there be no resurrection, then they that are fallen asleep in Christ are perished; to mean just what it says. Strange how men can thus pervert the word of God. It can be proved, and plainly too, that it matters agreat deal whether we believe the truth or some other doctrine. To the law and to the testimony, if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them. And it natuarly follows that if there is no light in them, that they are the children of darkness, Mat. 15. 9. "In vain do they worship me who teach for doctrine the commandments of men." These are the words of Jesus; who can gainsay them?

And Peter, speaking of Paul, says 2. Peter 3. chap. 15 verse; As in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things; in which are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other scriptures, unto their own destruction. So we learn that they which wrest the scriptures do it to their destruction." Rev. 22, 19. "And if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book."

A BELIEVER.

Yearning for Something New.

How natural it is for us to yearn for something new, when we have worn a garment month in and month out! How tired we get of it, and how we yearn for something new! Yes, I say yearn for something new. Do not think I am going to give you a lecture on dress, for this is only the way I take to illustrate, or rather give you to understand how I look upon this subject.

I am yearning for something new. For a new suit? Not at all. I am not yearning for something this world can give, for any perishing, fading, decaying things of this world. Now what do you suppose it is? I am yearning for the wonderful coming of our Savior. Will not this be something new and wonderful? Do we not feel tired of this world as it is? Has it not become old and threadbare? Is it not growing more corrupt each day? Yes; we are yearning for our Savior's coming, for it will be something new and wonderful; for he has said, "Lo, I will come again; and make all things new, and all old things shall pass away"? Yes, yearning for the time to come when every man shall speak the truth to his neighbor; when the wolf and the lamb shall dwell together: when the lion will eat straw like the ox, and nation will be at peace with nation. Will not this be something new, when the promises which were made unto Abraham will be fulfilled? Oh, will not this be something new and desirable?

Let us still be faithful, and our yearning will be over when the night of death overtakes us; and we then shall rest till the trump of God shall sound to wake the sleeping dead. Then our yearning will be over, and we shall forever rejoice when all things are made new through Jesus Christ our Savior.

ELLIS M. STEELE.

"He is dead, but he pays just as well as he ever did," was the reply a newspaper publisher received to a dunning letter.

THE RESTITUTION

Pl[illegible]TH, IND.....May 24, 1876

ED[illegible]RIAL DEPARTMENT

☞ We are to preach in Chicago next Sunday, morning and evening. Should any of our brethren be sojourning in the city over Sunday, they can attend meeting. We understand that we are to preach at the corner of Robey street and Warren Avenue.

The Way of Life.

There are many striking illustrations of the life which Christ is to give to his followers. Everything connected with the way leading to the gates of peace, is presented as living. The bread, designed to save the perishing sons of earth, is the bread of life. The way leading out of the valley of death, is the way of life. The book, wherein is found written the names of the redeemed, is the book of life. The tree, whereon grows the fruits of immortality, is the tree of life. The waters which flow from the throne of God, are the waters of life. The gospel, the truth, and the gift of God are presented to us living and eternal. Death, the grave, sin, sorrow, tears, torments and terrors, belong to the age of thorns, but peace, immortality; the crown, the throne and life, belong to that new world where the King shall reign in eternal beauty.

Two-Fold Influence of Israel.

Many honest and well meaning people leave an idea that the whole question of Israel's influence is confined to Palestine. This is a great mistake. The influence of the Israelites outside of Palestine is greater to-day than it ever was in the palmiest days of David, or of Solomon. We were very much struck with a remark once made by Prof. Butler, who delivered the Centennial address for the State of Vermont some years ago. He stated that there were two Vermonts, one at home and one abroad. And it was shown that Vermont number two was greater than number one. This remark applies to the question of Israel. The idea that the whole question of Israel's future is locked up in their return to Palestine is a very meagre view to take of the general subject. Those who oppose any future return of the nation presume that if any such return should occur that there would be no Israelites left among the Gentiles. Here is where one of the leading errors begins. ☞ the reader will take a little pains and examine the prophets he will learn that Israel has a two-fold influence, one at home and one among the nations. Micah has reference to this point in these remarkable words: "And the remnant of Jacob shall be in the midst of many people, as a dew from the Lord, as the showers upon the grass, that tarrieth not for man, nor waiteth not for the sons of men." Micah v: 8.

The reader will find much in the prophets to carry out the above thought. We make the foregoing suggestion to readers so that they may have a starting point for what appears to us to be an interesting theme. The idea that the Israelites should become familiar with every language of the earth without some great purpose looks sceptical to us. They are the future repositories in connection with Millennial times to carry the great work for conversion forward among those who have not seen or heard the fame and glory of the Lord. See Isaiah lxvi: 19-20.

The Fair Chance Question.

We have had frequent inquiries from a goodly number of brethren upon the subject of what is called the fair chance theory, etc. We have believed for years that God had given, or would give, all men a fair chance. He is no respecter of persons, and will accord to all a fair opportunity to be saved. So it appears to us. Indeed, we do not know of any one who objects to this point. The issue is not upon the point whether God is partial, for all believe that He is a God of justice and impartiality. Some claim that all who have died in the ages past, have had all the light necessary for their condemnation, and that no necessity exists for their resurrection in order to a future probation; while it is claimed by others that the world of the dead have really had no chance at all, that, therefore, they must be raised in order to receive or reject the offers of salvation. This view has been set forth with great force by Thomas Belsham, of England, in his works, printed in 1809. There are those who think the subject has been dormant until a very few years past, but this is a mistake. Both sides of the subject have been ably discussed by learned men, in different forms, during many years past.

While we have held the opinion for many years, we have never seen it to be our duty to make it a hobby and trench upon the rights of those who believe that God has already given the light to those who are dead. The question does not so directly concern us as does the great theme of the Gospel and its obedience. But, says one: "It is Gospel to believe in all of God's promises." So say we; but we must not try to place in the foreground that which is only shadowed forth from the beneficent results of Christ's blessed reign. In our zeal to press some recondite question we often forget the duties of to-day, and men perish with hunger at our door. We do not believe in placing the Gospel light under a bushel of tradition, but let it so shine that men will see our good works and glorify our Father in heaven.

Christianity has within its ample provisions a yesterday, a to-day and to-morrow, and it is incumbent upon us to realize that we are in the to-day, which brings with it many responsibilities, and urgent duties. We must not place all of our time in the yesterday, nor in the to-morrow, but have due regard for to-day. Memory and hope are wedded in the now of our being, and we must adjust them by a well ordered life in Christ, whose blessed promises shine in the morn of the coming morrow.

We are fully conscious of the fact that the foregoing statement will be deemed too conservative by those whose heads are yet hot in pursuit of knowledge pertaining to Christ's work in the coming ages, but we must keep close to the sacred altar from whence flows the steady light of eternal truth. Our readers rejoice with us in the glorious hope of life through Jesus, and expect a crown of victory when the King shall make up his jewels. There are many blessed promises gleaming forth upon the sacred pages which are only partially understood and will not be until the "fullness of the times" come in. Let every heart do its duty now and the future will be ours forever.

The Jews.

An interesting communication, in relation to the number of the Jews in their dispersion among the nations, will be found in this number of the RESTITUTION. We will give, in addition, only a brief statement in regard to the commencement of the prosperity and wealth of the House of the Rothschilds. The founder of this House was Mayer Anselm Rothschild, who was born in Frankfort, in 1743. His family was poor, and he was employed as a clerk before he had any connection with government affairs in regard to financial matters. When Hesse-Cassel was invaded by the French in 1806, the elector, William, deposited $5,000,000 for safe keeping with Rothschild, allowing him to retain it for eight years without interest. The careful and judicious investment of this large sum became the source and origin of the stupendous wealth of the renowned bankers of the world. Mayer Anselm had five sons; Anselm, Solomon, Nathan, Charles, and James, who respectively became the chief of houses at Frankfort, Vienna, London, Naples, and Paris. These have become celebrated throughout the world for their financial operations in making loans to governments, and in general banking, and mercantile operations. Members of this renowned family still conduct the business of this immensely wealthy house, as a general firm, the present head of which is Lionel Nathan, of the London house, who was elected to Parliament from the city of London, in 1847. He was the first Jew that ever attained the honor of a seat in the house of commons. We think it quite likely that this house will act some very conspicuous part in relation to the fulfillment of prophesy concerning Palestine and the Jewish people. Our age is an age of wonders. S. A. Consistency.

The religious press of the country, for some months past, have kept up a constant howl against the Centennial ground being thrown open on Sunday. It was urged that the Christian sentiment of the throng who would attend the great international show would be outraged by the alarming sin of Sabbath breaking, to such an extent that the interest of the exhibition would be impaired.

Perhaps so. I would not for a moment underestimate the importance to the American people of the institution called the Sabbath. And it seems to me wise and filling that the world at Philadelphia this year should see how conscientious Americans are in matters of faith. While I was consoling myself with these thoughts, the following facts came to light: While the Christian sentiment of the people would not allow the centennial managers to open the grounds on Sunday, yet it would and did allow them, without protest to have set in operation saloons and whisky shops on the Centennial grounds in such number that the licenses paid amount to $181,500, and it is estimated that 80,000 drinks will be sold in a day.

Is not this an outrage on Christian sentiment?

There has been much said, of late, about bribes and bribe taking, but here is a gigantic bribe of nearly two hundred thousand dollars, the consequences of which will be far more ruinous than any resulting from the bribes which Belknap ever received! And is there no one to object? Sabbath breaking with impunity is a sin, and should be dealt with as such, but is not intemperance, with its manifold forms of iniquitous development a sin of deeper hue and graver import?

The Centennial will not only exhibit to the civilized world how this great country has progressed in arts and literature, in the pursuits of agriculture and mechanics, but also it will show on a grand scale its great capacity for making drunkards. And is this not an abomination? And is this to go without a word of protest from those religious quarters where the Sunday question was treated with such vigor?

Oh consistency, what a jewel thou wouldst be if we only had thee!

Yours truly,

JUDEX.

The New Jerusalem.—No. 1.

O. W. STETSON.

The New Jerusalem, of Rev. iii. 12, which the angel in chapter xxi. 9, calls "the bride, the Lamb's wife;" and Jno. in verse 10, denominates, "the holy Jerusalem," is by so many supposed to be "the place," and "the house," in which are the "many mansions," and such extravagant computations have been made of its size, and the number of rooms in it, and of their capacity to accommodate all the redeemed; that we find ourselves under a necessity of giving this portion of the subject a special consideration. Our Lord, Jesus, in that wonderful prophecy of his, as recordeded by Luke, (xxi. 24,) says of Jerusalem's destruction, (by Titus, under Vespacian), that from them "it shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled."

That declaration is, certainly, a very strong implication that after Gentile times are ended, then Jerusalem is to be restored, builded again in her own place, and "trodden down" no longer. Now, have we any promises in Scripture to this effect, and if so, can they be harmonized with other declarations, as, "God hath prepared for them, (his people), a city," also Rev. xxi. 10, " * * "and he shewed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven, from God." Believing that we have the promises, no difficulty can arise that will prevent harmony, should our belief of "promise" be found correct. Let us examine the subject. Of the text, "he hath prepared for them a city," we would say: Yes, that is in his plan, and according to his purpose; but Paul says, in Rom. iv. 17, that "God calls those things that be not, (yet) as though they were,"—already in existence; and on this principle He calls himself "the God of Abraham, * * * of Isaac, and * * * of Jacob," notwithstanding "he is not a God of the dead," though these "fathers" are now dead, for "all live unto him" who makes the dead to live again.

By consulting Isa. lxv. 17, 18, we find that the city, was not, as yet, "prepared," actually, in Isaiah's day, and we also learn that the time for the creation of that city, is synchronal with the creation of the "new heavens," and of "a new earth," which is admitted to be still future to the present time of our day, consequently the material, architectural structure of that city is not yet an accomplished fact.

But there are two things which demand particular attention, as specified, and comprehended in the promise of verse 18.

I. "I create Jerusalem a rejoicing."

II. "I create her people a joy."

Further, "I will

1. Rejoice in Jerusalem."

2. "I will joy in my people."

We here have what is common to all languages, viz.: A city spoken of in a double sense, one involving the inhabitants as the city, and the other the architectural and material structures only. We give an example parallel. "One-fourth of the city was destroyed, but no lives were lost," referring evidently to the mechanical structure. "One-tenth of the city perished by the pestilence," involving the people only.

This, I apprehend, leads to the truth and harmony of what are only, seemingly discrepancies. Ezekiel in his vision, is shown the reconstructed city proper, while John, under the symbol of a city, is shown the Lambs wife, who is to dwell in the city of the Great King. The key to this, is found in the words of Jesus. Rev. iii. 12. "And I will write upon him (that overcometh,) the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is New Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God." The bride overcomes, and when the marriage of the Lamb takes place, he confers on her these three titulary distinctive names:

1. That of his God and father.
2. New Jerusalem.
3. His own new name.

"Come hither, John, and I will shew thee the bride, the Lamb's wife. * * * and he (the angel), shewed me * * * that great city, the holy Jerusalem, the New Jerusalem," which Paul in Gal. iv. 26, says, "is the mother of us all." Where the birth-giving Spirit is spoken of only. Revelation, undoubtedly, is to be studied and understood, in and by the light of preceding Scripture, and that says in Psa. cii. 16, "When the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory, * * * to declare the name of the Lord in Zion, and his praise in Jerusalem, when the people are gathered together, and the kingdoms to serve the Lord." Four things in this prophetic promise merit special attention:

1. His appearing in glory.
2. The gathering of the people.
3. The transformation of the kingdoms to his service.
4. The work then to be done.

Peter says the glory follows the sufferings of Christ, and that the time and manner of time, referring to the glory, was revealed to the prophets, and Paul connects our "gathering together" unto Christ, with his coming and glory, while John places the time when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord, and his taking to himself his great power and reigning, under the sounding of the seventh trumpet, which brings the time of the completion of the mystery of God, as he has promised, "that the Gentiles shall be partakers, with Israel, of his promised blessings through the Gospel," and the prophets have largely declared the 4th, in the fullest and clearest manner, viz: "To build up Zion, to redeem Jerusalem, to declare the name of the Lord in Zion;" and the 13th verse of this psalm, says that this time of his appearing in glory, is the set time, (or time set), "for the Lord to arise, have mercy upon, and favor Zion, * * * and so—as a result,—the Gentiles shall fear the name of the Lord, and all the kings of the earth his glory."

In Psa. liii. 6, we read: "O that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion! When God bringeth back the captivity of his people, Jacob shall rejoice and Israel shall be glad." Some claim that Israel and Jacob refer to, and mean the same, i. e., they are synonims; but Ezek. xxi. 25, proclaims the "overturning" of Israel's kingdom, and in Amos ix. 8, God says: "I will destroy it from off the face of the earth, (and he has), saving that I will not utterly destroy the house of Jacob," (and he has not), which looks very much as if they were not "one and the same." But Isa. lvi. 8, reads: "When the Lord shall bring again Zion, then her watchmen shall sing, * * * and lift up the voice together, for they shall see eye to eye," and in lxii. 6, "I have set watchmen on the walls of Zion that shall never hold their peace day nor night, * * * till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth," (and xxxiii. 20,) then "thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down, * * * the inhabitant shall not say, "I am sick," the people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity." At that time, Jeremiah says, (iii. 17,) they shall call Jerusalem, "the throne of the Lord,"—which agrees with Rev. xxii. 3,—and all the nations (tribes), shall be gathered unto it, * * * to Jerusalem," and Ezek. xlviii 35, announces that, from that day, the name of the city shall be, "Jehovah Shammah," i. e., "the Lord is there." Zechariah also saw the line go forth to measure Jerusalem, and he says, "For I, saith the Lord, will be unto her, a wall of fire round about, and (I) will be the glory in the midst of her * * * 10. sing and rejoice, O daughter of Zion; for lo I come, and I will dwell in the midst of thee, saith the Lord, and many nations shall be joined to the Lord in that day, and shall be my people; and I will dwell in the midst of thee, and thou shalt know that the Lord of hosts' hath sent me unto thee."

Paul says in Rom. xi. 25-27: "For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits, that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved; as it is written, There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob: For this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins."

In Acts iii. 20, Peter says, this "sending of Jesus Christ," is (or will be) "at the times of the restitution of all things spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets," among which is this restoration of Jerusalem, as the city of the great King, and Zechariah says, then they "shall know," but at the first advent they did "not know," for Jesus wept over the city, Luke xix. 41-44, saying, "If thou hadst known, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes, * * * (until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in,) because thou knowest not the time of thy visitation;" then again in chapter xiii. 35: "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, * * * behold your house is left unto you,—desolate,—(because of unbelief they were broken off,) and verily I say unto you, ye shall not see me, (again,) until the time come, (the set time of Psa. cii. 13, and cxviii. 26,) when ye shall say, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord," (of hosts, who hath (then) sent me unto thee; Zech. ii. 11,) ("for God is able to graft them in again;") and then will come the mourning of chapter xii. 9-14. Chapter xiv. 4, says! "And his feet shall stand, in that day, upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem, on the east, and the Mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof toward the east and toward the west, and there shall be a very great valley; and half of the mountain shall remove toward the north, and half of it toward the south, and ye shall flee (not to, but from,) the valley of the mountains (the divided northern and southern parts of Olives) for the valley of the mountains (divided Olives,) shall reach unto Azal; (ancient Ashkelon on the sea coast,) yea, ye shall flee like as ye fled from before the earthquake, in the days of Uzziah, king of Judah; and the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with thee, * * * and the Lord shall be king over all the earth; in that day shall there be one Lord, and his name one. All the land shall be turned as a plain from Geba to Rimmon, south of Jerusalem; and it, (Jerusalem,) shall be lifted up (restored,) and inhabited in her place, from Benjamin's gate unto the place of the first gate, unto the corner gate, and from the tower of Hananeel unto the king's wine presses, and men shall dwell in it, and there shall be no more utter destruction; but Jerusalem shall be safely inhabited. And it shall be in that day, that living waters shall go out from Jerusalem; half of them toward the former sea, (Dead Sea,) and half of them toward the hinder sea; (the Mediterranean,) in summer, and in winter shall it be."

We find, not less than four witnesses, all testifying alike, as to time, place, origin, and nature of these waters, viz.: Ezek. xlvii. 1-12; Joel iii. 18; Zech. xiii. 1; xiv. 8; and Jno. in Rev. xxii. 1. If we include Psa. xlvi, and Isa. xxxv. 4-10, then there are six.

As to the events predicted of, and connected with the Mount of Olives, we all know, as well as men can know anything by geography, history, living testimony, and actual observation, that no such earthquake valley does now, nor has existed since, neither was one in existence at the time of our Savior's first advent, produced, by his standing on the Mount of Olives. Nor was Olivet ever ruptured at the time of his ascension; and there now stands on its summit a "Turkish Mosque," from which, it is said, "there is a most delightful view eastward to the Dead Sea, still "unhealed," and a north and south mountain-chain exists, westward, between Jerusalem and Azal, so that no waters flow from the city into the "great sea." We also know, that at Christ's first coming, so far from "all the saints coming with him," none came with him; not one! Nor was "all the land, turned into a plain from Geba to Rimmon," neither has Jerusalem, from and since that time, been "lifted up," but on the contrary, it has been, "trodden down;" neither has it been, nor is it now, "safely inhabited."

Fast Age, Fast Time, Fast Theology.

The time was when people could get through the world by stage-coach: but when the canal was made, and the packet boat ran day and night, people thought it was getting along very fast. But since the rail is laid, and men can ride in the lightning chariot, oh, how slow is the old way!

The time was when the farmer could reap grain with hand sickles, but the cradle took its place, and the work was done fast enough. But it's day is almost in the past—is too slow. The two-horse reaper must take its place, and yet the work is not done fast enough.

Fast theology, or Man-ology it should be called, is in vogue.

In the days of the apostles, men could serve God in hope of life at the coming of Christ and the resurrection of the dead. But this was not fast enough. Man must be taught that he has life out of Christ, that he cannot die; and a short life time is the railroad, and death is the grand entrance depot to eternal glory.

The time was when people loved to hear the Gospel, and would come from far and near to hear the glad news, no matter by whom preached, even if by what is called a one-horse preacher. But how is it now? People must live very near the meeting house, the sun must shine, weather must be just warm enough, roads good, well rested from the week's work, no Sunday headache, a fine dress to show, and a two-horse or four-horse preacher, with all the modern appliances for preaching the Gospel. And even then it is to be feared that to some the Gospel has become stale and an old story in which to them there is but little, if any, sweet music. Those who have many fine horses can no appreciate a one-horse team. Times are fast.

Scripture Study.

WHO IS ADDRESSED?

Upon the pages of books, in the columns of papers, from the sacred desk, and in our every day conversation, we frequently see and hear Scripture quoted and applied to parties very different indeed in circumstances to those to whom it was first written or spoken. Indeed, the lesson given by the apostle Paul to Timothy, "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth," by them has been but poorly learned, and the relation to God sustained by the party addressed is left entirely out of view.

A few examples in which the grand law of interpretation—who is addressed—is generally disregarded, may be of benefit.

1. "Ask, and it will be given you; seek and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you. Matt. vii. 7.

This language of the Savior, not quite universally, but generally, is dealt out to the alien world as applicable to them in their search after salvation, and that all that is necessary upon their part, and all that they can do is simply to knock, seek and ask in prayer. But when we connect with this Matt. v. 1, and vii. 9-11, we readily see that it applies to disciples.

2. Again I say unto you, that if two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven. For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them. Matt. xviii. 19-20.

Almost universally is this language applied to all disciples of all ages of the world; nor would we desire to take away from them the good old text, provided we thought it properly belonged to them. But when we examine with these verses the context—verses 1, 6, 10, and 18, we find that its application was strictly to the apostles. Christ had been instructing them in reference to their future care of the numerical body (the church), and gives them to understand that what they did should be ratified in heaven; and also that whatever they should ask of the Father upon that point should be done, and that it would not be necessary to call a council at Jerusalem, Rome, Nice, or elsewhere, to settle a point of difficulty, but that wherever two or three of these apostles were gathered together in his name their action upon the point, (they being guided by the Holy Spirit,) would have his approbative (not personal) presence.

3. "And they said, Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved and thy house." Acts xvi. 31.

From this expression many gather the idea that all that is necessary to salvation is to believe on the Lord Jesus. But it must be borne in mind that the question was propounded by, and the answer given to one who was a heathen, and had never heard of Jesus, or life through him. Therefore it was necessary to start him from the position he then occupied. But when the same question — What shall we do? comes from those who do believe, being differently circumstanced, the answer is differently rendered. They are not required to do that which they have already done (believe,) but to start from that point to which they have already arrived and move forward. See Acts. ii. 37, 38. "Repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and you shall receive the the gift of the Holy Spirit." And again, when persons are addressed who have believed and repented, they are addressed still differently from the above as their condition is different. See Acts xxii. 16: "Why tarriest thou? Arise and be baptized and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord."

The Earnest Desire of the Church.

Come Lord Jesus come again;
About O Church the glad amen!
Echo back the joyful strain

Thou O Lord! hast tarried long.
Come to earth with angel throng;
Wake again that sweetest song.

Chanted at thy lowly birth,
To the fallen sons of earth;
Token of thy heavenly worth.

Oh thy church the Rising Head—
Church for which thy blood was shed—
Come and raise her from the dead.

Change the living waiting ones,
Crown and seat them on their thrones;
Still creation's ceaseless groans.

Scatter with thy light the gloom;
Make the desert wastes give room
To the wealth of Eden's bloom.

Take the poison from the air,
Make the earth both good and fair,
End these ages of despair.

From oppression grant release,
Cause the clang of arms to cease,
When in the reign of peace.

From all faces wipe the tears,
Fulfill the dream of years,
Crown with love eternal years.

Then to God through endless days,
All created things shall raise,
Hymns of pure and lofty praise.

PIERCETON, Ind.,

Correspondance.

DEAR BROTHER MAGRUDER:—I have been much interested in the question which your letter concerning bro. Jones' Catechism raised—and hope you will excuse me for speaking very candidly to you on the subject. I cannot tell whether you are, or are not in favor of Sunday Schools, but as I know many of our brethren are not. I will presume that you are of the number and address my remarks to you accordingly.

If we find—let me ask—in all the affairs of life, that little, if anything, is accomplished without system, why should we expect to make any advance in the instruction of the rising generation, without that invaluable condition; and how can any system be attained, without suitable question books? It is true, simply reading the scriptures, will sometimes suggest questions, and the more intelligent teachers will be able to supply good ones;—but the plan of having a well drawn up question book, makes the intelligence of one brother subservient to the uses of many. Again why should we discard the use of authors, who may throw light on customs and habits, alluded to in the scriptures, who may not be of our religious faith. Our Lord made use of the publicans and sinners, accepted their hospitality—their bread and meats—if not their doctrine. If brother Jones by zealous industry has compiled a work that can aid in the general instruction of the young, shall we discourage its use before examing it?

The first impulse of one who learns how much has been offered to him through Christ, is to spread this knowledge among men to work in his Masters vineyard. There is no way in which this can be so extensively done as by the Sunday School. Especially is it a means within the reach of women, who desire to work for Christ; and in this field a judicious book, would give great assistance.

In one of the numbers of the "Sunshine," an account is given of a sister in Kentucky, who through great difficulties, has for a long time been teaching some colored children, who have made great progress. Shall we not encourage the sisters as well as the brothers every where to do what they can in the cause of suffering humanity, and will not the plan proposed be a means of helping teachers and scholars alike—as many of those who may teach, will yet through the question book add fresh light on the subjects taught. Let us, my brother, look on the field "white for the harvest," and send forth all the works that we can. We must remember that all the adults who started for the promised land only two arrived there—but multitudes reached it who were born on the way.

Children must early be taught the Lord, as like Timothy, having from a child known the holy scriptures, they may early obey and follow them.

The new paper of our brother Wilcox—published at the earnest request of so many—is another means by which those who have the time to spare—may aid in the Master's work. He who put hands on little children's heads and blessed them—is not so far above their comprehension—but that their minds may be drawn towards Him by little verses, narrations especially adapted to their comprehension. The susceptible mind of childhood is the best soil on which to work—and many of our best and most useful brethren will remember that the seed of the Holy Word—buried in their minds in early childhood—needed, but working from the husbandman in the Lord's vineyard to come up and bring forth fruit:—whilst those who are buried in ignotance, are much more difficult to reach. Hoping my brother will excuse my plainness, as this point is in my opinion one of vital importance. I remain in the one hope.

AN OLD SISTER.

I am not a member of any church—nor even a professor of religion, but it does seem to me that your church has the right end of the story. I've heard a few sermons, (mostly by Orem.)

My mother, a short time ago, subscribed for your paper, for me, my neighbor, Rev. Hardwich,—Baptist—I suppose received his copy, as I did mine. I just now sent to the Presbyterian, Elder Clarke, your two last issues. Already one lady (always been a Baptist) that I let take my number sends word that she wants mine every week.

But, to proceed to business. I write to ask you if you won't send me a quantity of numbers, to give to people, or if any of your faith have back numbers, won't they send them to me for that purpose? You see, I'm of the same mind of that Bible character, if I go to torment I don't want my brethren to bear me company. I don't understand your doctrine; yet I am call d a "soul sleeper," can't do you credit,—so send the papers for me to answer with, I will try, and think I'll succeed in getting three month's subscribers, after my friends have seen a few numbers. I don't know of one of your faith in this city.

Dr Miller of Atchison, tells me that he heard part of one sermon of that faith once;—would so much like to know more concerning your ideas.—Buries his son this afternoon.—Wife an Episcopal; Dr. Nothing. Send them the paper. I'm poor, comparatively, or I'd send you money and names. My husband irreligious. I can do so little with my one number, but I wish all your professing ones were as much in earnest. I really think a small church might be established in this town. I know several belonging to other churches, that as far as I understand, agree with you. Orem told me that some time this summer he would preach a few sermons here.

Whenever preachers are coming this way, they can have a resting place with us as long as they please, and our house for services if they desire.

It is possible that the first line of my letter may prove my condemnation with you. I know I've been very bold, let the motive excuse my presumption. Persons call me fanatical, if christianity is all its representented, the wonder to me is, why are not christians more fanatical.

FANNIE WRIGHT.

MR. EDITOR:

The readers of your most excellent paper will rejoice with those who rejoice, when they learn what a glorious feast we have had. It was brought about in this way:

Some months ago we read in your paper that a Brother R. Corbaley had organized the first Church of God on the Pacific coast, near his home, at Healdsburg, Cal., two hoondred miles from this place. We invited him here, and March 28th he began a series of most interesting discourses.

He encouraged the people to take the references given, and investigate for themselves, and to ask questions, publicly and and privately, which they did. A "Thus saith the Lord" was given cheerfully and without hesitation in a single instance.

The people flocked around to hear his good fireside preaching, which was going on nearly all the time he was out of the pulpit.

Notwithstanding the distance, he came again and began preaching on the 28th of April, as on his first visit, night and day, to most attentive audiences. Through his faithful labors a congregation of twelve members was organized. Seven were from the Christian church, and five made the good confession and were baptized, among whom were my brother and sister-in-law.

We intend to meet on the first day of the week, to attend to the ordinances of the Lord's house, to search the Scriptures for the old paths, contending earnestly in the fear of God for the faith once delivered to the saints, and to exhort one another, and so much the more as we see the day of the Lord approaching, till the Master comes to awaken the sleeping saints, and change those who are alive and remain, to reign with him, possessing the power of an endless life upon the earth restored to its original purity.

My parents, P. A. and F. C. Strong, laid aside human creeds under the first preaching of the beloved A. Campbell, in Kentucky, taking the Bible alone as their rule of faith and practice, resolved to follow where it led, through evil as well as good report, and whereunto they attained to walk by the same rule, and mind the same things, knowing whom the truth makes free are free indeed. After my father had been an elder in that church for many years, his attention was arrested by accidentally seeing on some tracts the picture of an open Bible with the words, "The Bible our Creed." He began to investigate,—to prove all things and hold fast that which is good; with the assistance of the RESTITUTION he has dropped some of the traditions of men. We have suffered persecution because we left the beaten path, but we rejoice that we are counted worthy to suffer for Christ.

Brother Corbaley, whom we all highly esteem for the work's sake, is expected to preach for us as soon as harvesting is over, when we hope many others who are diligently searching the Scriptures as did the noble Bereans to see whether the things they heard were so, will show their love for the Savior.

Yesterday our dear brother bade us adieu, leaving us much encouraged, and our cup of joy filled to overflowing. We do bless the Lord that we have been spared to see the bright light of truth, in its dazzling beauty.

Let us all praise the Lord and exalt his name together.

Your, sister, in the hope of the resurrection, M. F. PENNEL.

P. S.—For a few months past we have had a very interesting Sunday School. Nearly all in the neighborhood attend regularly and promptly. There are about thirty in the Bible class. After the teachers have entertained the classes of small children an hour, they are allowed to pass quietly out of the room. The teachers then enter the Bible class, which continues another hour. At the ringing of the bell the children come in again, and after singing a short time all are dismissed. The order will be changed, now that we are to meet in a church capacity. M. F. F.

TO THE RESTITUTION:—I have returned from Florida, home to my family, improved in health. I spent over six months in Leon and Wakulla counties, three months of which I preached in Wakulla county, from once to three times a week, while I stayed there. The people were very anxious to hear the word of life. The Methodist house of worship was free for me to occupy, and the people came for miles around, and many of them appeared hungry for the truths of the Gospel. They said I was the first to preach that new doctrine there. They acknowledge it as the most reasonable doctrine they ever heard,—that God in the great plan of salvation will restore the earth back as it was before the curse, when he called everything he had created very good. They saw that God never promised to take man from earth to heaven above when he died, and use this earth as a nursery to populate heaven, but would restore earth and man to more than their pristine glory. One of the Methodist officials came to me and said, I was encouraging unbelievers, and weak kneed church members. I told him I was trying to preach the truth, as I understood it from the word of God. Their minister wished to know what I did with the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. I tried to have him state accurately what he thought of it, but he was very cautious about sticking any stakes I could hold him to. Then I explained my view of it, and it completely silenced him. The people sent for me to come to their houses to talk with me, and followed me to my boarding place to hear. Many are convinced. Some said when I was ready to organize a church, they were ready. I have no doubt in a few months I could organize a church of thirty members. They invited me to many other places to preach. I went to the Wakulla spring, seven miles from Crawfordsville, and labored with good success. This is a territory where labor can be bestowed with profit. The people are very kind and courteous, and invite northern people to come and settle there. From your brother in Christ. M. S. HOBBS.

Words of Cheer.

What a tonic is in a heart cheering. Every one, old and young needs cheering. The mother cheers the child for the first attempt to "go alone." She cheers him for his courage; for his efforts to learn his lessons. The clergyman will preach better sermons when his efforts are appreciated, and a word of encouragement is given him now and then. The orator is "moved" by expressions of approval; so is the singer. A woman is a better wife for being occasionly praised, and a man is made a better husband if his wife now and then pats him on the shoulder and says "Well done." Employers who would secure the best efforts of employes, must notice kindly their work, speak encouragingly when they may. Growling, scolding, snapping and habitual fault-finding will curdle sweet milk, and sour the best dispositions. Let us be sparing with our fault-finding, and very liberal with our cheering.—Phrenological Journal.

To Brother Stephenson.

BRO. STEPHENSON:—I see by your article in RESTITUTION, of April 26th, you take the position that there will be three classes raised; the good and bad, and a class that are neither. You also take the position that none but the good will rise at the commencement of the 1,000 years, and the bad at the end. I cannot see any chance for the third class. You also take the position that the phrase, "the dead," as it occurs in Isaiah, means the majority of the dead; and that the same phrase used by Jesus, means only a few. Will you please explain? In the 14th verse the Prophet says of a certain class of dead, that they shall not live. Now with your interpretation of the phrase, "the dead," in the 14th verse, it seems to make him contradict himself in the same breath. In the 14th, they shall not live; they shall not rise. In the 19th, they shall live; they shall rise.

May not the declaration, the earth shall cast out the dead, be a repetition of what the Prophet had previously said? It seems to me so, for he says in the next verse, come my people, enter thou into thy chambers, and shut thy doors. And again in the 21st verse, he repeats again in other phraseology, the first statement, the earth shall also disclose her blood and shall no more cover her slain.

In John v. 28, 29, you say that Jesus teaches the resurrection of every man. According to your statement, the good and bad, form a small minority. Would mentioning a small minority teach a universality? If it was the intention of Jesus to teach a universal resurrection, would he not have mentioned the greater with the lesser, instead of mentioning the lesser, and leaving out the greater? We cannot take the statement, the dead shall hear the voice, to mean all the dead, we must let subsequent acts and words explain. Please answer at your leisure. Your brother, A. B. ALLERTON.

LAKE MILLS, May 16, 1876.

The Mediterranean.

More than once, even in modern times, the Mediterranean Sea has been the theater of events that attracted the attention of the whole world. Nations have played for heavy stakes on its waters, and kingdoms have been lost and won upon its shore. And the future may witness a repetition of similar events. England has multiplied he fleet within the pillars of Hercules, and Russia is about to reinforce her Mediterranean squadron by some of its heaviest iron-clad frigates. In the meantime, France is not unmindful of her peculiar interests in that quarter, and more than one German war vessel has carried the flag of the empire into the same locality. These preparations presage some startling event.

After the fall of Sevastopol, Russia was debarred from keeping a navy in the Black Sea. But no such interdiction runs against the Mediterranean, and there iron-clad may be matched against iron-clad, and the contest be equalized. In case England and Russia lock horns in Central Asia it is important that the western entrance of the Suez canal should be kept open. England has that object in view, while Russia wishes to be in a position to make the most of any change that will cripple her main antagonist.

The sea eagles perceive the coming struggle, and they are gathering upon the waters of the historic Mediterranean.—Sel.

Dancing Christians.

Not long since a church in a leading denomination, advertised and carried out a fashionable ball, at the close of a church festival or tea party. Many of the principal member of this so-called religioious fraternity joined in the fray, and showed the world how they could dance.

The next morning one who opposed such deviations from the straight path rebuked one of the members, in the name of Christ. For this he received a very vigorous application of the brutlest's cane, upon his head.

John the Baptist once had a dispute with a king about a dance, and as a result he lost his head.

The manner in which the Savior threatened those who bought and sold in the temple should be a warning to modern religionists. There is need of some authority for "knotted chords" when people of God become associated with such disgraces as that noted above.

There is much peace crying and millennium preaching, in these days, but the signs of the times do not indicate a very speedy consummation of the world's conversion. There are some sights that go to show that the church may be converted to the ways of the world, sooner than the reverse of this is realized. But the purity of the Gospel demands that the chosen people should be separate from sinners, and aloof from the ways and spirit of an ungodly world.

Yours, JUDEX.

THE
AMERICAN CYCLOPEDIA.

A Comprehensive Library in Itself.

A Great National Enterprise in which every American may Take Pride.

Published by D. APPLETON & CO., 549, 551, Broadway, N. Y.

The Cyclopedia, now in course of publication, is entirely rewritten, and appears with about 4,000 maps and illustrations. To be completed in sixteen volumes of 800 pages each. Fourteen volumes now ready.

In the experience of book making and selling, this work is without a parallel. With the multiplication of steam presses, the publishers are still unable to meet the demand.

The sale has already reached over 300,000 volumes, and this in panic times! The demand for the work is not fairly commenced; the orders are largely multiplying and the applications are that the sales of the work for 1876 will greatly surpass those of the previous year.

Thus the most sanguine expectations of the publishers are more than realized.

The publishers again repeat to the public that no expense has been spared in the writing, editing, or publishing departments of the American Cyclopedia.

The cost will be more than $300,000 to prepare the sixteen volumes for the press.

SOLD ONLY BY SUBSCRIPTION.

The Burden Bearer.

"Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he will sustain thee."

Christian, when thy way seems darkest,
When thine eyes with tears are dim,
Straight to God, thy Father hastening,
Tell thy troubles all to him.
Not to human ear confiding
Thy sad tale of grief and care,
But before thy Father, kneeling,
Pour out all thy sorrow there.

Sympathy of friends may cheer thee
When the fierce wild storm has burst,
But God only can console thee
When it breaks upon thee first;
Go with words, or tears—or silence,
Only lay thee at his feet,
Thou shalt prove how great his pity,
And his tenderness how sweet.

Think too, thy divine Redeemer
Knew, as thou canst never know,
All the deepest depths of suffering,
All the weight of human woe.
And though now in glory seated,
He can hear the feeblest cry,
Even hear the stifled sighing,
Of thy dumb heart's agony.

All thy griefs by him are ordered,
Needful is each one for thee;
Every tear by him is counted,
One too much there cannot be;
And if while they fall so thickly,
Thou canst own his way is right,
Then each bitter tear of anguish
Precious is in Jesus' sight.

For too well thy Savior loves thee
To allow thy life to be
One long, calm, unbroken slumber,
One unruffled, stormless sea;
He would have thee fondly nestling
Closer to his loving breast,
He would have that world seem brighter
Where alone is perfect rest.

Though his wise and loving purpose,
Clearly yet thou mayest not see,
Still believe with faith unshaken,
All will work for good to thee.
Therefore, when thy way is gloomy,
And thine eyes with tears are dim,
Straight to God, thy Father, hastening,
Tell thy sorrows all to him.

The Resurrection—No. 2.

Having shown in No. 1 the fallacy and inconclusiveness of the assumption, that death as entailed upon the race by our federal parent, Adam, is not penal; and, also, that as the children of Adam fell under the penalty of law entirely independent of their own individual or personal action; and that as a consequence they must receive the grace of God, administered in their behalf, to relieve them from the doom of Adam's sin; that they as independent individuals, and separate persons from their progenitor, had no agency in bringing upon themselves. I shall in this number proceed to show that the grace of God to Adam's race is as universal as the consequences of sin, or the sentence of death, and must and will be as positively executed in their behalf, without reference to the individual acts of Adam's children, this agency or moral condition in relation to death and judgment.

1. Reason claims that if God does execute upon Adam's children the death penalty of law, pronounced upon him, while and because they were in his loins, to maintain the honor of his own name, the integrity of his words, and also the majesty of his holy law, without reference to their personal acts or character; that then to make his grace "equal" to his wrath. He should arise in his grace, without reference to their personal acts or agency, after the majesty of the law has been vindicated, and his word and honor has been maintained thereby, set them at liberty from all penalty consequent of Adam's violation of law, that they may have no occasion to say the wages of Jehovah are not "equal."

2. Reason also claims that his grace, thus manifested to and for a sinful race, would speak volumes of honor and glory unspeakable, and also be a theme upon which a kind, and the most benevolent, tender, and affectionate heart could reflect with supreme delight forever; and also with unbounded gratitude for so great a favor and grace bestowed, unsought, unasked, but freely given on behalf of "the righteousness of Christ." Rom. v. 18. But what is reason if not supported by, and in harmony with the scriptures? I answer, just nothing at all. Then I ask, do the scriptures of truth, the inspired word of the Lord, give their support to reason in this case, and on this subject? And I answer in the affirmative, to the honor of our Father in heaven they do, when they are not gagged, choked, and frittered away, until they are made to speak anything, everything, or nothing, according to the will, tradition, or caprice of their interpreters. Paul, the apostle of Christ, most fully sets forth the subject in Rom. v., where he saith, "But not as the offense, so also is the free gift, for if through the offense of one (man Adam) many be dead, much more the grace of God and the gift (of life) by (the same) grace, which is by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto many." Now would it be handling the word of God faithfully, to affirm that many, in the latter clause of the text, contains very much less than in the former? And if not, then the positive conclusion is, that the gracious gift of life from the death entailed by Adam, is just as extensive as the judgment inflicted by Jehovah's sentence when executed on Adam's children. And thus it is manifest to all, that life from the dead is a blessing to all the human family, the result of the pure, disinterested benevolence of a kind and beneficent benefactor, a gracious, merciful and loving God. And to pervert this act of his infinite goodness into a vindictive, wrathful, malevolent, and penal life, may do for perverted reason, and those who appear to be willingly misled, and are most certainly deceived. But such a thought is most detestable and horrifying to such as have a single eye, and their whole body fully illuminated by the light of life, the spirit of truth from God. But, says the affirmant, If then it is a truth, that the wicked dead are to be made alive, for any purpose, it must not be left to inference; because, if they live again from the dead, it is a penal life. Is it possible, that a man's mind, reason and judgment can be so warped by education, surrounding circumstances, or his own will, that with a good heart, and a sincere soul, filled with the love of God in every avenue of the same, can shut his eyes to the fact that life from the dead, to Adam's race, is a blessing instead of a curse? We might, with just as much truth or reason, say that the life of Adam's children, in the present state, is a "penal life," as to say that "life from the dead is a penal life." For the one is cut off by the death penalty for sin, as really, and as positively as the other, and if the one is penal, why not the other; and if resurrection curse men into life, and then the longer the life, of mortal aches, pains, and woes, the greater and more complete the penal curse; and that, by this rule, the venerable old patriarch, Methusalah, received the greatest curse of all men. Away with all such nonsense and cavilling, while unperverted reason holds her noble throne. For if God, in his grace, bestows the blessing of life from the dead upon all the children of Adam, and that entirely, without reference to their acts or agency, is it not turning the grace of God into malediction, and his beneficence into malevolence, to say, that because some of the recipients of this grace, having abused the same, by continuing in sin and constant rebellion against his boundless beneficence, and by consequence compelling the Almighty Ruler, as a moral governor of the universe, to execute the law of sin and death upon them individually for their own individual and personal transgressions; that therefore the gracious gift of "life from the dead" is designed and given by Jehovah's goodness as a penal curse, for the gracious gift is as distinct from the penal curse, as life is opposite to death, and, as it appears to me, to blend them together as one, and thus make life, as well, and as really as death, a penal curse, is to bring an unjustifiable reproach upon the administration of the just, holy, and equitable Arbitrator of human destiny. But it is said, by some, as a climax to all argument on the subject, that Christ Jesus, our Lord, cannot raise up the wicked to a corporeal, mortal and animal life, because he has no such life in himself; being, since his resurrection, immortal and spiritual, and therefore can only give such life as corresponds with his own nature. Now if such pettifogging as that suits others, it does not suit me, for my reason tells me that if Jesus has "all power in heaven and earth," as he claims to have in possession, he can do as he pleases about the matter; and therefore all depends upon his blessed will and gracious word relative to the subject, and to limit his power, is not to believe his word or sayings, and such are building, but only upon the sand. But, says the opponent, will such a reliving be participated in by the unholy? To settle this question it is necessary to determine what is the penalty or wages of sin, or what is its proper penalty. Wrong here again. For the reliving or resurrection from the dead, is no part of Jehovah's penalty against sin, but his merited grace unasked, and unsought, yet freely bestowed without money, price or work. Hence the reliving of the unholy, instead of depending in the least on the nature of the penalty for sin, depends entirely upon Jehovah's purpose, as given to man in his revelation, together with his power to perform his word and purpose. And if he designs the reliving of the unholy, that they may appear before him in the day of his appointed judgment, he has so revealed, and will so execute in his own good time. Therefore, if no such revelation is in existence, we have no light on the subject; but if such revelation does exist, and may be found in the volume of the book, then for conscience sake, and for Christ's sake, and the honor of God, and in behalf of our own present and eternal interest, let us not resist it, nor turn it into a lie; but humbly, meekly, and with a quiet and reverential spirit acquiesce in Jehovah's administration, to the glory of his adorable name. Amen and amen, and let everything that hath breath say amen. But, says the objector, shall not the judge of all the earth do right; or if it is right to judge men twice, and to kill them twice, if is hard to see it. We remark that it would be hard indeed "to see," the justice of executing the same law, on the same subject, for the same offence, twice; but if an individual be found guilty of crime, as an accomplice with another that really performed the murder, is it not easy "to see" that it is right to execute the law on the accomplice as really as upon the one that committed the murder; and if so, when he is dead, and the law fully executed, if one having the power to raise him to life again, should endeavor to do it, would not that act in itself be a worthy one for him to thus raise and give him life as the result of power and unlimited compassion in this friend and gracious benefactor? Well, now suppose this grace of life, and a right to possess it, were forfeited by the resurrected person's own act, in murder and a breach of law, is it hard "to see" that he is worthy of death the second time? No; but just the reverse, as the subject appears to me. But it may be objected that man is not in his resurrected life, and therefore the illustration is no parallel. But man being informed by revelation, and also by surrounding circumstances and facts, that his present life is lost and forfeited by Adam's sin, and also that God by his grace has abolished death over the race, and justified them to life, therefrom by the righteousness of Jesus seen, or at least may if he will see, the relation that man now sustains to divine government and a future life. He also may see, and can see if he will, that his sins personally committed against God in this state and age, can not be a forfeiture of this life, for that was forfeited by his being in Adam, and a partaker of his life that was forfeited by his act, and through his disobedience to positive law; therefore, if not blinded by theory, sin, or Satan, as appears to me, he can, or may see, that if any life is forfeited by his own sins, that he as an individual has committed, it must be the resurrection life; for he can forfeit no other. Here we think the objector will say: Yes, the resurrection life is the life forfeited by the personal sins of Adam's race, and so the wicked and ungodly never are raised from the dead to receive it. Well, if man can lose and forfeit that that he never had, and also that that God never designed him to have, "it is hard to see it." But if it be admitted that the resurrection life is the one forfeited and lost by the sinfulness of sin unrepented of and unpardoned by Adam's sons and daughters, than the magnanimity and grace, wisdom and unspeakable goodness of God, will be seen in his righteous administration, both in his abolishing death entailed on the race by Adam's sin, and also in the execution of "the second death" on all those that persist in sin and rebellion against his holy and blessed will and word. But now I must close this very extended number, and in No. 3 I propose to prove by positive thus saith the scriptures, that both bad and good, righteous and wicked, will be raised from the dead; but the order of the resurrection is another matter, and that Brother Chaplin intimated in last week's RESTITUTION that he had determined to attend to it in due time, and as I agree with his position on that subject, I at present refer all to him.

The Coming of Christ.

THE WOMAN (CHURCH) OF REV. XII.

J. C. KIMSEY.

John says (Diagiott) a greater sign was seen in the heavens. The great sign was that of the woman that had been clothed with the sun. Malichi speaks of Christ as the sun of righteousness; and Paul says those baptized into Christ are clothed with Christ. Baptized into the sun of righteousness, and thus clothed with the sun; and thus it was that the one body—the woman—was formed. The moon under her feet, and every figure taken from nature must be found in harmony with nature. The moon reflects the light of the sun in his absence. The Levitical priesthood was typical of the future good things, and it was based on the covenant of law that was to lead to Christ; and it, the law, was taken out of the way put under foot. This old covenant passed away, and the twelve apostles—the twelve stars of the woman's crown—were sent to the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name. Hence this woman's crown of twelve stars; for stars in Rev. are messengers. See the first and the twentieth chapters. This woman is travailing in pain to bring forth a son (a ruler).

The other sign of this chapter is the dragon, his seven heads and ten horns. Reader, this child is not God's Messiah; this is not a literal woman, nor a literal snake; neither is this literal childbirth; but the two signs are the fulfillment of two noted prophecies—the production of Paul's man of sin, and that just where Rome, the dragon, is divided into ten kingdoms.

Said the angel to Daniel, "the ten horns (ten kings) shall arise and another shall arise after them." The dragon has the ten horns before the woman brings forth the other; and this one is Paul's man of sin—and here are fulfilled two noted predictions.

This child is exalted to the throne of God. He was to be seated in the temple, the church of God, exhibit himself as a God. The same Paul who said, "He shall sit in the temple of God," also said to the church, "Ye are the temple of God;" and in spoke of no other temple. This son of the fallen church was to rule the nations with a rod of iron, and iron was Rome's similitude; and if the power passed to his hand, it would be the iron sceptre. But when the iron rod passes to the hand of God's Son, he will break them—the kingdoms—in pieces as a potter's vessel. He will not rule them as do the popes; but the stone will break the image, and God's kingdom, a better government, will take their place.

When her son is exalted, then the woman flees and takes refuge in the desert, where they (the horns—the king) nourish her for twelve hundred and sixty days.

Moses called the kingdom of Egypt a desert land, a vast howling wilderness. See Deut. xxxii. 9, 10. Paul said to the church, "Ye are God's field." The one is the church, under cultivation, the other is the kingdom, not cultivated.

The twelve stars of Jesus were not sent to cultivate or remodel the nations, but to take out of them a people for his name. It would be diverting to notice the efforts of men to trace the footsteps of the true church outside of the apostacy, did not such efforts cast a reflection on Paul's prophecy.

The apostacy must come first. What church but the one body could fall from the faith? If all the world, as John said, wondered after the beast, where was the true church then? But it was the church of God that fell. She produced the child after she had committed lewdness with the nations. Then she took shelter in the desert, under the protection of her son; and the nations feed her for 1260 days. Then the dragon, the political powers, persecute her, and this historical fact is fresh in the minds of all, when the Catholic church was likely to be carried away of the flood, when one of the heads of the beast—France—was wounded to death. But the earth helped the woman, and drank up the flood. The deadly wound was healed, and the two wings (shelters) of the great Roman eagle (eastward) were given to the woman; and the second time she takes shelter and is fed in the same desert for a time, times, and half of a time.

Thus the second time she takes refuge in the desert. And if you were going to look for her, where else would you go but to the desert?

Come, said one of the seven messengers that had the seven last plagues, to John, "and I will show thee the judgments of the great whore that sits on the many waters; and he conducted me in spirit into the desert, and I saw a woman sitting on a scarlet beast, full of blasphemous names, having seven heads and ten horns, and the woman was clothed in purple and scarlet, and adorned with gold and precious stone, (one stone), and pearls." This is the same woman that we first looked at, that had been clothed with the sun, God's Messiah—that brought forth the male that was fattened in the Roman desert for 1260 years, undisturbed by the dragon, and in the same desert she will go down in the flames of judgment.

Reader, did you notice that she had changed her garments in her travails? In the first scene she is clothed in the sun of righteousness; but in the last scene she is clothed in purple and scarlet. Did not Jesus, in his message, say to her, "Thou hast fallen, and I will remove thy lampstand out of its place." Rev. ii. 5. Her candlestick is herself; if it is removed she would go with it. Her place was the rock, the Messiah, the Son of the living God. If she should build on another foundation, a one-eyed man could see how it is that she is clothed in purple and scarlet, for these colors belong to Antichrist.

In my next article I will introduce the reader to His Majesty, the child of the fallen church, and the nature of the war of Michael and the dragon and their angels.

Experience is a torch lighted in the ashes of our illusions.

They who weep over errors were not formed for crime.

A wise man makes more opportunities than he finds.

The Gospel Rule of Ministry.

Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth.

But shun profane and vain babblings: for they will increase unto more ungodliness.

And their word will eat as doth a canker: of whom is Hymenæus and Philetus. 2 Tim. ii. 15-17.

This rule of all Gospel ministry requires us to "speak as the oracles of God," touching the called into Christ and those without Christ, now and hereafter.

But Hymenæus and Philetus could assume their premises on the resurrection of Christ, and on the assertion that believers are chosen in him, and that you "who were dead in sins (God) hath quickened, and hath raised up together, and made to sit together in heavenly places in Christ," Eph. i. 4; ii. 4-7, and so argue that the resurrection had then passed already.

So some take their stand on 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22: "As in Adam all die; even so in Christ shall all be made alive," and hence argue out the absolute universal resurrection and salvation of the human race. Such ignore the distinction between in Christ and those without Christ, and without hope or God in the world.

On such a line of argument, Rom. viii. 28-40, and like texts, some may assume that God's foreknowledge, predestination, calling, justifying and the glorifying of his saints, ignores the resurrection altogether. In this prophetic style the entire range of God's purpose in grace is put in the past, or historic tense.

When the Jews asked, "What shall we do that we might work the works of God?" Jesus answered, "This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent." Jno. vi. 28-29. This omits baptism and the Lord's supper from among the works of God, yet we should all know that The Faith embraces and insures the obedience of faith—making belief and obedience consistent and concurrent all through to the end.

But let this suffice to illustrate the vital importance of rightly dividing the word of truth. In so doing we avoid the fundamental error of Hymeneus and Philetus.

They took their ground aside from truth, and thus they could quote Scripture that sounded as if it suited their purpose, and say that the resurrection was passed already. So every like error may eat as doth a canker."

What, then, shall we say to these things? What advantage have we who possess the oracles of God, if we may not think and theorize at our pleasure? I answer that all our opportunities and endowments for good to ourselves and others are adapted to our welfare, but if abused to the dishonor of the the great Giver, they subject us to the sorer punishment incurred by "doing despite to the spirit of grace." Heb. x. 26-30.

God's ways and thoughts are as high as heaven above ours, and when he condescends to be our instructor, we should, as obedient children, bow to his unerring wisdom. He never puts the just with the unjust—the tares with the wheat—those in Christ with others without Christ. No, indeed. When he qualifies the resurrection, that qualification must apply here and at the judgment. No puny and perverted mind will ever outgrow or surmount the Divine. No, no!

The Jew, the Papist, the Mormon has each some Scripture and some fact for his argument. But God's word is supreme, and he will sweep their delusions with the arch deceivers into the abyss of destruction. This he did, in a measure, at the deluge, at the exode from Egypt, at the first advent. This he has pledged himself to do further at the second coming of Christ to the judgment of the great day.

We find an answer to all Pharisaic pride and presumption that theorizes and arrays one part of truth against the greater part, in the language of our Lord: "Every plant that my Heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up." Matt. xv. 12-14.

The unpreached Gospel, the Protean Universalism of our time—in search of something plausible and delusive to impose itself on the credulous, must needs go outside of the Gospel of God. It must needs break down the barriers erected in Revelation, and in the conscience of humanity, in order to make its way among men. But when it comes in like a flood, there should be some one to raise the standard of truth against it.

If the Gospel is assumed to be incomplete and in need of amendment and expansion so as to embrace what it has hitherto cast away—if the devil sowed the tares concurrent with the Son of Man and the good seed, all alike to ultimate in the kingdom, then all disguise is unavailing, and infidelity should be openly avowed. All should be candid.

But the rule of Gospel ministry rightly divides the word. It takes the precious from the vile. Jer. xv. 19-21. It will not argue against nor add to the word of the Lord. It puts Peter, Paul and Apollos in their place of entire dependence, as mere ministers by whom men may be led to believe. 1 Cor. iii. 4-15.

My plea is for the Gospel of God only, its repentance, obedience, resurrection and restitution of all things spoken.

All God's ministry is held to minister the Gospel as given of God, at every point, for no theory of man can rise above that of Hymeneus and Philetus, nor fail to eat as doth a canker.

In contrast, let us proclaim the Gospel's joyful sound.

J. B. COOK.

What is Preaching?

There are two ways of regarding a sermon—either as a human composition, or a divine message. If we look upon it entirely as the first, and require our clergymen to finish it with the utmost care and learning for our better delight, whether of ear or intellect, we shall be necessarily led to expect much formality and stateliness in its delivery, and think that all is not well if the pulpit have not a golden fringe around it, and a goodly cushion in front of it; but we shall at the same time consider the treatise thus prepared as something to which it is our duty to listen without restlessness for half an hour or three-quarters, but which, when that duty has been decorously performed, we may dismiss from our minds in happy confidence of being provided with another when next it shall be necessary. But if once we begin to regard the preacher, whatever his faults, as a man sent with a message to us, which it is a matter of life or death whether we hear or refuse; if we look upon him as set in charge over many spirits in danger or ruin, and having allowed to him but an hour or two in the seven days to speak to them; if we make some endeavors to conceive how precious those hours ought to be to him,—a small advantage on the side of God, after his flock have been exposed for six days together to the world's temptations, and he has been forced to watch the thorn and the thistle springing up in their hearts, and to see what wheat had scattered there, snatched from the wayside by this wild bird and the other; and at last, when breathless and weary with the week's labor, they give him this interval of imperfect and languid hearing, he has but thirty minutes to get at the separate hearts of a thousand men to convince them of all their weakness, shame them for all their sins, warn them of all their dangers, to try by this way and that to stir the hard fastenings of those doors where the Master himself has stood and knocked, yet none opened,—thirty minutes to raise the dead in,—let us but once understand and feel this, and we shall look with changed eyes upon that finery of gay furniture about the place from which the message of judgment must be delivered, which either breathes upon the dry bones that they may live, or, if ineffectual, remains recorded in condemnation, perhaps against the utterer and listener alike, but assuredly against one of them.—Ruskin.

The Catechism Question.

BROTHER REED:—

I have received a letter from one of the sisters on the subject of Bro. Wiley Jones' new catechism for Sunday schools and family use, which I think merits publication. Please insert it. It is but right that all judicious arguments on this kindred subjects should be read and considered fully. Whilst adhering to the truth and soundness of the position, I have taken in a former number of the RESTITUTION. I by no means, desire by this or any question to dogmatize. The brethren will, of course, consider the matter in the light of "the Law and the Testimony" and dispose of the question as the claims and the cause of truth may require, provided always our cause have the sanction of our conscience, guided and enlightened by God's holy word.

To prevent all misapprehension I may add that my opposition does not arise from any hostility to the use of Bible questions, set in order or embodied in a catechism, if you please. But to the addition of "explanatory notes," etc., taken from the works of learned but foolish men, who, ignorant of the truth themselves, are wholly incompetent to teach others such instructions are hopeful; they "beguile unstable souls—turning men's ears from the truth unto fables." How can those be trusted to comment on and explain the text who know not the contents, who are ignorant or faithless of God's phases and purposes? Are not such blind leaders of the blind. Brother Jones, has no doubt set forth much truth in his work but it may be all neutralized and perverted by the poison of the explanatory notes "taken from large and costly works," etc.

Fraternally,

A. B. MAGRUDER.

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Indiana

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates a promise to this and the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with Jesus Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him, in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel, the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a bodily belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential to final salvation.

X. The New Jerusalem.—Continued.

These events clearly determine the time for the fulfillment of these prophecies to be at, and after the second coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. The The Revelator also speaks of this same earthquake, (xvi. 18,) such a one "as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake, and so great; and he places it under the pouring out of the seventh vial plague. Men may sneer, theorists may cavil, bigots may stick to their creeds and mystical interpretations, but it will avail nothing for here, it can be said as Pilate said to the Jews. Sincerely is the title that he wrote, and put on the cross; Jesus of Nazareth the King of the Jews: "That which is written, is written," and will, doubtless, be as literally fulfilled here, on this earth, as was Jesus literally put to shame, rejected and crucified, but as yet, He has not been "king in all the earth." nor has "his name been one, but three!" The great importance of defining the time of these events clearly, is comprehended in the fact that they govern and determine incontrovertably, the time of Jerusalem's reconstruction, of "creating her a rejoicing, and her people a joy." But let us look at another line of evidence, put in as testimony. The angel Gabriel told Mary, (Luke i, 32,) that "the Lord God should give to her son, Jesus, the throne of his father David, that he should reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there should be no end."

This agrees with Isa. ix, 7, and xv, 5, which declare that, "The throne shall be established in mercy, and he, (Christ,) shall sit upon it in truth, in the tabernacle of David, judging, and seeking judgment, and hastening righteousness," and xxiv. 23 says: "The moon shall be confounded and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously." Before, enopion—in the presence of—see Luke i, 19; xiv, 10; xv, 10; Jno. xx, 30; Acts xvii, 35; Rev. xiv, 10. This "face view" of Christ and "his ancients," those who lived in former ages, or "very old men," his judges, councillors, kings and priests, necessitates their resurrection, or restoration, as promised in Isa. i, 26, after which, Jerusalem shall be called, "The city of righteousness, the faithful city." Jeremiah puts it thus, "I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. See Jno. v, 22 and 27, In his days Judah shall be saved and Israel shall dwell safely. * * He shall be called, The Lord our righteousness." See also, xxxiii, 15-18. Isa. liv, 3, says that this now desolate woman, "shall break forth on the right hand and on the left, and her seed,—Christ and the Church, as by Paul in Gal. ii, 16 and 29—shall inherit the Gentiles,—like p. s. ii, 8,—and make the desolate cities to be inhabited, * * for her mother is, to be, her husband, the Lord of hosts is his name; the same one who, in chap. xxiv, 23, is to reign on Mount Zion in Jerusalem and in the presence of his ancients. Unto her He said: "For a small moment have I forsaken thee;" (undoubtedly, Jesus said, in Jno. xvi. 32, it was only, "A little while,") but with great mercies will I gather thee; * * O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest and not comforted, behold I will lay thy stones with fair colors, and lay thy foundations with sapphires, and I will make thy windows of agates and thy gates of carbuncles, and all thy borders (walls,) of pleasant stones. See the city photograph in Rev. xxi, 19-27 and all thy children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be the peace of thy children, in righteousness shalt thou be established. And in chap. lx the cry is, "Arise! shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee. * * * darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people; but the Lord shall arise upon thee, and his glory shall be seen upon thee, and the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and Kings to the brightness of thy rising. * * * and to the holy one of Israel, because he hath glorified thee, and the sons of strangers shall build up thy walls, and their Kings shall minister unto thee, (and so Gentiles John also in Rev. xxi, 22-26,) for in my wrath I smote thee, (who now will say that God ever smote the Church of the first born, the bride, the Lamb's wife,) but in my favor have I had mercy on thee. * * the sons of them that afflicted thee, shall come bending unto thee, and all they that despise thee, shall bow themselves down, * * and they shall call thee, The City of the Lord, The Zion of the Holy one of Israel; whereas thou hast been forsaken and hated, so that no man went through the, I will make the an eternal excellency, a joy of many generations."

Violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting nor destruction, (shall be no more,) within thy borders. * * for the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God, thy glory. * * * and the days of thy mourning shall be ended. * * * I, the Lord, will hasten it in his, (the Lord's) time." But how is it now? Let the prophet of God answer.

Chap. lxi: "Be not wroth very sore, O Lord, neither remember iniquity forever; behold, see, we beseech thee, we are all thy people, (but,) thy holy cities are a wilderness, Zion is a wilderness, Jerusalem a desolation, our beautiful house, where our fathers praised thee, is burned up with fire; and all our pleasant things are laid waste," (as it is this day.) O, Jerusalem, Jerusalem; * * * if thou hadst known, * * * * but because thou knowest not the time, * * * your house is left unto you, desolate, * * * and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, (as it is this day,) until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled, * * I say unto you, ye shall not see me, until the time come when ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord. But Jer. xxxi, 40 says, when Jerusalem is again rebuilt, "it shall be holy unto the Lord, it shall not be plucked up, nor thrown down anymore, forever." Joel iii, 16, proclaims, "the Lord also shall roar out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem; and the heavens and the earth shall shake;" (Zechariah's and John's earthquake,) "sun and moon and stars darken," (same as Isa.,) "darkness covering the earth," and chap. ii, 6,) "but the Lord will be the hope of his people, and the strength of the children of Israel, so shall ye know that I am the Lord your God dwelling in Zion, my holy mountain; then shall Jerusalem be holy, and there shall no stranger pass through her any more." The same is testified of in Rev. xxii, 15-16. But now is the time of Jerusalem's harlotry and shame, but the Lord has promised, Isa. i, 25, "that he will purely purge away her dross, and take away her tin; and restore her judges as at the first, and her counsellors as at the beginning, and afterwards she shall be called, the city of righteousness, the faithful city," that "Zion shall be redeemed with judgment, and her converts with righteousness," and our Lord Jesus has said that this shall be "in the regeneration, when he shall sit on the throne of his glory and the apostles on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Mat. xix, 28—judging, (i. e.) ruling, as in 1st Sam. viii, 5-6.

But we have yet an additional testimony which must not be passed by, viz. Isa. ii, 2-4; and Micah. iii. 9-12; and iv, 1-7; we say additional, for it is the subsequent of the promise to restoration of judges and counsellors. Both prophets begin alike, by pointing out the unfaithfulness of the princes and priests of Israel, and show the consequences. Because Zion was built up with blood, and Jerusalem with iniquity; the princes judging for reward, the priests teaching for hire, and the prophets divining for money, therefore shall Zion be plowed as a field, Jerusalem become heaps, and the mountain of the house, as the high places of the forest, desolate! But in the last days, (literally, "end of the days," (see the 22?9, Dan. viii, 14.) it shall come to pass, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established, in the top of the mountains, and it shall be exalted above the hills, and people shall flow unto it, and many nations shall come, and shall say, "Come and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, and to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths; for the law shall go forth of Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem, and He shall judge, rule or reign, among many people, and rebuke strong nations afar off; and they (the far-off gentile nations,) shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more; but they, (of the nations,) shall sit every man under his vine and under his figtree, and none shall make them afraid; for the mouth of the Lord of hosts (to reign before his ancients, chap. xxiv, 23,) hath spoken it." In that day, saith the Lord, "I will assemble her that halteth, (Jacob, or Israel, Gen. xxxii, 31; Zeph. iii, 19,) and I will gather her that is driven out, (Hagar, or Ishmael, Gen. xxi, 10-14; Gal. iv, 30,) and her that I have afflicted, (Judah, or Jerusalem now in bondage, Isa. li, 17-22; chap. liv, 11; chap. lx, 14; zeph. i, 7; and I will make her that halted, (Micah. Mizpah ii, 12,) a remnant, and her that was cast far off a strong nation; (redeeming his promise to Hagar in Gen. xvi. 10, and to Abraham in chap. xvii. 20,) and the Lord shall reign over them, (all the house of Jacob,) even forever.

[The terms of this "reigning" are recorded in Exod. xix, 3, 5, 6: but as "the house of Jacob," broke that covenant, the Church with Christ as its head, become the rulers, kings, and priests under or by virtue of the "new covenant," and they (the house of Jacob,) are subordinated as subjects, the twelve Apostles deputed as vicegerents over them, and the saints judging the world, in the signification of that term as defined by Paul in 1 Cor. vi, 1-6. The "left of the nations," is set forth as an ensample in Judges i, 20, and on through chap. ii to chap. iii, 4. The ensample of "judging," is given in Exod. xviii, 13, 26—"Work after the pattern is given!" "and thou, O tower of the flock, the strong hold of the daughter of Zion," (the Church, the "one seed," the "body of Christ," the bride, "the Lambs wife," the "bone of his bone, the flesh of his flesh," unto thee shall it come, even the "first dominion;" (the kingdom,) "shall come to the daughter of Jerusalem."]

G. W. STEVENS.

Sincerity not Enough.

"Do thyself no harm" by believing false doctrines. The divinely revealed truth is the only instrument of sanctification. But the truth, to take effect, must at least be believed. It is not enough that it lies on the table, if it be not eaten. No man is so insane as to hope, because food is prepared and is on his table, that therefore he shall live, eat it or not. Neither should any one be so irrational as to expect spiritual health and growth, mental expansion, heart enlargement, the soul's salvation, without embracing that truth which God hath revealed for this special purpose. But if it be thus necessary to believe the truth, it is plain to demonstration that we must not embrace errors which are fundamentally subversive of this truth.

You have flattered yourself that the nature of your opinions was of little importance, that sincerity in them was enough. But rest assured, that sincerity in the belief of errors is widely different from believing the truth. Did you ever hear of a person taking poison, sincerely believing it to be a wholesome medicine? And did his sincerity arrest the laws of nature? Did the poison forget its virulence, and become harmless and nutritious because of his sincerity? On the contrary, was not his sincerity the very thing that ruined him? Had he investigated my suspicions, he might have examined with care before he took the poison; or he might have prevented its effects after he had taken it by timely preventives. But his apprehensions were not awakened. He felt no alarm. He sincerely believed it a wholesome medicine, and his sincerity destroyed him.

Sincerely believing ice to be fire will not convert it into fire. Sincerely believing stones to be bread will not make them nutritious. Nor will sincerely believing error to be truth, alter at all its destructive nature. Suppose a man should take a quantity of flour and an equal quantity of arsenic, and, comparing them together, should conclude that one was just as well calculated to preserve life as the other. He might say, "I can see no great difference between the two; I can feel no difference; I can smell no difference. I can perceive no reason why one should preserve life and the other destroy it. I am under no obligation to believe what I cannot understand,—nor do I believe it. I am sincerely of opinion that this arsenic is just as good to preserve life as this flour." And having reasoned thus fearlessly, he proves his sincerity by swallowing the poison. Yet, notwithstanding his sincerity, he is a dead man. It is just because he really and sincerely believed what he professed that he took the poison and destroyed his life. Sincerity does not prevent or suspend the laws of nature either in the physical or moral world; it rather gives efficiency and certainty to these laws.

Suppose (and the case is not wholly without a parallel) that a foreigner recently landed on our shores from some of the arbitrary governments of Europe, should sincerely believe that having now reached a land of liberty, he might freely appropriate to his own use what he desired, and proceed on this his sincere belief, suppose a man should rob the first man, or steal the first horse that came in his way. Would the sincerity of his belief shield him from the arrest of justice? Would the judge and the jury confirm his sincere belief, or would they confine his person? His sincerity in this case has lodged him in prison. It was his sincere belief of a dangerous and foolish error that turned him aside from the path of honesty and duty, and led him to commit a crime by which his liberty is forfeited.

And what is true in this case is true in all analogous cases; sincerity in the belief of essential error is never an excuse for such an error. So far from justifying those who embrace it, it aggravates their condemnation. Take the deist, who, professing to believe in God, rejects his word. Will the sincere rejection of Christ and the Gospel save him? How strange it would be if a sincere rejection of Christ and a sincere acceptance of him should lead to the same blissful results—should entitle to the same blissful rewards.

No, reader; we must sincerely reject error, and sincerely embrace the truth. And we must be careful not to mistake man's error for heavenly truth, man's wishes for God's revelation.—Millennial Harbinger.

The Two Witnesses.

In Revelation xi. 14, we have this language: "The second woe is past, and behold the third woe cometh quickly." The events that immediately precede this verse are evidently the last part of the second woe, and occur under the sixth trumpet, and are particularly noted in verses 7-13, and have their fulfillment after the ending of the prophesying of the two witnesses in sackcloth for 1260 days, when they are killed by the beast that ascended out of the bottomless pit, and after three and a-half days, are revived and live again, et al. Now, if these are all literal events, as also the 1260 period of literal days, and yet future, and are to be fulfilled in the literal city of Jerusalem, after the coming of Christ, as is claimed by some, then as a necessity the following events are also literal and future, viz.:

1. The sixth trumpet and the second woe!

2. All of the events and times that are to occur, under them, as recorded in chapters 9, 13, 21 and xi. 3-13; and all to be preceded by the coming of Christ, and the promised resurrection; at least so it appears to me.

Now, if Bro. Magruder, or some other consistent writer will please straighten out this matter and harmonize it, with the sincerity declared herein, I, of course, shall be happy to be enlightened and corrected, as will others also.

But before closing I will take the liberty of calling their attention to the balance of this 11th chapter, (verses 14 to 19, inclusive,) as God's appointed time of wrath, of rewards, of judgment and of resurrection, under the third woe and the seventh trumpet!! Now, if a place can be found for these words here, then there may be some force to their arguments.

One thing more. If a literal application, like that assumed, can be sustained, then all of the established laws of symbolic interpretation are violated, and the church is drifting on a shoreless sea without chart or compass and her wise counsels, in prophetic Bible terms!

thrones of earth instead of these tyrants. What other language could have been used if these tyrants should be left in the grave when the Lord's dead men shall live? One class will live, and the other class will not live. But does it follow because they will not live at that time, that, therefore, they will never live again? The office of the adverb not, is simply to negate the indefinite future tense of the verb shall be, without any reference to its duration. Adverbs furnish no measuring line to measure time, much less eternity. Verbs measure time definite and time indefinite. But in both passages before us the adverb not negates an indefinite future, the same as Job when he said to his mistaken friends, "Let me alone that I may take comfort a little before I go whence I shall not return." Job x. 20, 21. Also in chapter xiv. 9, he says, "As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away; so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more"—that is he shall not come up any more. Just leave out the adverb not, which simply negates the indefinite future, and it would read, "they are dead, "they shall live." "Before I go whence I shall return." "He that goeth down to the grave shall come up again." The foregoing examples are sufficient to prove to those who believe in any resurrection at all, that this adverb was not used to measure a definite period of time at all, much less the endless future. Christ limits the period which shall intervene between the two resurrecclusion must be, therefore, all in the graves shall live.

Brother Allerton says: "Would mentioning a minority teach universality?" I answer, no, but all in the graves in contrast with the few Christ raised from the dead most certainly and emphatically teach universality. The contrast I made was not between the phrase "the dead," and the phrase "all the dead," but between the historic few whom Christ raised and all in the grave. I did not suspend the argument upon the etymology of the phrase "the dead," to denote a small minority, but the fact that Christ only raised a few in fulfillment of his prediction. Being his own expositor, he made his meaning plain. Without such explanation the phrase "the dead" must be understood in an unlimited sense. Not would it have been proper for the great teacher to have placed all in the graves in contrast with the very few he was going to raise, if he had known that not more than one out of ten thousand of those in the graves shall ever be raised? No subsequent specification can destroy the unlimited declaration that "all in the graves shall hear the voice of the Son of God and shall come forth." The division from the whole of two specific parts will not destroy or weaken the general statement. The whole outlines all the parts, but no number of parts less than all can contain the whole. It does not follow because in the whole there were two parts, one good and the other bad, that therefore, these two parts should include all in the graves. If a single fraction is left out, it is just that much less than all.

But to sliver off two very small fractions to the exclusion of the great body of the dead, and call them all in the graves, really seems too palpably absurd to deceive anybody. Does it follow because among the all in the graves there are two classes who have positive characters and shall come forth to reward or judgment, that therefore they are all in the graves? How easily might Christ, had he wished to convey such an idea, have said all the good and all the bad shall hear my voice and come forth. But of the all in the graves there are three classes, one good, one bad, and one having had no law, no Savior; one neither good or bad. Infants are in the graves. Have they done good or bad.

Romanistarianism.

The above word is the name of a late order of religionists claiming the final holiness and happiness of all mankind. They differ from the old school of Universalists upon the following points:

1. That man does not possess an immortal soul or spirit, but that he is mortal.

2. That death is not a conscious, but an unconscious state of existence.

3. That future life is not made dependent upon death and an escapement of the spiritual man out of the fleshly, but a resurrection from the grave.

4. That man's progression is not from sphere to sphere in a spiritual world somewhere away from this globe, but that God will resurrect everybody, and give them opportunity of hearing and obeying; and if one opportunity after a resurrection will not accomplish the desired end, then another, and still another, and so on until the last human being does finally accept of offered mercy.

It has been my privilege in the last few days to read a tract upon this subject, which furnishes me with some of the texts upon which this doctrine is builded. Some of the texts relied upon are the same as have been very frequently quoted by the old school Universalists. That we may see that these texts furnish no foundation whatever for such a doctrine we propose examining a few of them.

The first text to which we invite attention is, 1 Tim. ii, 3, 4, which reads as follows: "For this (prayer for kings, rulers and men in authority) is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Savior; who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth."

The point desired to be made out of this language is, that it is God's eternal and fixed purpose to bring all men to a knowledge of the truth and to save them whether desirable upon their part or not.

That God's work in salvation, whatever that salvation may be—from alien sins, sins committed by an erring disciple, or from the Adamic death penalty by a resurrection from the dead—is not arbitrary upon God's part, but is made dependent upon the will and action of the party, is taught upon almost every page of the Bible. That arbitration is not taught in the above text we submit, that such an idea is not contained in the word Thelei from which the expression "will have," in the text is derived. This word Thelei is one of the forms of the word Thelo, which according to Hudson's Greek and English concordance occurs in the Apostolic writings 208 times. In the King James translation it is rendered, will (would) 156 times, and in the remaining 44 places by the words, is willing, willingly, voluntary, will have, like, be disposed, desire, be desirous, be desirous, be found, please, had rather, intend, so be, and love. This word thelo is defined by John Pickering: To will, wish, desire, take pleasure in, delight in, to be able, to be accustomed. It is defined by Greenfield: To will, be willing, and by Donnegan: To will, to wish, to be wont, or accustomed, and according to context, to be able.

That the idea of arbitration upon God's part in salvation, whatever that salvation may be, is not taught in this text, we submit the following renderings:

1. The Living Oracles, Campbell's work: "For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Savior, who wills all men to be saved and to come to an acknowledgment of the truth."

2. H. T. Anderson: "For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Savior, who is willing that all men should be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth."

3. Diaglott: "This is good and acceptable before God our Savior, who desires all men to be saved, and to come to an accurate knowledge of the truth."

4. Improved Version: "For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Savior, who desireth that all men should be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth."

5. Belsham: "For this is right and acceptable in the sight of God our Savior, who willeth that all men should be saved, and come to the acknowledgment of the truth."

6. Sawyer: "For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Savior, who wishes all men to be saved and to come to a knowledge of the truth."

7. Wakefield: "For this is right, and well pleasing unto God our Father, who wisheth all men to be in safety, and to come to an acknowledgement of the truth."

8. Macknight: "Who commandeth all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth."

Now, with these definitions of the word, and renderings of the text before us, it is easy to be seen that, God does not propose any arbitrary means in salvation in any sense of the term—from personal sins committed as an alien, or an erring disciple, or from the Adamic death penalty by a resurrection from the grave,—but that each and all these are conditional, and may be attained to by complying with the conditions for such, or let alone by a failure upon the part of man.

There remains apparently, but one other straw in the text at which the drowning system can possibly catch. It is, that since God has a desire that all men may come to a knowledge of the truth and be saved that he has the power to accomplish this work. That God has physically the power to do this, we do not call in question; but that in harmony with his attributes—mercy and justice—he will do this is quite another question. The question of salvation in any or all of its parts and works is not a question of physical power upon God's part, but a question of legality. But to return to God's desires. That God's desires are not all carried out, but left optionary to the will of the party addressed, the Bible plainly teaches. God's desire was, that Israel who came out of Egypt should not rebel and fall in the wilderness, yet they did it. God's desire was that Israel should not worship Baal, or burn their children to Moloch, yet this they did. Christ desired to gather under his protection the people of Jerusalem, as a hen gathers her brood, yet this they would not permit him to do.

God desires all men to come to a knowledge of the truth, yet right here in our own beloved land of America, where Bibles are plenty and are published by the million, men are as ignorant as heathens of its teachings, simply because they will not read it and search for its truths.

God desires that all men shall be saved, yet there are thousands that might read, that might hear, and might be saved, yet they persist in their course of wickedness, living in revellings, riotousness and drunkenness, day by day. David says of these ungodly characters, Psa. i. 5, that they shall not stand (unanistemai—arise) in the judgment. Again, he says; Psa. xlix. 19: "They shall never see light." Are these the characters that are to be brought up and wrought over? Far better would it be for God to make new ones, than to try to work over the marred clay.

The Resurrection.—No. 3.

In this number I shall rest my cause entirely on what the words of Scripture say on this very important subject, and not on what any one may say they mean, contrary to what they say, and if any one will show me that I do not understand their statement, he will do me a favor. But any attempt to put a construction on a positive statement, or word, will utterly fail to produce the hoped for result. I promise to abide by the positive statements, and literal words of Scripture, and if Satan himself with all his artfulness should quote a passage and leave out some it would not be the first time he ever done it, and to construct a text to suit a theory is more subtle than to leave out the words altogether, and I believe equally as mischievous.

Then I will begin with Romans v. 18. "Therefore as by the offense of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation, even so" (in the same universal manner) "by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life." Did you notice that it says justification of life; very well says the objector, "they may all be justified to life from the death entailed by Adam, and yet never obtain the life that by the law of God's righteousness they are justified to," well, in that case, will the ways of Jehovah be "equal?" in fact, will his ways not be very urgent? on such a hypothesis will not God be very much more slack in executing the law pertaining to his grace, than he is in fact, pertaining to his wrath? For he certainly does visit death upon the holy and the good; yes he now visits death upon the little prattling bud and harmless infant. Will he not be equally prompt in the manifestation of his grace in the world to come, by the execution of the law of justification through the righteous death and atonement of our Lord Jesus the Messiah?

The thing looks very natural and proper to me, and very much like the ways of God. But we will hear Paul again, 19th verse. "For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners," how could they be made sinners and their death not be "penalty"), "so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous." Do you ask how many are made righteous by Christ? I answer, just as many as were made sinners by Adam. "Oh heavens!" exclaims the objection, "that is too much sin on such hypothesis what thinkers universalism!" I answer, positively nothing hinders universal salvation of Adam's race, from the death that he entailed as a penalty for his sin. For that is the "common salvation" of the Scriptures. But the "especial salvation," which is eternal, is quite another thing. Therefore we say let all men practice righteousness complete from their cradle to their grave, and universal salvation will be the result of the atonement, or to be as definite as possible, I will say, if there had no sin been committed but the sin of Adam, then the redemption by Christ from natural death, by the resurrection, would have been not only universal, but also eternal. But now it is universal, and only eternal to those "that obey him;" and death is the Savior of all men, especially of them that believe." The believer having sinned stands exposed to the "second death." But he believes, he repents, and he is the baptized into Christ (literally his name) "for the remission of sins," and so being pardoned the "second death," to which his personal sins expressed to him, is not executed. But the redemption from the death by Adam to him is made eternal, and the gift of immortality that such at the coming of Christ, and the resurrection of the just shall obtain, may well be called an "especial salvation." The Syriac version read the passage thus: "Therefore as on account of one, condemnation was to all men. So on account of the righteousness of one, will the victory unto life to all men." As Paul, you are done well, not only are they justified to life but will get the victory of life. If this testimony of St. Paul, so much to the point, is reliable then nothing but the second death can remove them from life again; and God who "calleth those things which are not (yet in the past) as though they were," thus speaks of death and destruction in Isa. xxvi. 14, and in many other places speaks, on other topics and subjects in the same manner.

I consider that the above position, and pointed statement, by St. Paul establishes the doctrine of the resurrection of the wicked beyond dispute, or question. But that we may see the harmony of his words we call him to the stand again. 1 Cor. xv. 22. "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." An says the objection. "Then 'in Christ' means to be a Christian. Well it does not say so, and we are looking at the positive testimony as it reads, and without taking it to suit our own selfishness. But let us hear Dr. Macknight on the subject he translates the Greek word "en" "by" and the passage reads by him thus: "Therefore by Adam all die. So also by Christ all shall be made alive." Come now, ye men, that ask for one positive text for the relieving of all men. In candor I ask you is not that text positive, and very much to the point? But let us compare Scripture with Scripture, and translation with translation, and thus arrive at a conclusion by the light and harmony of the whole. Let us then listen to the passage in the Syriac "For as it was by Adam that all men die. So also by the mission they all live." Thus it is very manifest that Paul is not against himself. But what he writes to the Romans at Rome he corroborates in his writings to the Corinthians at Corinth. Prof. Whiting gives in the margin the word "by" instead of "in." In view of the foregoing testimony what candid and God-fearing man can say, the wicked are never to live again? and will not rather say that, the relieving of all men is to be proclaimed by all on the house top even, and that as no doubtful or uncertain thing? But let us listen to the Diaglot—that reads, "For as by Adam all die, so by the Anointed also will all be restored to life." Paul continues the subject, and speaks of the order, and says:

"But every man in his own order—rank,—company,—or brigade." But you mark, it is every man, to make up the different orders—ranks—or companies. I might say more of the order of the resurrection, but I leave that for the present for Brother C., as he has intimated his intention to write on that subject.

I pass now to the testimony of Jesus Christ, even the testimony God gave to him, and he not only gave it to John and the church by his angel, but who through around it the most solemn and weighty guards to protect its sacredness, that may be found in the sacred text. This guard may be found in 18th and 19th verses of the 22d chapter.

But the text that touches the resurrection, that I would bring to your notice is in the 20th chapter, 13th verse: "And the sea gave up the dead which were in it. And death and hell, hades, delivered up the dead which were in them, and they were judged every man according to his works." Now, I dare not attempt to add to or take from this testimony, but I believe it as it is and maintain what it says. It says every man in the sea, and every man in death and hell is delivered up. But how can death and hell deliver up the dead ones that are in them, and those dead ones still remain dead? Death is a state in which the dead are while dead; but when that state delivers them up for judgment they can not be any longer dead; for if they remain dead, the state of death does not deliver them up, and there is no reliability in the testimony.

I shall earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints, and let non-resurrectionists deny or tinker the testimony as they choose, for it is against them. One non-resurrectionist said to me once, "A man has a right to his faith, has he not?" "Certainly," I replied, "but there is no faith in non-resurrection; it can not be stated in faith, but in unbelief. State it, if you can, short of a denial." The man was silent.

Now, kind brethren, a denial is one thing, and to affirm is quite another. But it is no faith to affirm a negative. Faith is taught by the affirmations of God, through the prophets—not his denials. To be sure he denies, and that in truth, that idols are any Gods. But where in the faith, as a system, to be contended for, established by denials? but by the positive asseverations of Christ and his prophets and apostles,—and what they say in one book and place they do not deny in another. And thus Christ, in the testimony given him by his Father, after his ascension to heaven, agrees with his testimony on earth, as recorded by the loving and true disciple, John, v. 25-29. In verse 25 he points out two points for the resurrection, namely, the present and the future; and he certainly verified his word as regards the present point, by the resurrection of no less than three persons. Referring to the future point, in verse 28, he says all shall hear his voice and come forth. Now, according to our belief, a dead man, and in the grave at that, cannot hear and come out, or forth without he is waked up to some kind of life. He can hear and come forth without being immortal, but not without some sort of life. When Christ, touching the second and future point hinted at in verse 25, says "all in their graves shall hear and come forth," who am I that I should say to him, You do not mean exactly that; but I will tell you, —or at least others will—more perfectly what you do mean! And yet I suppose he would no more mark the sin of unbelief in me than in others for so doing.

Kind editors, here I rest for the present, to say more on this subject when the truth and my Master's cause shall demand it. So I will say, More anon.

I pass now to the testimony of Jesus …rist, even the testimony God gave to …n, and he not only gave it to John …l the church by his angel, but who …ough around it the most solemn …d weighty guards to protect its sa- …dness, that may be found in the sa- …d text. This guard may be found in …s and 10th verses of the 22d chap- …

But the text that touches the resur- …ction, that I would bring to your no- …e is in the 20th chapter, 13th verse: …nd the sea gave up the dead which …re in it. And death and hell, hades, …livered up the dead which were in …m, and they were judged every man …rding to his works." Now, I dare …attempt to add to or take from …e testimony, but I believe it as it is …d maintain what it says. It says …ry man in the sea, and every man in …th and hell is delivered up. But …w can death and hell deliver up the …d ones that are in them, and those …d ones still remain dead? Death …d state in which the dead are while …d; but when that state delivers …m up for judgment they can not be …y longer dead; for if they remain …ad, the state of death does not de- …er them up, and there is no reliabili- … in the testimony.

I shall earnestly contend for the …th once delivered to the saints, and …e non-resurrectionists deny or flinch …m testimony as they choose, for it is …ainst them. One non-resurrectionist …id to me once, "A man has a right to …e faith, has he not?" "Certainly," I …plied, "but there is no faith in non- …surrection; it can not be stated in …ith, but in unbelief. State it, if you …n, short of a denial." The man …as silent.

Now, kind brethren, a denial is one …ing, and to affirm is quite another, …t it is no faith to affirm a negative. …aith is taught by the affirmations of …d, through the prophets—not his de- …ials. To be sure he denies, and that …truth, that idols are any Gods. But …here is the faith, as a system, to be …ntended for, established by denials? …t by the positive asseverations of …hrist and his prophets and apostles, …nd what they say in one book and …nce they do not deny in another. …nd thus Christ, in the testimony giv- …n him by his Father, after his ascen- …on to heaven, agrees with his testi- …ony on earth, as recorded by the lov- …g and true disciple, John, v. 28–29. …n verse 25 he points out two points …r the resurrection, namely, the pres- …nt and the future; and he certainly …rified his word as regards the pres- …nt point, by the resurrection of no …ss than three persons. Referring to …e future point, in verse 28, he says …' shall hear his voice and come forth. …ow, according to our belief, a dead …an, and in the grave at that, cannot …ar and come out, or forth without …e is waked up to some kind of life. …e can hear and come forth without …ing immortal, but not without some …rt of life. When Christ, touching …e second an d future point hinted at …verse 25, says "all in their graves …all hear and come forth," who am I …at I should say to him, You do not …ean exactly that; but I will tell you, …or at least others will—more perfectly …hat you do mean! And yet I suppose …e would no more mark the sin of un- …belief in me than in others for so do- …ng.

Kind editors, here I rest for the pres- …nt, to say more on this subject when …e truth and my Master's cause shall …emand it. So I will say, More anon.

C. F. SWEET.

Milton's Prayer of Patience.

I am old and blind!
Men point at me as smitten by God's frown;
Afflicted and deserted of my kind,
Yet I am not cast down.

I am weak, yet strong;
I murmur not that I no longer see—
Poor, old and helpless, I the more belong,
Father Supreme, to Thee!

All merciful One!
When men are farthest, then art thou most near;
When friends pass by, my weakness to shun,
Thy clearest I hear.

Thy glorious face
Is shining towards me, and its holy light
Shines in upon my lonely dwelling place,
And there is no more night.

On my bended knee
I recognize Thy purpose, clearly shown—
My vision Thou hast dimmed that I may see Myself—Thyself alone.

I have naught to fear;
This darkness is the shadow of thy wing;
Beneath it I am almost sacred—here
Can come no evil thing.

Oh! I seem to stand
Treading, where foot of man, alas! ne'er hath been,
Wrapped in that radiance from the sinless land,
Which eye hath never seen.

Visions come and go;
Shades of resplendent beauty around me throng;
From angel lips I seem to hear the flow
Of soft and holy song.

It is nothing now.
When heaven is opening on my sightless eyes,
When all of pain, Paradise refresh my brow,
The earth is darkness dies.

In a pure calm,
My being fills with rapture; waves of thought
Roll in upon my spirit; strains sublime
Breathe over me unsought.

Give me now my lyre!
I feel the coming of a gift divine!
Within my bosom glows unearthly fire,
Lit by no skill of mine!

Jesus and the Intermediate State.

Under this head, a writer, in the RESTITUTION of May 10th, makes some confident and rather challenging strictures on the doctrine of the unconscious state of the dead; and thinks that he has found in the parable of Dives and Lazarus, an unanswerable objection to our views.

I do not claim infallibility; still I am unwilling to rest under the charge of "surface reflection" on this or any other Bible subject.

His objection seems to be this:—Christ would not have used this parable if the dead are unconscious. But he did use the parable; therefore, the dead are not unconscious.

He says: "My argument is that Jesus believed in an intermediate state of consciousness. Hence he was perfectly consistent in using such a parable." "Believed" is not correct. Christ speaking in the Greek language, never used the equivalent of "I think," or "I believe." These terms are for those whose knowledge is imperfect. Christ knew the state of the dead when he uttered the parable; and he never would have used the parable (in view of our writer) if the dead were unconscious. We admit that he knew the state of the dead and that he used the parable; but join issue on the point that the use of the parable by Christ is demonstrative evidence that the dead are conscious. Did Jesus, in this parable, teach the conscious state of the dead? How does the writer establish this, his principal proposition?

"It would be strangely incongruous, imprudent and misleading in him (Christ) to say the least of it."

It may appear so to some; certainly not to every reader. Parables are designed to illustrate truths already known. Is the parable intended to illustrate the state of the dead? or is that an inference, simply, from its introduction on this occasion? Christ, when on earth, was a teacher like unto Moses. His instructions were in "word and in deed." His word lessons were of two kinds:—first, literal; second, parabolical. In which class of word lessons should we expect his instructions relative to the dead? Evidently in his literal instructions. Let us examine some of those lessons. His sermon on the mount was a masterly production, but it is silent relative to the state of the dead. The living, in the closing moments of the Jewish age, the Christian age of seed sowing, and the ages to come in his triumphant kingdom, engrossed his attention. He raised three persons from the dead. To treat of their position while under the power of death, would be appropriate. If ministers, who believe in the conscious state of the dead, had now the power of raising people from that state, they would preface the act after the following style:—Mr. B. whom I am about to restore to life, lived a devoted Christian. He has been in heaven's ineffable glory three days, as we count time; his shouts are now ascending in the midst of that immortal company; his cup of enjoyment is more than full; but I am about to sever that immortal bliss, and put him again in his "bondage of corruption." Shout, my dear friends, over his great change from "death" unto "life"!!

Let us hear the Savior: "Young man, arise," and he that was dead sat up, and began to speak." Luke vii. 11. Short, indeed, but to the purpose.

Jairus said to Christ, "My daughter is even now dead; but come and lay thy hand upon her, and she shall live." Jesus said unto them, give place; for the maid is not dead (to lie in that present state till the resurrection) but sleepeth. And they laughed him to scorn. . . . He took her by the hand, and the maid arose." Matt. v. 17–26.

Lazarus. Jesus said, this sickness is not unto death (till the general resurrection). Jesus said, our friend Lazarus sleepeth; but I go, that I may awake him out of sleep. Then said his disciples, Lord, if he sleep, he shall do well. How be it, Jesus spake of his death; but they thought that he had spoken of taking rest in sleep. Then said Jesus unto them plainly, Lazarus is dead. Then follows a dialogue between Jesus and Martha.

Martha.—Lord, if thou hadst been here my brother had not died. But I know, even now, whatsoever thou shalt ask of God, God will give it thee.

Jesus.—Thy brother shall rise again.

Martha.—I know that he shall rise again, in the resurrection, in the last day.

Jesus.—I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall not die forever; believest thou this?

Martha.—Yea, Lord, I believe that thou art the Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the world. Mary joins them and many of the Jews. They come to the grave. It was a cave and a stone upon it. He commands Martha to remove the stone. She objects because he has been dead four days and would be offensive. The stone is removed. Jesus, uttering a prayer to his Father, cries with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth. And he that was dead, came forth, bound hand and foot with grave clothes; and his face was bound about with a napkin. Jesus saith unto them, loose him, and let him go. John xi.

In these three cases of a resurrection we have Christ's principal instruction relative to the state of the dead. In each case he spoke and acted as if the real personality was before him. His address is like ours when we awake persons out of sleep. We restore consciousness from ordinary sleep, he, from the sleep of death.

In two instances, he calls death what we ("soul sleepers") call it, "sleep." "Sleep," wake out of "sleep." "Very imprudent and misleading" for Christ to use such language when he "knew that his friend Lazarus, (according to our writer) was at that moment, a land been for four days, drinking of the fountain of heaven's immortal bliss—very unkind in calling him back into mortal suffering.

How could he say that they were asleep. We would not use such a term if we believed that the dead were conscious. We "would never dream of it."

What is sleep? It is an unconscious state where the brain rests. Perfect sleep is entire unconsciousness. A dreamy state is not sleep. It is coming out of, or going into profound sleep. Webster defines to sleep, "to become unconscious." Christ was speaking in plain language when he said, "Friend Lazarus sleepeth" Did Jesus, by the use of such language, sanction a false doctrine?

Death is called sleep, in the Bible, not less than twenty times. It is used by Job, David, Jeremiah, Daniel, Paul, and Jesus. By all these persons the word is used in literal form. In calling death sleep, I use a sound word, one that expresses the true state of the dead.

Jesus could not apply the term "sleep" to the dead if they are conscious.

He did apply the term sleep to the dead; therefore the dead are not conscious.

It may be said, that I have not solved the first difficulty by presenting a second. True. But something is gained. Both views cannot be true, and we must adhere to the more reasonable. We can solve, in our own minds, the first difficulty, and leave the dead unconscious; but we can not solve the second and make the dead conscious.

With these remarks, turn with me, a moment, to the dialogue of Dives and Lazarus in hades—sheol, of which it is a translation. Dives was in hades and Lazarus in another apartment of hades or sheol called Abraham's bosom. They converse. We need not repeat the dialogue. They are the inhabitants of sheol. In all Bible, literal descriptions, it is a place or state. As a place, there is utter darkness. As a state, the inhabitants are a promiscuous congregation of good and bad, old persons and infants that never saw light, sleep side by side. Those rivers of blood and those served God. The spirit says they know nothing. As soon as they enter the state their thoughts perish. No work there—too dark. No device, for the mental machinery is out of use—the brain is dead, no action. The inhabitants can neither think, nor work, nor act, such is the Bible literal view of the place or state where Dives and Lazarus held their conversation.

How can they converse? God can make anything anywhere act and converse. He can make stones cry out, the dumb ass speak, the trees converse. These objects or beings have attributes not naturally belonging to them in their state and place, they are said, by a bold figure of speech, to be personified. This figure is very common in the Bible. The prophets speaking by the holy spirit, apply this figure to sheol and its inhabitants.

Isaiah makes use of the figure. "Therefore hell (Heb. sheol) hath enlarged herself, and opened her mouth beyond measure; and their glory, and their multitude, and their pomp, and he that rejoiceth shall descend into it." Isa. v. 14. Of the king of Babylon he says, "The whole earth is at rest, and is quiet; they break forth into singing, yea, the fir-trees rejoice at thee, and the cedars of Lebanon saying, since thou art laid down, no feller is come up against us. Hell (Heb. sheol hades) from beneath is moved for thee (king of Babylon) just ahead to meet thee at thy coming, it (sheol) stirreth up the dead for thee, even all the chief ones of the earth; it hath raised up from their thrones all the kings of the nations—(those that have died and are in sheol). And they shall speak and say unto thee (king of Babylon) Art thou also become weak as we? Art thou become like unto us? Thy pomp is brought down to sheol, and the noise of thy viols: the worm is spread under thee, and the worms cover thee." Isa. xiv. 7–12. Ezekiel uses the same figures relative to Pharaoh, king of Egypt. "The strong among the mighty shall speak to him (Pharaoh) out of the midst of sheol with them that help him; they are gone down (to sheol) they lie uncircumcised, slain by the sword. Ashur is there (in sheol) and all her company is round about her grave; all of them slain, fallen by the sword, which caused terror in the land of the living. Elam, Mesech and Tubal are there. Ezek. xxxi. 21–23. Almighty monarch is slain in battle. The realm of sheol are uncovered. Sheol (personified) marches through his mountain home, a gloomy cavern cut in the side of a mountain, with pillows or high thrones where monarchs lie with their companions about them and their arms under their hands. He goes from cell to cell, and awakes the nobles, the sleeping dead. They awake and descend from their stone couches, walk to the door to meet the new comers to their mountain home. They taunt him" Art thou also become "weak" as we? art thou become like us? It is not my purpose to compound the parable but simply to show that the use of it by the Savior does not upset our views of the meaning of hades—sheol or make the dead literally conscious. If the spirit can animate stones, trees, and make the dead rise up from their stone couches, give them life, and action, so that they can meet a dead monarch, more recently slain, in the days of Isaiah and Ezekiel he can, for a certain purpose, give similar life and action and speech to a Dives and a Lazarus.

J. P. WEGHER.

The time to favor Zion, yea, the set time, is come; for thy servants take pleasure in her stones and favor the dust thereof." England and America are surveying the waste land of Palestine, and unearthing the ancient ruins, so long covered. The best news is, the beginning of Christian colonization and real gospel preaching there by energetic men. Personally, I could not advise any friend, Jew or Gentile, to go out to Palestine as emigrants to make a peaceful home for himself, for the land will be, perhaps very soon, the theater of a terrible war. The "bloodless revolution" reported to day may mean much or little as to the preservation of peace. We must pray for peace, especially for the sake of missionaries and their converts and Christians in general. And, . . the now threatened war be that referred to in Rev. vii, 7, as "the wind," we know that the war will not begin before the servants of our God are sealed in their foreheads. What an admonition to every one to see that he is accepted as a servant of God while there is yet time!

As the result of my sending several numbers of the RESTITUTION to a lady here (one of the little band of Advent believers that once held meetings here, but were long since scattered, and some of them gathered into other churches,) you have received a new subscriber, Mr. Newman. If you can send me sample copies, as requested, I hope to send you more names.

Your locality reminds me to ask if you can explain to me the term "Plymouth Brethren?"—a name quite obnoxious to some "orthodox" people.

The "folly of vexance of Decoration Day in adorning the graves of both saint and the reunitation of fraternal relations between northern and southern assailables are happy augurs of return to gospel truth. The coming Union fete of our country and of the Prince of Peace. Waiting for his coming, I am, brother, yours truly

The Resurrection.

MR. EDITOR:

As the resurrection is being discussed, I will ask those who think that such as have heard the Gospel of the Kingdom and willfully reject it, will be raised from the dead to be punished and then destroyed, to explain the following Scriptures:

The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead. Prov. xxi. 16.

Nevertheless man being in honor, abideth not; he is like the beasts that perish. He shall go to the generation of his fathers; they shall never see light. Ps. xlix. 12, 20.

They shall sleep a perpetual sleep, and not wake. Jer. li. 39, 57.

They shall fall, and never rise up again. Amos viii. 11–14.

There is a sin unto death. I do not say that he shall pray for it. 1 John v. 17.

As there has been no comment upon these passages, will some one point out the truth that we may reject the wrong

Yours for the truth.

JNO. O. BRONSON.

Errata.

In my article of May 2 [illegible] below heading, Between the pronoun "I" and the verb "read," insert the word omitted.

Fifteen lines below, instead of the word "fitting" read "plitting."

Eight lines still further down instead of "requisite reward," read "the right to only a part."

Eight lines further down, instead of "two persons, read "two persons."

Three lines from bottom column, instead of "foolish" read "foolish."

DIED.

PUNK—Fell asleep in Christ in Hartford, Dr. Witt County, Texas, April 22, 1880, Jesse Isaac Punk, aged 67 years 3 months and 1 day.

In December, 1878 the writer gave several sermons on the Things Concerning the Kingdom of God, and the Name of Jesus Christ in Bible. Punk's mind was aroused, which led her to see the truth as it is in us. And on one said morning in the latter part of December, I had the pleasure of burying her, with some sisters, for the resolution of the.

Her noble Christian deportment endeared her to all with whom she came in contact. In her life she exemplified the highest type of true Christian womanhood.

Truly, it may be said of her, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth. Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

In the death of our sister, Christendom were robbed of a kind and loving member; society, of one of its brightest ornaments; and the Church of God, of a [illegible] member. But she will live again.

"On Zion's hill we soon shall see
Our friends arising from the dead and blest
Then be one song forever be,
They are not lost, but only rest."

A funeral sermon was delivered by the writer, to an attentive audience, from 1 Thess iv. 13, 14.

THE AMERICAN CYCLOPEDIA.

A Comprehensive Library in Itself,

A Great National Enterprise in which every American may Take Pride.

Published by D. APPLETON & CO., 549, 551, Broadway, N. Y.

The Cyclopedia, now in course of publication, is entirely rewritten, and appears with about 5,000 new and illustrations. To be completed in [illegible] volumes of 800 pages each. Four new volumes now ready.

In the experience of book making and selling, this work is without a parallel. With the multiplications of steam presses, the publishers are well able to meet the demand.

"The sale of [illegible] reached over [illegible] volumes, and the "popular demand" for the work is not satisfied. Subscriptions are constantly coming in, and the orders are rapidly multiplying and the indications are that the sales of the work for 1880 will greatly surpass those of the previous year.

Thus the most sanguine expectations of the publishers are more than realized.

The publishers again repeat to the public that no expense has been spared in the writing, editing or publishing departments of the American Cyclopedia.

The cost will be more than $300,000 to prepare the sixteen volumes for the press.

A Little While.

"A little while, and ye again shall see me."
Surely, Thou tarriest long,
Bridegroom, Beloved! When shall this night of weeping
Be turned to song?
With heaven so far beyond us,
And earth so near to lure it and beguile,
How long? Oh! Thou didst promise but to tarry
"A little while."

"A little while:" the sorrowful and the sinning
Are not forever:
These chains that earth and sense have wound around me,
Thine hand shall sever.
How long are I awaken
Where nothing enters that can me delight?
I hear the voice of my Beloved say gently—
"A little while."

"A little while;" my flesh and heart are failing,
So long the night:
My feet are sore; mine eyes are dim with straining
Toward the light.
Oh! when will thou array me
In glorious body no more weak and vile?
Come quickly! Thou didst promise but to tarry
"A little while."

"A little while," I say with wistful glances
At yon bright skies,
"Where is the promised fly Master's coming?"
The world replies.
How long shall I be weary
With fearing man thy name did love reviles?
Oh! teach them Thou didst but mean to tarry
"A little while."

"A little while," the whole creation watches
In hope and fear;
Surely the sound of fleet swift-driven chariot
At length I hear,
O, earth! earth! arouse thee!
Wake from thy tears, put on thy glory smile!
Surely He cometh: and He will but tarry
"A little while."

Friendship of Jesus.

The friendships of this life and the principles by which they are constituted, are not only the same, but are as numerous as the classes among whom they exist. None are so base or so low in moral degradation as not to find others congenial to their tastes and conditions, with whom they can secure a temporary friendship. But what a contrast is presented between the uncertain vacillating friendship of this life, and the perpetuity and blessedness of that required of the Christian, and existing between Jesus and his chosen. We are sometimes led to ask where exists this friendship now, and professedly Christian, too, that some trivial circumstance will not cause to fret. Perhaps a little misunderstanding will sever a friendship that has existed for years. It has been truthfully affirmed that there can be no friendship without confidence, and no confidence without integrity. How often has the sad, grief-stricken heart desired to find one in whom it could confide, and when it may have ventured to unburden itself, how often has confidence been betrayed!

Not so with the friendship of Jesus. He will willingly hear our sorrows and in him we may safely confide, and find blessings sufficiently adequate to secure to our troubled hearts comfort and consolation. He can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, his heart pulsates with infinite sympathy for our race; in him is every conceivable good, and he knows how to succor us.

No jealousy, no misunderstanding can ever disturb the harmony between Jesus and his chosen. Tale-bearers, traducers, and backbiters can accomplish none of their fiendish purposes here. They may for a time crush the innocent, divide brethren, break up churches, and disturb the peace of communities; but they dare not repeat their slander over to Jesus.

The friendship of Jesus originated in benevolence. "He that was rich, for our sakes became poor that we through his poverty might be made rich." Behold the royal and legal heir promised by the oath of Jehovah to David's throne, born in a lowly manger. Follow him through his life and ministerial career, supported by charity, and declaring: "Foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man has not where to lay his head." Listen to his eloquence, as with a grace and eloquence peculiar to himself he instructs the people, uttering one great moral truth after another, which rivets the attention of the multitude; at the same time demonstrating his power to heal all manner of diseases, and even the dead at his mandate live.

Imagine if we can the intensity of his anguish in gloomy Gethsemane, "bearing our griefs and carrying our sorrows," while his lips, which had never murmured at sorrow, uttered the mournful expression: "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death." His friends forsake him in that awfully trying hour, and another prophecy in God's great chain was fulfilled. "I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered." Soon after he is before a Roman tribunal, fulfilling prophecy at every step, mocked, falsely accused, and after being pronounced faultless, given into the hands of a cruel, thirsty mob to be crucified. Finally hanging from Calvary's rugged summit comes the agonizing wail: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me!" and the Son of God dies for his enemies.

No wonder the earth quaked, the rocks rent, and the sun refused to shine! He was laid away in the cold embrace of death, the tomb sealed with the Roman seal, and infidelity seemed to triumph; but on the third day the imperial seal was broken, the shining messengers from heaven came to salute their risen Lord, and "he that liveth and was dead, and is alive forever more, and has the keys of hell and of death," came forth a conqueror. And because he lives we shall live also. O what unparalleled benevolence! Who is so hardened that he cannot appreciate a friendship founded in such benevolence? All can enjoy its benefits, without money and without price. The poor beggar has equal rights with the millionaire. God is no respecter of persons, but estimates all according to their devotion to the principles of Christianity, and not according to their wealth or position in society. Aristocracy finds no place in the religion of the meek and lowly Jesus.

But while the friendship of Christ cannot be bought with money, there are conditions with which all, both rich and poor, must comply in order to secure it. "Ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you," is the language of the Savior; and his commands must be obeyed, not such as we may deem essential, agreeable or convenient, but whatsoever he requires however much sacrifice on our part it may involve. We do not love him except we keep his commands, and can not be his friends except we love him. In consequence of Abraham's obedient faith, he was called the friend of God. The Gospel requires all who would be Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise, and therefore saved, to observe the same principles of obedience. The principle of obedience observed by Abraham was the will of God revealed to him, and the only principle adequate to the salvation of men.

The question in this age of the world does not seem to be "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" but rather, how much can I leave undone? how little can I grasp the honors, riches, pleasures of this world and escape the vengeance of God? The devotion to the cause of God evinced by the primitive church, proved that their greatest pleasure was experienced in that devotion, and that they loved the service in which they were engaged above every thing else. God's word in those days had power to make the people feel the importance of obeying it; but in later times prejudices and impressions are made to take the place of plain Bible commands.

"The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked; who can know it? I the Lord search the heart; I try the reins, even to give every man according to the fruit of his doings."

He will most surely find us out. Let us be sure that we love him sincerely, and have established between him and ourselves a permanent friendship, the benefits of which are glorious in their nature and eternal in their duration. "Eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man the things that God hath prepared for them that love him. But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit, for his Spirit searches all things, yea, the deep things of God." The picture is drawn by the spirit of inspiration. It was described by holy men of old as the prophetic fire burned in their hearts, with a sublime eloquence which the natural man, however gifted, has never been able to imitate. "As I live, the whole earth shall be filled with my glory." Is the declaration of Jehovah; and the prophets of Israel catch the strain; after which the beloved prophet of Patmos beheld the glorious panorama of its fulfillment: "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth had passed away; and there was no more sea. And I, John, saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. And I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them and be their God." Tyrant thrones of earth are crushed, the crowns of guilt are crumbled, and the sceptre of unholy dominion is broken. Every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess the glory of him on whose head are many crowns.

No longer will God's loved ones drain the cup of human woe, but in the sunlight of perfect day, wear the unfading laurels of immortality. There will be peace and plenty, health and comfort, wealth, honor, and glory, and without a notice to sign. O what does it avail us as a people [illegible] taken all of the Gentiles; some [illegible] and the rest by the unpreached gospel hereafter. No, it is all a mistake.

Were it deemed best it might be instructive to many to be informed how this new theory was introduced among us. But let it suffice for the present to say that it was put forth hesitatingly and reservedly as untruth has always been.

Bro. S. will appreciate my motive, I trust, in asking him to take his starting point hereafter from the undoubted declarations of God's word on the special point in hand, and thence speak the oracles of God only. This principle of testimony, if adopted, would resolve and dissipate the most perplexing errors that obtain in the great apostasy. The rule is safe. It seems to be required by piety toward God, and by good will to our blinded fellowmen.

Respectfully submitted for the truth's sake.

J. B. COOK.

Prophecy Intelligible.

A multiplicity of leading facts in the history of the past goes to convince us that there exists in the bosom of God an inherent willingness and a definite purpose to impart to his devoted servants a knowledge of future events—not perhaps to the extent that our short-sighted or prurient hankerings might desire, but so far as infinite wisdom sees would redound to our good, and to the soundest interests of his kingdom on earth. We advert to this truth in order to remove, if possible, the vague impression of idle curiosity, of impiety, of sacrilegious intrusion upon forbidden ground, that is so apt to connect itself with every attempt to unravel the mysteries of revelation, and to honor God by ascertaining the sense of what he has himself spoken. For nothing is more certain than that the opprobrium which clings only to the most marked and conspicuous neglect of the divine word, has, from many quarters, fallen upon the humble and reverential study of their entire contents.

Our position is, God is willing that man should come to the possession of the knowledge of futurity, not indeed in unlimited measure, but to such extent as will be for his good; and what more unquestionable evidence can we have of this than his own express declaration? Hear then his voice in respect to the Father of the faithful:—"Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do?" Can language be more unambiguous? Now the value of this averment depends upon its being an expression, not of his purpose in reference to a particular individual or particular event only, but of a general principle in the conduct of his providence. Does any latent doubt linger in the mind of the reader whether this is a principle of the divine administration?—let us then make assurance doubly sure by citing the same declaration in more general terms, as uttered by the mouth of the prophet Amos: "Surely the Lord will do nothing but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets." and they that have done evil to damnation;" "both of the just and the unjust." Jno. v. 28; Acts. xxiv. 15. The word both is here emphatic, and specifies the classes to be raised, qualifying and so giving us its limitation. The terms are only correlative to the Gospel.

But I need not add other like facts as these few should suffice for faith. The burden of proof that will suffice to maintain the opposite, lies with the objector. He must first wrench these multiform facts from Revelation, and then bring forward the "thus saith the Lord" for the universality of the resurrection from death.

It would have been easy to say, "all born of woman shall be raised from the dead." Surely, if true, a doctrine so profound should not have been suppressed some six thousand years, until H. Dunn should suggest it and lay the basis of such a subtle argument for a covert universalism.

But I forbear. It is enough that God's word does discriminate between the just and the unjust, and those who sin under the law, and those who perish without law. But if the objector cannot annul such statements of Revelation as herein embraced, he should be reminded that it is vain to attempt to outweigh them by any amount of prolonged generalities, however pretentious or subtle.

Brother Magruder has noted Brother S.'s articles in a Christian spirit and manly manner. Hence I have confined my testimony to the grand ideas and discriminations often asserted, and which lie back in the primal constitution of all human matters under the law of sin and death.

God did choose one nation—Israel—not all. He did visit the Gentiles to take out of them a people for his name. He settles the question that God has a sealed book to any one who is desirous to have its precious purport laid open for the rejoicing of his heart. He need not utter the invocation.

"Angels, roll the rock away!"

in order to look into the Savior's vacated sepulchre, and see there the pledge any assurance of his own resurrection in bliss and triumph.

The humble, the yielding, the believing mind is the great requisite, and yet the apostle's words, make it clear that there is a mystery in the believer's salvation, which can never be understood but by a certain state of heart. And so we repeat, there are certain pre-requisite which we believe God has always insisted on in those whom he would make the men of his counsel."

THE HERCHMAN.

Prophecy.

Behold I will send you Elijah the Prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord. And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse. Mal. iv. 5-6

Some of the brethren have said that all prophecy, this side of the coming of the Lord, is fulfilled; and that we may expect him at any time. This opinion is not in harmony with my views, for Paul says: "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness that that day should overtake you as a thief." 1 Thess. v. 4.

If the Savior is to be expected at any time, I must confess that I am in darkness. "Now when the Savior was born, . . . Herod the king heard these things he was troubled and all of Jerusalem with him. Matt. ii. 1, 2, 3.

"And when he had gathered together all the chief priests and Scribes of the people together, he demanded of them where Christ should be born; and they said unto him, In Bethlehem of Judea; for thus it is written by the prophet." Matt. iv. 1, 5.

They were searching concerning his coming, just as we are now.

"And this is the record of John, when the Jews sent priests and Levites from Jerusalem to ask him, Who art thou? And he confessed, and denied not; but confessed, I am not the Christ. And they asked him, What then? Art thou Elias? And he saith I am not. Art thou that Prophet? And he answered, No. Then said they unto him, Who art thou? that we may give an answer to them that sent us. What sayest thou of thyself? He said, I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord, as said the prophet Esaias. And they which were sent were of the Pharisees." Jno. i. 19-24.

"And they asked him, and said unto him, Why baptizest thou then, if thou be not that Christ, nor Elias, neither that Prophet?" Jno. i. 25.

"Those who were sent to make inquiry of John were of the Pharisees." Jno. i 23.

It seems, from the question asked, that they were expecting Elijah and a Prophet.

After the transfiguration—"His disciples asked him, saying, why, then say the Scribes that Elias must first come? And Jesus answered and said unto them, Elias truly shall first come, and restore all things." Matt. xvii. 10, 11.

Here we have the promise again of his coming. The apostles had just seen the Savior coming in his kingdom in vision. The Savior tells the apostles that "Elijah truly shall first come—that is, he should come before what they had just seen in vision.

But some may say we do not read far enough.

"But I say unto you that Elias is come already. . . . Then the disciples understood that he spake of the John the Baptist." Matt. xvii 12, 13.

"When, therefore, the Lord knew how the Pharisees had heard that Jesus had made and baptized more disciples than John, (though Jesus baptized not, but his disciples)" Jno. iv. 1, 2.

Here is a similar statement. No one would contend the Savior baptized. The Savior understood their troubles, he says, unto the multitude. "But what went ye out for to see? And if ye will receive it, this is Elias which was to come." Matt. ii. 9-14.

If they were not expecting a prophet, why should he ask that question? They were expecting Elias and a Prophet before the coming of the great king. I am expecting the same,—they before his first advent, I, his second. I expect, when he returns, his feet will stand upon the Mount of Olives; it shall cleave from the east to the west; half move toward the north, and half toward the south. Suppose one should appear in that country calling himself the King of Israel, and no change take place in the Mount of Olives, where is the man of the One Faith that would accept him? Not one. Just so was it with the Jews. They were expecting certain things.

"And he shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just, to make ready a people prepared for the Lord." Luke i. 17.

You will here notice that John's and Elijah's mission are the same. John came in the spirit and power of Elias, but not in person. John was of the circumcision. Luke i. 5-9. "He (Jesus) came unto his own (the circumcision) and his own received him not." Jno. ii. "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, circumcision or uncircumcision: Ye are all one in Christ Jesus." Gal. iii. 27, 28

This is why some of the brethren object to Enoch being one of these witnesses, because he is of the uncircumcision. This is why we claim he is Elijah's prophet. Our Savior will appear the second time to the circumcision and uncircumcision. Elijah is of one, Enoch the other.

Your brother in the one hope.

JOHN O. BRANSON.

The Manifested Glory of Christ as King.

God is ready to manifest himself in a visible form. God's crowning name is King—only a Savior to be a King. The kingdom is the end to which he is working. There is a difference between a kingdom and glory. Though in the kingdom we are to be over the kingdom wherever it may be. When we pray in the Lord's prayer, "Thy kingdom come," we do not mean to pray that it should be established on earth.

The essential, personal glory of God dwells now in a glorified Man at the right hand of God, which is Christ, and he is to be constituted King of that kingdom. He is now on his Father's throne and not on his own. Rev. iii. 21.

There cannot be a kingdom without visible subjects and a visible king. A day is coming when there will be a body for our spirit. Our bodies will be glorified that the graces we possess will have an outward manifestation. Like angel's bodies—they can come and go.

The only place of worship is where that cloud of glory is. Where is it now? At the mercy seat. It was seen first in the flaming sword in the garden of Eden, then at Abel's sacrifice, the burning bush, in Solomon's temple, etc. The day is coming when the Lord Jesus shall appear, and there will be that cloud of glory again visible. Where the cloud of glory appears and rests, there is the place of government, and thence will issue the law for all nations.

The church is separate from the kingdom (Zech. vi. 12-15; Rev. xv. 3; Greek, "king of nations"). The nations shall worship through representatives. Psa. xlv. 1-6. Christ and the church are a king and queen who shall reign in glory. He is "the King of glory." Psa. xxiv. 7 10; lxxii. 19. What is God's ideal king? A man with perfect human sympathies, with all the fullness of the Godhead dwelling in him, the God-man who will have power to strike wherever sin comes up.

The day will come when there will be a combination of grace and righteousness. Isa. vi. 1; John xii. 41 The "glories" are to be manifold. 1 Peter i. 11; Luke ix. 26.—Messiah's Herald.

A Correction.

In October or November, 1875, I sent a communication to the RESTITUTION, entitled The Seed of the Serpent, that was overlooked and not published for some months afterward. In it reference is made to the views of Brother J. B. Cook, in which he thinks I misrepresent him, in two points:

1. In saying he held that the literal descendants of Cain were the seed of the serpent, and for whom God in his purposes of salvation of man, made no provisions. In his explanations I understand him to say that he makes they were representatives of character, of wicked persons, who make themselves so by transgression. In this we are agreed.

2. I erred in saying he endorsed the view that the judgments of God, as declared in the last verses of Ezek. xvi. against Sodom and Samaria was against the land and not against the people.

It was not my intention to misrepresent him, and if I did so I am glad to be corrected. The articles before my mind at the time of writing are to be found now, and of course I am not certain of the correctness of my statements, and most gladly make the corrections. I am heartily glad to learn from his own pen, that he don't hold the views I ascribed to him, and hence ask that the correction be made, and his true views furnished, as he has written them out for your paper.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

The Rich Man and Lazarus.

"All judgment is committed to the Son—at his appearing and his kingdom."

We are agreed that Scripture is its own interpreter, and that when it does not interpret for us, we cannot for ourselves. This is no where more felt than when we attempt to expound the parables of our Lord, because they cannot be understood quite literally, being parables. Nevertheless, any instruction supplied by this illustrative mode of teaching, is not, I imagine, confined to such statements, but has [illegible] been plainly taught in [illegible] doctrine.

It was not until after the Lord had stood forth as the Prophet of Israel, and was rejected in that character, that he, "from that time forth, began to speak to them in parables;" some of which he expounded to his disciples, and others carry the truths taught on the very face of them, from the mode and manner of their introduction, their relation to the context, or the transfer of the application from the class of persons under consideration, to a single figure as its representative.

Of this latter sort are, I conceive, the parables in the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth chapters of the Gospel by Luke, each and all of which appear to be little more than recapitulation of those truths which had been plainly set before them, both in Moses and the prophets, and by the Lord Jesus himself, and here gathered up and pictorially presented to our view.

With these few preliminary remarks, I enter on the case of the rich man and Lazarus, in order to clear up the misken idea that so generally prevails of its application to a doctrine no where else taught in Scripture, that the disembodied soul of man exists in a conscious state of either happiness or misery, from the time of his death until his resurrection.

I shall not enter here on the other proofs which are to be found in Scripture of the fact that, "the dead know not any thing," but merely show that this portion of Holy Writ does not stand in opposition to the other plain statements of God's Word.

The chain of parables of which this forms the conclusion are addressed to the conscience and responsibility of the Jewish nation, whose unfaithfulness, as shepherds, stewards, sons, and brethren is here depicted, and made the occasion of manifesting the riches of the grace, as well as the terrors of the wrath of God, in the day when the Son of Man shall be revealed (Rom. ii. 9, 10), to the Jew first, as here.

That "the rich man" personifies the Jew, is evident from the mutual recognition between Abraham and himself of the relationship of "father" and "son," and the acknowledged authority of Moses and the prophets. Whether Lazarus was a Jew, a Samaritan, or a Gentile, does not distinctly appear; but his name testified that "his help was in God," and he was the Jew's "neighbor," laid at his gate, full of sores, and anxiously craving a share of the good things, of which the rich man had enough and to spare. It does not appear, however, that they were ever communicated to him (see verse 25), for which cause the rich man is brought into condemnation. "After the death (of both parties) comes the judgment"—not during their death, but when raised from it, we find them in the respective places to which their works entitled them (I speak not of faith or profession, but of fruit); the beggar at the great supper leaning on Abraham's bosom, and the rich man in outer darkness without a drop of water to cool his tongue. That these are no figures we learn from Matt. viii. 11, 12, where it is distinctly stated that "many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down (anaklithesontai),—recline as at table (compare John xiii. 23 and xxi. 20),—with Abraham, etc., while the children of the kingdom shall be cast into outer darkness, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." In Luke xiii. 28, etc., it is said they shall see this. So did the rich man "afar off;" so did the covetous Balaam bear testimony to his own part, and the money-loving Judas also will be found in his own place. Combine Luke xiv. 12, etc., with this, which is direct precept on the subject.

Another proof that this judgment is exercised in resurrection, is that while no instrumental agency is employed when the spirit (or, more properly, breath) returns to God who gave it, the angels are sent forth with the sound of a great trumpet, to gather the elect at the coming of the Son of Man, (Matt. xxiv. 31, and in Matt. xiii. 49, 50 also). We see their terrible commission at the end of the age (see Matt. xxv.), "for, behold, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and the proud and all that do wickedly shall be as stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, and shall leave them neither root nor branch," etc. These latter judgments are on men who had not died, while Luke speaks of those in the same resurrection as Daniel (xii. 2), to the shame and contempt of the age; but the principle on both judgments is the same. Hence the warning in the Epistle of James (specially v. 1, etc.); hence the warning to the Laodicean Church, etc.; but, as Jews, the testimony of Moses and the prophets is "that which shall judge them at the last day." Deut. xv. 7-12; Lev. xxiii. 22, and xxv. 35, etc., and several parallel passages in the Psalms and prophets, are the warnings against this particular sin and its consequences, which will be manifested in the latter day with tenfold evil. It is not unlikely that the "great gulf" may be formed by the earthquake at the coming of the Lord. (See Zech. xiv. Revelation, etc.) I have no doubt that Hades (aidios) here is the same as the unseen place of outer darkness, and probably is the land of Idumea.

A right understanding of 1 Cor. xv. 23, would clear up several difficulties connected with this matter, namely, that at the coming of the Lord Jesus, when all is accredited servants shall rise from the dead, there will be distinct bands or companies of them (perhaps ten, see Luke xix. 13). Of these we recognize several; (Dan. xii. 1, 2, and 13) Jews really; 2nd. Saints of this dispensation (1 Thess. iv. 20); and 3d. The martyrs under antichrist (Rev. vii. 9); The vanquishers (Rev. xiv.), who had been sealed (vii. 4); The two witnesses (Rev. xi. 11, 18). Some little time elapsing between each resurrection until (in Rev. xx. 4) the whole of the first resurrection is completed, and the rest of the dead live not again until after one thousand years are finished.

The Jews rise as a body; they have always been dealt with publicly as a body (they are not the Church of the firstborn, and even in resurrection they form no part of it), except those who are of the election of grace at this time. There is no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus. "Things to come" shall not be able to separate us; but to the Jew there is condemnation in resurrection according to Dan. xii. etc. The evil of the Jews in the latter day, as testified against by James in his epistle to the ten tribes, who are waiting for the coming of their Lord, is proof that those who will not hear Moses, will not hear Christ.

I should connect the two first verses of Luke xvii. with this parable as illustrative of this picture of retributive judgment. Better to be sunk in the sea by a millstone, than be a stumbling stone in the way.

The great supper in the kingdom is better for Lazarus than the crumbs from the table of the rich glutton. Lord, increase our faith in this! "In the world ye shall have tribulation;" and surely this is truth even now. Yet the poor believer is contented, is blessed with faithful Abraham, while the children of the kingdom are cast out; their present position is that of a dark place, while their judgment as rejectors of the Son of God will be a "much sorer punishment" than that of those who despised the law of Moses. Yet we know that this their misery shall not always continue (Isa. xl. 1); and blessed be God, we know also that the God of the Jew is the God of the Gentile, and that though heaviness endureth for a night, joy cometh in the morning.—J. B. H., in Rainbow.

Baptism in the Name of Jesus Christ.

BRO. REED:—How true is it that great men are not always wise, neither do the aged understand judgment, acting on the principle that, faithful are the words of a friend, but the kisses of an enemy are deceitful; and so earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints, I wish to call attention to the inconsistency contained in the article on "baptism in the Name," by Jno. Marsh, in the RESTITUTION, of April the 26th. The writer would do well to assume a name of a more modern date, and by so doing, clear the fault and inspired witnesses of the last will and testament of our Lord, of the imputation of contradicting himself. If the writer believes he has the truth only, why not give his name? But I think that that is the trouble. The very fact of his not giving his name is evidence of doubt, whether the position would stand the test of a right division of that form of sound words, which we are commanded to hold fast to, that, by so doing, we not only save ourselves, but them that hear us. To recollect Matthew the 28th chapter and 19th verse, with Acts 2d, and 38th, the writer says: That Jesus commanded baptism by his authority, an expression equivalent to in his name; and then the reader will see that he gives two words as the original for what Jesus and Peter said. What Jesus said, was eis, and means into; and what Peter said, was epi, and means in, or by the authority. Of course, then, it requires but a few grains of common sense to see that the meaning is different; but Jno. Marsh says that each taught baptism in the one name, or by the authority of the Lord Jesus Christ; one taught into, and the other in, or by the authority of the Lord Jesus Christ, and yet both by the use of the above mentioned phraseology, taught baptism in the one name. Truly it may be said, consistency thou art a jewel.

He also says that we may lawfully adopt Matthew, and baptize into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, and so we may with equal right baptize in the name of Jesus Christ. But he must remember that we are not pleading law in this case, but the merits of that only name given under heaven, or among men, whereby we must be saved. Now to accept this last proposition is, to at once admit that the unerring Spirit taught two distinct ways of doing one and the same thing, which I for one cannot do.

Again, he says, to baptize in the name of Jesus, and to baptize into the name of Jesus are different, he will and he wont. First he says that, which Jesus said, which was into, and what Peter said, which was in, or by the authority, meant one and the same thing, and that there is no conflict, that they both taught baptism in the one name; and then says, to baptize in the name of Jesus, and to baptize into the name of Jesus, are different, which to my mind is a flat contradiction.

Now, I would not for a single moment charge any one who pretends to write for the RESTITUTION, with insincerity; but the difficulty is in not rightly dividing the word of truth; which I purpose doing on the subject under consideration, from time to time, until, if the Lord will, all in the school of Christ, come to understand the more excellent way, or, in other words, come to see that dispensation in which it has pleased the Father, that in the Son should all fullness dwell, and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name, among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem; and that, in order that we be that chaste virgin, espoused to one husband, at the great marriage supper of the lamb, we must do whatsoever we do, in word or deed, all in the name of the Lord Jesus, as commanded by our [illegible] the Apostle Paul to the church at Colosse. Chapter iii. 17. Which is in perfect harmony with what Peter taught on the day of Pentecost, which was to repent and be baptized, in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, each understanding the dispensation in which the church, or waiting bride, stood in the great stream of time, which is forming one of the grand links in that great chain with which the great dragon, or allied powers of darkness will be bound. All that is wanting is to consider the dispensations and missions in their true Scriptural light, which I will endeavor to do in my next, and all is harmony; otherwise all is confusion.

The difficulty with Jno. Marsh is, in not seeing that the commission in Matt. xxviii. 19, was exclusively to the eleven apostles, and in Acts ii. 38, to believers in the Gospel of the kingdom, and name of Jesus Christ.

The Future Gathering.

"With offerings of devotion,
Ships from the isles shall meet;
To pour the wealth of ocean
In tribute at his feet.
Kings shall fall down, their crowns prostrate,
And gold and incense bring:
All nations shall adore him,
His glorious name they sing."

In this Centennial year of the United States, the nations of earth are bringing to our shore "their glory and honor." In manufactures, all arts and industries are represented. The vegetable productions of every clime, and the products of dark and deep wrought mines, both crude and manufactured, are brought together to the city of brotherly love. And the people of all countries and climes are there. The men of titles, and those of humble rank are there. This in honor of the centennial of a nation's life. And it behooves a people to manifest their patriotism in a proper manner. It is right that other nations should exhibit their friendship. But we cannot forget that every international exhibition has shortly been followed by fierce and devastating war.

And now the aspect of the eastern world is stormy in the extreme. The eastern question looms more significant and threatening than ever, and, we believe, at no distant day it will involve the nations of Europe in one general conflict.

Notwithstanding all the assurances of peace, the nations are watchful, distrustful, and angry; and apparently but little is required to precipitate the strife.

It would seem that the Ottoman empire has about reached its doom, and will soon be removed, and the way opened for the people of Israel to be restored to the land of their fathers. We, who believe in the restoration of Israel, and the blessing of the nations through the seed of Abraham, Jesus and his saints, look for a glorious time when Jerusalem shall be made a praise in the earth, and all nations shall flow unto it. Not the celebration of a centennial, but the constant flowing of the people of all lands, with all their wealth, their honor, their wisdom, and their love, to worship the King, the Lord of hosts. Not like the gathering under our present government, where none feel certain of attending another,—and in case of a centennial all know positively they can never witness another.

No! The King of that age is immortal, and will call his princes who are to execute judgment and justice in the earth, from the cold slumbers of the tomb, and from the laborious avocations of life, and give them eternal life, and the jurisdiction over five or ten cities, according as they have improved their talent, or been faithful in their Master's cause in this life.

O for that time when wars shall cease! when evil shall be no more! when the earth shall yield her increase,—when the redeemed shall return and come to Zion with singing and everlasting joy, and all the nations of the earth shall repair to Jerusalem, the city of the great King, the Lord of Hosts, and to keep the feast of the tabernacles!

How vain these earthly gatherings! When we think of the coming age, of the worshippers, of the Kings and Priests, and of the presence of the Desire of all nations, the King in his beauty, we long to be there.

"Some song mighty all nations: and all cry,
'Worthy the Lamb, for he was slain for us!'
The dwellers on the mountains cry to the rocks
Shout to each other; and the mountain tops
From distant mountains catch the flying joy;
Till nation after nation, taught the strain,
Earth rolls the rapturous Hosanna round
Behold the measure of the promise filled,
See Salem built, the labor of a God!
Bright as a sun the sacred city shines,
All kingdoms and all princes of the earth
Flock to that light; the glory of all lands
Flows into her; unbounded is her joy,
And endless her increase."

LEWIS BESH.

The New Jerusalem.—No. 3.

G. W. STETSON.

Let us now look at the intervening time, called the "times of the Gentiles," of which Joel, in his prophecy first speaks in iii. 9: "Proclaim ye this among the Gentiles: Prepare war! wake up the mighty men! let all the men of war draw near; let them come up! Beat your plowshares into swords and your pruning hooks into spears: let the weak say, I am strong!" * * This is the reverse of Isaiah's and Micah's obverse picture. The announcation song of the first advent was, "peace on earth and good will to men," and when Jesus came peace was universal; the temple of Janus was shut, and this calm of the "four winds," (Dan. vii. 2) that was to "strive upon the great sea," in response to Joel's proclamation, continued during the entire sojourn of our Lord on earth, and then the elements began to be disturbed, the clouds began to gather, and the winds to sigh and moan, to breathe and blow, until at last, about A. D. 65 to 70, "the peace was taken from the earth." (Rev. vi. 4) and the tempest burst upon the world in those sanguinary wars of the Romans (Gentiles) against the Jews, that "plowed Zion as a field, made Jerusalem heaps, and the mountains of the Lord's house as the high places of the forest," desolate; since when, Jerusalem has been "trodden down of the Gentiles," will continue so to be until "their times are ended," for Gentile wars still continue, and have become "the order of the day" among the Gentile nationalities. Europe is, to-day, one vast armory, and the mighty men of valor are in sleepless vigilance, the tempests only lulls betimes, and then rages more fearfully than ever. Already, Jerusalem is involved as "a burdensome stone," (Zech. xii. 3) in the great "Eastern question," that shall end only in sanguinary strife at the ending of Gentile times, and Gentile wars, and Gentile ruling of the world, and of Jerusalem, for at that time, when all nations are gathered against (each other fighting for) Jerusalem, will the Lord come forth and fight (for the city) as he fought in the day of battle." (see 2 Kings vi. 13 to 23; Exodus xiv. 13-31; Rev. xix. 11 to 21; Isa. lxiv. 10, 15, 16, 18, 19, and 24; Ezek. xxxviii. and xxxix. of which note xxxviii. 21 to 23 and xxxix. 8, 21, 29) and Jerusalem will be delivered out of the hand of the Gentiles, and then and not till then, will he cause wars to cease to the ends of the earth, and he will break the bow and the sword and the battle out of the earth." Hosea ii. 18: Psa. lxvi 8; lxxvi. 1-3.

Then, from that time, just so surely as Zion has been "plowed as a field," so certainly as Jerusalem has been "made heaps," so undoubtedly as that Mount Moriah was "desolated by fire," so truly as the Gentile nations have for eighteen hundred years "prepared," and are still "preparing war," so unmistakeably as they have "beaten their plowshares into swords," (and it is an undeniable fact, that in our own country, the old fashioned steel pointed Swede's iron plow points, or shares, have been bought up for that very purpose, within the knowledge of the writer,) and their pruning hooks, (or scythes,) into spears," (or bayonets, which is also a fact, accomplished,) and engaged themselves in the unhallowed strife of mutual destruction by slaughter,—just so surely, with the same certainty, by the same guarantee, on the same authority, divinely inspired, and by the same literal rule of exegis, applied to the obverse as to the reverse of this prophetic picture,—we may expect, and ought to look for the establishment of the mountain of the Lord's house in the top of the mountains, and its exaltation over the hills, and for the coming of many people and nationalities unto it, to be taught his ways, and to walk in his paths, as a necessary sequence of the going forth of the law from Zion and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem,—for the mouth of the Lord of hosts hath spoken it.

Some claim that this "going forth of the law from Zion, and word of the Lord from Jerusalem," has had its fulfillment from and since the day of Pentecost, when the apostles were "empowered from on high" to "proclaim the glad tidings," or "preach the gospel to every creature," but the difficulty lies here,—"the plowing of Zion, massing of Jerusalem and desolating the temple with fire," did not transpire until thirty-five or forty years after the commission was given to preach the gospel, whereas the desolating, and treading down of Jerusalem, according to the express terms and positive statements of the prophecy, must precede the "going forth of the law from Zion," and "word of the Lord from Jerusalem." The invalidness of such claim is also made apparent in the words of Jesus, in Luke xvi. 16, "the law and the prophets were until John; since that time the kingdom of God is preached," (by the gospel) and "the law" is not comprehended in "the gospel," for "the law came by Moses, but peace and truth by Jesus Christ," in the gospel. But when the kingdom shall have come, (of which the gospel makes proclamation,) then according to the minature representation of the kingdom, as seen by Peter, James and John, in the Mount of Transfiguration, the three tabernacles of law, prophecy, word teaching, grace, and truth, will all be blended in the one "tabernacle of David," (Isa. xvi. 5) by our Lord Jesus Christ, as foretold also by Isa. xxxiii. 17-24: "Thine eyes shall see the King in his beauty;" * * * and then the Lord will be our Judge, * * * our lawgiver, and * * * our King," * * * This also, of necessity, involves the restoration and reconstruction of Jerusalem, as God has promised). Folly is but a poor name, a meager expression for the poor, lame, futile attempt at putting this expression into the mouths of the people as their saying, seeking in vain, therefore, to evade the force of Isa. ii. 2-5, and Micah iv. 1-4, when there are so many prophets testifying to the same things in substance, if not in the same words See Zech. ii. 10-12; viii. 20-22; xiii. 18-21; ix. 3-22. What the people did say is recorded in Micah iii. 11, and here is a transcript of their words: "Is not the Lord among us? No evil can come upon us!" In Amos ix. 10 their language is similar, viz.: "The evil shall not overtake or prevent us!" Yet at this very time, amid all these pious ejaculations and miserable subterfuges "the heads of the house of Jacob, and princes of the house of Israel, were abhorring judgment and perverting equity, the heads judging for reward, the priests teaching for hire, and the prophets divining for money.

NOTE.—It is at this point in time and events, that "his feet are brought into the position of being made his footstool," ready for the last purpose when he comes to take his seat on his own throne, and he will then subjugate them and "rule in the midst of his enemies."

On the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, in 1685, at least 500,000 Huguenots took refuge in foreign countries. From that time, for many years, their cause was completely broken in France. In 1705 there was not a single organization of Huguenots left in all France. So early as 1555 Coligni attempted, but without success, to establish a Huguenot colony in Brazil. In 1562 he sent out two ships, under the command of Jean Ribault, on a voyage of exploration to Florida, but the attempt to establish a colony was unsuccessful. Many departed for North America even before the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Some settled in and around New Amsterdam, now New York, where their family names are frequent. Others found homes in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Virginia. But South Carolina was their favorite resting-place, and a large number of the foremost families in that state are of Huguenot origin. This class of immigrants has contributed, in proportion to its numbers, a vast share to the culture and prosperity of the United States. Wherever they settled they were noted for severe morality, great charity, and politeness and elegance of manners. Of seven presidents who directed the deliberations of the Congress of Philadelphia during the revolution, three, Henry Laurens, John Jay, and Elias Boudinot, were of Huguenot parentage [illegible]ted.

THE RESTITUTION

PLYMOUTH, IND., ... JUNE 14, 1876.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

☞ "The Farmers' Monthly for June is out. There is much in it to commend to every class of readers. Our friends will find it well adapted to the fireside and just what is needed. Many of those who have read it, pronounce it the best publication of the kind printed. We hope our friends will take hold in earnest and help it forward. Our subscribers can have it for 75 cents per annum. It has sixty columns of reading matter per month.

☞ PERSONAL.—Elder W. Wright, author of "The Golden Reed," visited Plymouth last week to preach to the people and correct heresy. We gave the gentleman the use of our house, and tried to help him to an audience, but the people were not interested in his views. The first night nineteen attended his meeting; the next night a few more came in, but our friend did not succeed very well in proving that everybody, old and young, good and bad, were in the kingdom of God. Mr. Wright is evidently wrong.

The Inner Man.

A correspondent writes to know what is meant by the above expression as used by the Apostle Paul. We have always held the view that this expression meant no more than the "old man," as used by the same apostle. We frequently meet with such phrases as "the old man," "the outward man," the "new man," the "inward man," "Christ formed within," and many other forms of expression of similar import. The phrase "inner man," is nowhere applied to wicked men, but always to the righteous. This fact alone shows that it is used with strict reference to those who are in Christ. Some people think the phrase is applied to all men, whether wicked or righteous, but this is unscriptural. Let the Bible student take all the phrases used in the New Testament about the new man in Christ, and he will get the exact idea intended.

Drying up of the Mystical Euphrates.

On the 30th of May, the Turkish Sultan, Abdul Aziz, was deposed after occupying the Ottoman throne about 15 years. The startling announcement of this event was followed, in five days, by another scarcely less startling, that he had committed suicide, by opening his veins with a pair of scissors, at 10 o'clock Sunday morning, June 4.

His reign had been free from serious disturbances up to the Herzegovinian insurrection, but being unable to quell this, and other subsequent up-risings, prepared the way for his final overthrow.

On the 23d of May, a Bulgarian girl arrived at the railway station at Skonica in company with her mother, another woman, and some ottoman attendants, with the design of performing some ceremonies necessary for her admission into the Mohammedan community as a convert from Christianity. It was reported that she had been forcibly constrained to abjure the Christian faith for the religion of the Koran, which the cries of her mother for assistance, and her own protestations seemed to confirm. The result was an encounter between the Mussulmans and Christians which ended in the latter taking the girl from the police, and placing her in the carriage of the American Consul, that happened to be there waiting for its owner, and driving to the Consulate.

On the next day, the Ottoman population armed themselves, and, after demanding the restoration of the girl from the authorities, betook themselves to a neighboring Mosque, from which they dispatched emissaries to every part of the town, calling the faithful to arm. The Christians, panic stricken, betook themselves to their dwellings, which they barricaded, anticipating a general massacre.

At this crisis the French Consul, M. Moulin, and the German Consul, Mr. Henry Abbot, determined to call upon the Pasha, but, on the way, were pressed into the Mosque, where they were immediately surrounded by a band of ruffians with drawn swords, howling for the restoration of the girl. Within the Mosque there were, at this time, several officers who made no effort to restrain the rioters. The mob within the Mosque became more and more ferocious till, at length, a furious onslaught was made on the defenceless Consuls with lance, sword, and dagger, which resulted in covering the body of Moulin with wounds from head to foot. His coat was cut to ribbands, his head cleft to the chin, and a broad-headed spear thrust to his heart. Abbot was equally roughly mangled. His face could scarcely be recognized; one of his eyes was torn from its socket; his heart was pierced, and his legs nearly severed from his body. The dead bodies were dragged about, and spit upon by the passing fanatic Mussulmen.

In consequence of these murders, foreign influence was brought to bear upon the Sublime Porte for substantial guarantees to protect the Christian part of the population, who, being compelled by this outside pressure, took the matter into consideration. This inflamed the Mohammedans, and the final result has been, the Sultan was forced to abdicate, which was followed by his committing suicide.

Turkish rule is coming to an end. Even men possessed of common political wisdom can discern that the days of oriental barbarism in Europe are about numbered. The Christian portion of the people, who are said to number about two-thirds of the entire population, will no longer submit to be robbed of everything they possess to satisfy the appetites and lusts of their brutal rulers. The Herzegovinian rebellion has brought up the irrepressible "Eastern question" for solution, and its decision can not long be deferred. Its lease of the land of promise is within a few years of being out, and the sanctuary will then be cleansed of Mohammedan and all other abominations. In the now current revolutions, the trumpet-voice of prophecy resounds: "Behold I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame." Book Notice.

The Golden Reed is the title of a new book just published, written by Eld. W. Wright, pastor of a Baptist church in Indiana. The book is well printed, has just 400 pages, and is designed to correct the faith of the church upon the subject of the Kingdom of God. In his preface the author says: "His sole object was to vindicate the truths of the Bible against the heresies of soul-sleepers and modern spiritualists." On page 224 he says: "Soul-sleeper or adventism is another unclean spirit and came out of Popery." On the next page he says: "And then the teachings of the Adventists and Free-lovers go hand in hand with this doctrine of the lower regions that is bought by the spiritualists that say whatever is is right."

The writer claims to be a D. D., and a minister in the Baptist church in good standing, and yet he displays great ignorance of the sentiments of those he wishes to confute. We do not wish to appear as the defender of the Adventists or any other sect, but the author of the "The Golden Reed" should treat his opponents fairly and not try to class them with those who deny the Bible and deny the claims of morality. Mr. Wright found on examination that even the orthodox view of the Kingdom is wrong, and he has sent his book into the world to correct the views of his own church. Would it not be well for this prelate of apostolic truth to set up a church of his own? His views are not especially new to our people. He has said some good things and a great many false ones. The book lacks candor and leaves the impression upon the mind of the reader that the author is full of bitterness toward those he assails. No one need expect to succeed as an author who does not fairly present the views of opponents. Candor is one of the noblest and highest gifts to man, and happy is he who will treat all with candor and fairness. The book may be had of the author. Address him at Bluffton, Ind. Price not given.

Humanitarianism.

"For there is one God and one mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in good time." 1 Tim. ii. 5-6.

Next in order of importance quoted by the author of the tract referred to in our last, in support of his universalism, is the above Scripture. The point desired to be made by this text is, that since Christ has given himself to be a ransom for all, therefore all must hear the testimony borne forth relative to this ransom, and be saved, if not in this life, then in some one of the ages to come.

That such an idea is not taught in the above text, we submit the following reasons:

1. That notwithstanding the ransom which has been provided—whatever that may be from, and to—is sufficient in power and value to save all, yet it does not follow, therefore, that by it all will be saved. For it is a principle ever kept prominent in all of God's promises made to man, that they are suspended upon conditions. In evidence of this point we cite the following Scriptures:

1. "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life." John iii. 14. Here, antithetically to life to him that believes, is death to him that does not believe; and as the life is in its duration eternal to the believer, so is the death to him who does not believe.

2. "He that believeth on him (Christ) is not condemned; but he that believeth not is condemned already." John iii. 18. Here, evidently, Christ has reference to the Adamic death penalty under which the whole human family rests, promising as a basis, relief to those who believe on him as their Redeemer, and non-relief to those who do not believe, leaving them still under the condemnation.

3. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him." John iii. 36. In this Scripture Jesus states the result of non-belief. It is the negative of life. The antithesis is not life, and life, or everlasting life and Adamic life beyond the death state, but life from the death state to the believer, and the absence of life to the non-believer.

"Ye will not come to me, that ye might have life." John v. 40. That those who come to Christ as a basis get life, and that those who do not come do not get it, is so plainly taught in this text that no comment is necessary.

That the idea for which our author contends, is not contained in the text, we submit:

2. That the phrase "to be," preceding "testified in due time," is entirely wanting in the Griesbach and Greenfield texts; nor is the idea of future testimony borne forth to any beyond the death state given by any of the following versions:

1. Rheims: "Who gave himself a redemption for all, a testimony in due time."

2. Belsham says: "I adopt Benson's interpretation," which is: (speaking of Christ), "An eminent and steadfast witness of the truth in the age in which was it appointed that he should live and die." Again, Belsham remarks: "The death of Jesus, the mediator may also be regarded as a signal testimony to the truth of his doctrine and to the divinity of his mission. And this important event took place at the season appointed in the counsels of infinite wisdom, a time which was upon the whole, the fittest and the best.

3. "Who gave himself a redemption for all, thus rendering testimony at the appointed time."

4. Macknight—followed by Campbell: "Who gave himself a ransom for all; of which the testimony is for its proper season."

5. A. Clark says: "In the D, F, G, manuscripts the whole clause is read thus: "The testimony of which was given in its own time."

6. Diaglott: "Who gave himself a ransom in behalf of all—the testimony in its own seasons." The punctuation here marks the offering of the ransom and the bearing forth of the testimony at the same time.

7. H. T. Anderson: "Who gave himself a ransom for all, of which the testimony has been given in its proper times."

Is it not easily seen from the quotations and references here given that the testimony concerning the offered ransom has long since been given, and that no reference whatever by the apostles is made to any proclamation which may be set forth to any resurrected parties in the ages to come.

Men are too much inclined to shift the responsibilities and duties of to-day off till to-morrow. But the Bible presents the lesson which all should heed, that for all who live this side of the Lord's return, this life is the time to make the calling and election sure. By this election thus made an abundant entrance into the kingdom can be secured; but no entrance is promised to the non-elect. Then work while the day (this life) lasts, for the night (death) will come when no work can be done. G. M. MYERS.

Is it Fair?

Infidels make special pretensions to fair play. Now, would it be a fair way of investigating the character of any man, to go among his bitterest enemies and hunt up every sneer, and scoff and story, whether true or false, and then, without further ado, pronounce judgment upon him and refuse to have any intercourse with him? Would it not be reasonable also to consult his friends and see what they had to say, and especially to become personally acquainted with him, and also to investigate the character and accusations of his enemies, before giving credence to them, and see whether they were not prompted by envy, malice, or revenge in the charges brought against him?

But how do skeptics investigate the Bible? Not one in a hundred of them has ever read it through since they came to years of understanding. Not one in ten thousand of them could read it fluently and understandingly in the tongues in which it was written. They do not make it a study; they do not understand it; they cannot fairly represent it. It is a rare thing that an infidel quotes a passage of Scripture correctly. Even the passages they produce as objectionable, are usually misunderstood, misquoted or misrepresented. Probably not one infidel in five hundred could quote correctly from memory, twenty passages of Scripture, giving chapter and verse where they occur; and probably not one in a thousand could repeat, word for word, five chapters from the Bible. And the little they do know of the words of the Book, is what has been taught them in childhood, when their judgments were immature, instead of being learned by them when grown up, in the way of careful, diligent, painstaking investigation.

Now, we submit that if men wish to investigate the Bible they should read it, study it, learn it, practice it, and inquire concerning it among its friends as well as its foes; and then let them investigate the character and condition of persons who live according to the Bible, and compare them with men who rate it, curse it, or are ignorant of it, and they will be better fit to judge of its merits.—The Christian.

The Two Witnesses.—Rev. xi.

In my last brief article I endeavored to show what these two witnesses are not but made no attempt to show what they are; and now I take up my pen to make some suggestions for the consideration of the scattered flock, with the earnest hope, that some one competent to the task may be inspired, ere long, to make the subject plain to the minds of all that have "an eye to see or an ear to hear."

I begin by saying I am still inclined to believe the oft repeated exposition, of there being the Old and New Testament Scriptures, including the two dispensations spanned by them. That the period of the prophecying in sackcloth was 1260 literal years, which ended in about 1792, in the courts of the French revolutions then in progress: that in the events of that revolution, the slaying of those witnesses occurred with their resurrection; the falling of the tenth part of the great city, and words noted in verses 7 and 13 had their fulfillment; hence I believe this prophecy symbolic. By the appreciation of the laws of symbolization here, I think we are justified in tracing back this imagery to the Old Testament Scriptures, as also to other portions of the New Testament, under various figures, all harmoniously blending, and throwing their united light to a grand focal point of harmony and beauty to the days in which we now live.

I believe the two cherubims, are the two ends of the mercy seat with their wings extended, their faces toward each other; both looking to that mercy seat represent the two dispensations of the law and the Gospel. On comparing Zech. iv. with Rev. i. and other portions of the word, I am led to believe "the two olive trees," "the two golden candlesticks," "the two anointed ones," and "the two golden pipes," each represent the Old and New Testament Scriptures.

Question.—What is this golden oil that passes through those golden pipes from those two olive branches (or anointed ones)?

Answer.—The very thing contained in those precious vessels!

Upon this point let us hear the testimony of these two witnesses, who alone are competent to decide. The first says (Psa. cxix. cv.) "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path." By this we learn the "word is the lamp," but not the oil. Second witness: Christ says, that the Father is more willing to give His spirit to them that ask, than earthly parents are to give good gifts to their children. "Ask and ye shall receive." Paul says, 1 Cor. i. 19. "What! know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God." Rom. viii. 9. "But ye are not in the flesh and in the spirit, if so be the spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his." "But if the spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his spirit that dwelleth in you." Christ saith "my words are spirit and life."

In Rom. ix. 22-23, the wicked are represented as "vessels of wrath," but the righteous are represented as "vessels of mercy." In the parable of Matt. xxv. both classes of virgins took their lamps "the word," and went forth to meet the bridegroom, one class took in addition to their lamps, "oil in their vessels," but the other class took none: consequently their lamps went out, and when the bridegroom comes they will be found wanting and fail of entering into the marriage, and why? because they had not the spirit of Christ in them, and consequently "are none of his." From this testimony and much more that might be presented of like import, it is evident to my mind that the spirit is the oil referred to by Christ in the parable. This oil, according to the testimony "of the word," is attained alone through those golden pipes of the anointed ones, which are the Old and New Testament Scriptures. Hence all who claim to have that spirit, independent of faith and obedience to that word and its teachings, especially in relation to this parable and other portions, pertaining to the coming of Christ and his kingdom, are being led by a counterfeit spirit which will fail them in the final day. How is it with that large class of believers who admit the word, but deny the addition of the spirit agreeably to the teaching of that word? There is danger in both cases and the utmost care is necessary in order to be in possession, at all times, of the genuine oil which alone secures an admittance to "the marriage and supper of the lamb."

I used to believe with many others, that "faith is the oil," but I now see that faith is one of the gifts of the spirit, (1 Cor. xii. 9,) consequently imported as it is, is an inferior gift to that of the spirit. Now as this spirit can be had in the way Christ himself appointed, by asking for it in faith; it appears to me that those who do not possess it, dishonor him by unbelief. I will add an illustration or two and close. In a conversation with a daughter of mine upon this subject she remarked: "I believe the spirit may be possessed and enjoyed by others, but not by me; for I have sought it diligently but can't obtain it." I replied "don't you see by this acknowledgement, you don't believe what Christ said for the promise is 'to every one that asketh.'" By this we see how easy it is to shut ourselves up in unbelief, and thus lose this all important grace. Again, because we don't obtain it in copious measure, as did the disciples on the day of Pentecost many doubt its presence in them at all. If I have a correct understanding, we only get such supplies as are needful from day to day, with no additions till we improve faithfully upon that already conferred. A sister remarked on one occasion: "I want ten times more of it than I possess." My reply to her was this: "Suppose your son should say I am very hungry, and I want ten pieces of bread and butter," what would be you answer? Would it not be that when you eat the two pieces I now give you, more shall be given if needed? This is the way God deals with His children.

Then let us all be careful, and receive with thankfulness the gifts the Master sees fit to bestow, and so improve upon them, that we may be constantly receiving in our earthen vessels new drafts of that precious Golden Oil, drawn right from the "living word," and all will be well.

P. ALLING.

"Watchman! What of the Night?"

"The great day of the Lord is near: it is near, and hasteth greatly."

"Earth speeds on in her course of folly. She hastens to her goal—the goal of destruction. Already the premonitory throes of her final travail are coming upon her. The nations are awake! and the stirring proclamation is—"prepare war among the Gentiles!" The clouds gather—the thunders mutter—the storm of wrath rolls on! O, earth, thou has borne the curse of God for long ages past. Thy final travail shall speedily come. Thy inhabitants are, and are to be, unconscious of the nearness of that day, not from lack of evidence, but lack of faith. Men are not necessarily "in darkness, that that day should overtake them as a thief."

The bursting buds of the forest trees are not more unmistakable indications of the approach of summer, than the signs of these times are of the speedy consummation of the present age. The child of God is warned to know by these unmistakable tokens, that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand. But what availeth warning? Did it save Jerusalem? Did it save Tyre? Did it save Babylon? Did it save Egypt? Did it save the Antediluvians? Did it save the Sodomites? And will it save this present generation? Of what avail are the signs in the heavens above and in the earth beneath? Of what avail is the distress of nations that pervades the world? Of what avail are the portentous clouds of darkness that overhang the nations?

And notwithstanding God has sent his messengers, and warnings have been given, yet, "As it was in the days of Noah, and as it was in the days of Lot," "even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of Man is revealed." Alas! but so it is. Men will dream on, riot on, mock on, till that awful day shall suddenly surprise and overwhelm them. Men will say, "My Lord delayeth his coming; will jest, and mock, and scoff, and refuse to pray, till they "pray to the rocks and mountains." Scoffers in mockery will inquire, "Where is the promise of his coming?" even unto the end.

The world's concluding history from inspiration, is dark and cheerless. Yes, the world has grown old, and careless, and proud, and lustful, and covetous, and cruel, and oppressive, and impious, and defiant, and secure. Sodom and Egypt may be regarded as fit types of perverted humanity, as it appears at present. Sodom's pride; yes, pride and haughtiness, fullness of bread abundance of idleness, cruelty to the poor, licentiousness, infidelity, unbelief, and impiety, were to mark the "perilous times" that should be "in the last days."

Yes, iniquity abounds, while the love of many waxes cold. Men have a form of godliness, but deny the power thereof. They do not discern the signs of the times, but willingly are ignorant of the same. Evil servants smite their fellows. The world is secure and careless. The elements of strife are abroad. The whirlwind rises from the coasts of the earth. The unclean spirits gather the nations to battle. The kings of the earth assemble for fierce and final conflict. Armageddon gleams with glittering hosts.—Then swims with flowing blood. God's present dispensation to the world closes up. The night grows darker, the clouds thicker, the storm fiercer, until like the lightning along the darkened heavens, in flaming fire the Son of God is revealed with his mighty angels.

"But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night,"—yes, in the midst of earth's carnal and ungodly slumber. And, oh! what a day! unspeakably joyful to the saint, and woful to the sinner. It is the dawn of eternal day to the righteous, but endless night to the wicked. Vain and careless worldling, your continued unbelief and words and thoughts of peace and safety, but add to the mass of evidence that "the day" is near,—"will suddenly overtake you, and you shall not escape"—"to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness forever." "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father."

Spiritism.

Slowly but surely, as the years go by, Spiritism is receiving its merited exposure. We are frank to admit that many of the pretensions of spiritists are found in fact, and undoubted realities on the same [illegible] magicians reduplicated many of the miracles of Aaron. But there is much in the miraculous department of the spiritists' work that is the sheerest humbugery. Spirit photography has received an undue amount of notice, of late, as one of their greatest feats. A lady recently visiting in Europe bought what was called there a "magic mirror." The mirror was made in India, and cost $250. The following quizzed account of it and its capacity, from the Spiritual Scientist, will be of interest: It is formed apparently out of a great black onyx, some fifteen inches in diameter, and is polished more highly than cut glass, is framed in black, and rests upon a crimson silk pad in a handsome morocco case. At a recent seance the powers of this bowl of fate were fully exemplified. A clairvoyant woman gazed at it, and for more than two hours described with scarce a moment's intermission landscapes, emblematic groups, scenes transpiring by land and sea, in the snowy fastnesses of the north, and on the burning sands of the great Sahara desert. The forms of deceased friends flitted across it, and messages were displayed on white sheets, or paper screens held up before the seeress' eye. Anon a mounted caviller would dash into the field of vision, or the exciting episode of a fun chase be exhibited. Take it all in all, it is one of the most curious of the phenomena of the school of magic. The potency of the magic mirror was avouched in the earliest historic periods. The ancient Egyptian soothsayers used a drop of ink in a polished metallic basin, or a dark fluid held in the palm of the hand. In modern times, the most famous among the adepts in this form of divination, was Dr. Dee, whose magic crystal is still preserved in the museum, and who fell a victim to the ignorant intolerance of his times.

The true magic mirror is prepared by a high-caste priest, with solemn and peculiar ceremonies. Its potency is supposed to depend upon the nature of the ceremonies, and it may be made to represent either the dark or the light side of nature, to attract either good or evil spiritual influences.

It may be seen by this that spirit picture-taking, and clairvoyant sight-seeing, are not alone to be found among the spirits of this enlightened age and country. The same things have occurred among the barbarious and superstitious of other ages and other lands.

JUDEX.

The Call.

List! can it be
The Master of the vineyard calleth me?
Life's sweetest shadows mock me as I stand,
Bent with the burden of my idle years,
Bearing base fruitage in my shriveled hand—
Sin, shame, and fe. rs.

Go, work to-day,
I heard the morning call but answered, nay,
I will not labor in the fresh, bright, hours;
And when the noon was high and the need was great;
I would not heed; now night-dews chill the flowers,
Ah me, how late!

What have I lost?
What precious purchase? and at what a cost!
Make answer, soul of mine. Hark! can it be
The vineyard gate swings open, free and wide,
And that the Master still is calling me,
At eventide?

Weak, tremblingly,
Yet thou didst call me. So I come to Thee.
No late for service, and so stained with sin:
Let now I lift my puny hands, and cry,
"It still a life-long labor may come in,
Lord, here am I!"

Correspondence.

Dear Brethren and Readers of the Restitution.

Peace be unto you, and grace from our Lord Jesus Christ. We are always pleased to read in the correspondence department of the RESTITUTION, how the brethren are faring and the truth prospering in other parts of our broad land. In particular are we interested in the occasional reports from congregations, and think we ought to have more of them. Report your membership, number of additions by baptism; the form of your organization, and method of conducting services. Do you observe the ordinance of the Lord's supper? If so, how often? How often do you meet for worship? What are you doing for the spread of the truth, etc?

Thinking others would like to hear from us, we will begin with a report from the little church at Austin. The church at Austin was organized in May, 1874, and numbered at that time seventeen souls We met from house to house. Since then we have baptized two, and two have moved here from other congregations, making our present number twenty-one. We have rented the Baptist church for the afternoon, where we assemble every First Day to exhort each other out of the "Apostle's Doctrine," and attend to the "Fellowship, breaking of bread and prayers."

We are regular and punctual at these [illegible] because we think it our duty [illegible] not the assembling of ourselves together." We eat the Lord's supper at these times because we believe that in so doing we are obeying the command of Jesus given on the memorable night of its inauguration, in these words, "Do this in remembrance of me." We eat it also because we love to do so. It brings vividly to our minds the great sacrifice which Jesus made for us, through which we receive forgiveness of sins. It also brings to our minds the great love of God towards us in giving his only begotten Son that we might have life, and, if our hearts are right, it will kindle in them a love for the giver, and for him who freely offered up his life for us, and a desire to do those things which are well pleasing in his sight. We eat this supper on the First Day of each week, not because there is any command to do so, for we believe there is not, but because that was the day on which the early Church met for this purpose and we desire to imitate them as near as possible, knowing that they were guided by inspiration, and because we can see wisdom, from the nature and object of the ordinance, in its being observed often. We cannot have our minds refreshed too often with these great things which are so necessary to our salvation, and, "as oft as you eat this bread, and drink this cup you do show forth the Lord's death until he come."

We also believe, and carry out our belief in practice, that this ordinance belongs exclusively to the baptized believers in the Gospel who bring forth works meet for repentance. In this the example of the early church will uphold us in every instance. On the night of its ordination no one partook of it but Jesus and the eleven disciples; Judas, the traitor, did not partake with them, but immediately left when he had received the sop from Jesus at the passover supper eaten just previous. On the day of Pentecost, those only who gladly received the word and were baptized, continued steadfastly in the Apostle's doctrine, breaking of bread, etc., and it was the disciples who came together to break bread at Troas. The nature of the ordinance is sufficient reason why it should only be partaken of by the disciples of Jesus. Who else can have any object in thus remembering his sacrifice, than those who are to be benefited thereby? and what object can a person have in remembering the shed blood of Jesus when he has not taken the step which renders the blood efficacious in cleansing him from sin, by being "baptized for the remission of sins?"

We are doing our uttermost to bring others to a knowledge of the blessed truths which we enjoy, by public preaching, and also by a little paper called The Bible Examiner, which we publish every two weeks, and distribute free to every house in the town. God has blessed our efforts to some extent; two have been baptized, and we are looking forward to two or three more before the summer closes, and we notice that many of the members of the other churches are growing in the right direction as fast as their bids bound creeds will let them.

We hold a Bible class on Thursday evenings, for the study of the Word. The subject for the last two months has been, "The last week of Christ's earthly life," which we found, by comparing the four accounts given in the four Gospels, very interesting and beneficial.

Our church organization is just as simple as we can make it and have everything done "decently and in order." We choose an Elder from among our number every six months, bearing in mind the qualifications for this office given in Paul's letters to Timothy and Titus. His duties are to preside over all meetings, administer the ordinance and look after the general welfare of the congregation. We also, at the same time, choose a Deacon whose duties are, to prepare the ordinance, take charge of all money, and look after the bodily comforts of the brethren at our meetings. Our financial system is of the simplest. We pass around a box on every First Day, and the brethren drop in just what they feel they can afford. If the hearts of the brethren are in the right place, we will not lack for funds for any reasonable purpose. Let us hear from others.

Yours in the hope of the coming King. JAMES W. WILSON.

AUSTIN, June 4, 1876.

BRO. STEPHENSON: I have read your article very carefully which you publish in RESTITUTION of May 3d, and I concluded to drop a few thoughtbs upon it for you to consider more in detail.

I think you prove too much for your theory.

There were some in the Corinthian Church, who denied the resurrection of "the dead." Paul proves that God raised up Christ, therefore, the resurrection was possible, and in his case a certainty.

Paul then asks the question, or rather puts it into the mouth of "some one:" "How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come." Now you say the question involves the resurrection of all the dead, both the righteous and the wicked, and those that are neither, which you claim are much the greater part of mankind. Now, if Paul answers his own question, we shall expect that all will be embraced in the answer that was in the question, to-wit: "How are the dead (that is all of the three classes) raised up, and with what body do they (the three classes) come." Paul's answer embraces all that are in the question, or else the question is left unanswered.

You say in your article, the question includes all the dead; if so, the answer includes all, hence "the dead" (that is all the dead, for he has made no distinction) are raised incorruptible; he does not say a very small part are raised incorruptible, but the simple declaration—"the dead are raised incorruptible."

Now, it seems to me, if Paul believed the theory, "that all the dead" would be raised up—and had been eager to teach the Corinthian's this fact, he would use language such as you have in your articles, so that no one could mistake his meaning.

But as he was addressing the Corinthian Church, and not saloon keepers and harlots, we conclude to let his questions and premises refer to them, and their kind. Yours, kindly submitted.

A. B. ALLERTON.

DEAR BRO. REED:

I see in your paper that Brother J. M. Stephenson expects to visit Canada soon. If he, or any of the brethren, should ever pass through Chatham, we would be very happy to welcome them. They could please enquire for John Snelgrove or myself, where they will find a hearty welcome.

We are not many in number here—only five or six of us. We have no speaker or preacher among us, and any ops stopping and giving us two or three lectures would cheer us, and, as it were, give us a new start. We have no regular meeting at the present time, as there is some division among us about the kind of bread to be used at the Lord's Supper. Two or three say leavened bread is the right symbol, but I am fully persuaded from what I read in the Holy Word, that unleavened bread should be used. See 1 Cor. v: 6, 7: Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? Purge out therefore the old leaven, that we may be a new lump, as ye are unleavened. For even Christ our passover is sacrificed for us.

Is not the leaven a token of malice, hatred, strife, envyings, wickedness, corruption?

Does not the unleavened show forth love, purity, holiness, etc? If the leaven shows forth corruption, wickedness, etc., how then can it be the token of Christ's body? I would like to hear from some of the brethren on this subject, as I am desirous for truth and not error, and I think this an important subject.

I am young in years, and young in Christ's cause. I was baptized into Christ October 11, 1874, by Brother Churchill, of Toronto. There were also two others baptized about the same time, a sister and a brother. Since then I have endeavored to earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints. I had formerly been a member of the Methodist church for eight years, having joined that church when about ten years old, and remained so until I came to Chatham, where I met with a brother in the Lord who pointed out to me the truth of the Gospel, and led me to search for myself; and I thank God that he has opened my eyes to see, and inclined mine ear unto the truth.

Yours, in hope of eternal life when the Master cometh.

JAMES F. COON.

BRO. REED: The writer has been telling the news,—or preaching the gospel of the kingdom,—during the last winter, in this vicinity. It did seem that the glad tidings of the Kingdom did but little good to the people here; it being a Dunkard settlement with some others of orthodox views. But I find some good has been done. As I and my wife are alone here in the one faith, I want some of our preaching brethren to come and hold a meeting for two or three days with me; for I do think that we could raise up a church here if some one could come. I live seven miles due south of Bellphia, Carroll County, Indiana. Stop off at Colburn station. I live three miles south-east of the line road. Inquire for Walter Sagers,—then for C. W. Herron. My post office address is —Fyrmont, Carroll county, Indiana. Yours in hope of the soon coming King. C. W. HERRON.

LONDON, June 11.—Gibraltar is being victualed to support a garrison of 2,000 men for six weeks. This is irrespective of the accumulation of supplies for the Channel squadron, which is being vigorously pushed.

The Admiralty has issued circulars to all the large ship owners of the United Kingdom, requesting them to make a complete return of all their ships and steamers.

LONDON, June 12.—The Post's Berlin dispatch says the insurgent leaders have accepted the armistice and appointed Wesselitzki to arrange guarantees with the Northern Powers.

A Vienna special to the daily News reports that the Turkish Governor of Herzegovinna offered 2,500 florins reward for the capture of the Russian organizer of the insurgent forces.

LONDON, May 30.—A despatch from Madrid says a Protestant school in the Province of Pontevedra has been closed by order of the Minister of Justice at the request of the Papal authorities.

The condition of Turkey will remind the curious of the old-rhymed prophecy said to have been made in 1453. It is noteworthy that it will be "twice ten years" next spring, from the conclusion of the Crimean war:—

"In twice two hundred years the Bear
The Crescent shall assail;
But if the Cock and Bull unite
The Bear shall not prevail.
But look, in twice ten years again,
Let Islam know and fear;
The Cross shall wax—the Crescent wane,
Grow pale and disappear."

Infidelity and atheism are rapidly spreading among all classes in Italy. At a late trial in Rome, says the Free Church Record, the judges were greatly embarrassed by witness after witness refusing to be sworn on the Gospels, because they were freethinkers. To meet the difficulty thus raised, the prime minister has introduced a bill altering the form of the oath.

LONDON, May 30.—A special dispatch to the Telegraph from Paris says the insurgents have attacked and burned Bihacs, in Bosnia, killing three hundred and fifty Turks. At a second encounter in the same neighborhood the Turks were defeated, leaving one hundred and twenty dead on the field.

In view of the threatening aspect of affairs in southern Europe, the British fleet in the Mediterranean will soon be increased so as to consist of twenty vessels with 5,000 men. Seven ironclads with 1,000 men will probably go to Gibraltar.

CONSTANTINOPLE, June 7. The official report on the cause of the death of the late Sultan, signed by nineteen physicians of all the nationalities, exonerates the following statement:

"Upon being summoned by the Sultan to ascertain the cause of the death of Abdul Aziz Kahn, we found the body lying on a mattress. Parts of the body were cold and bloodless, except the outside was covered with coagulated blood.

"The body was not rigid. The eyes and mouth were partially open. Limpid streaks of blood were upon the arms and legs. The veins and cubital artery below the bend of the left arm were cut. Only the small veins of the right arm were cut. The arteries were intact.

"We were shown a pair of very sharp and blood-stained scissors, and were told that Abdul Aziz himself inflicted the above described wounds therewith. We are unanimously of the opinion that death resulted from hemorrhage of the vessels of the arms, and the scissors might produce the wounds.

"Lastly, the direction and nature of the wounds and the instrument which is said to have produced them, caused us to come to the conclusion that the case is one of suicide."

LONDON, June 12.—The Paris correspondent of the Times says La France, a journal very hostile to Turkey, publishes a telegram from Constantinople reporting that the eldest son and mother of the late Sultan have been murdered.

JERUSALEM.—The German colonists, in order to facilitate the communication between Jaffa and the Holy City, have formed a society which was joined by many Russians. The society has purchased 25 wagons and 50 horses, by means of which the tedious journey between the two cities, now altogether free from danger, will be performed with greater regularity and comfort.

The Jews in Spain lately petitioned King Alfonso to allow them the same privileges enjoyed by their people elsewhere in Europe. At present the followers of Moses and the prophets dare not open a synagogue in the Peninsula for fear of the popular fanaticism.

The whole country was surprised and alarmed on the 12th inst. at the intelligence that the Hon. James G. Blaine had been yesterday stricken with unconsciousness, while attending church, in Washington. The first reports, and those received for several hours, gave but little hope for his recovery, but later accounts were of a more cheering character. During the evening he recovered consciousness, and was able to recognize his family, and there was an absence of the more serious conditions which at first were supposed to exist. His medical attendants have expressed confidence of his ultimate recovery, and that the character of the attack does not indicate dangerous results.

Speaker Kerr lies in a very critical condition at Washington, and it is feared that he cannot long survive. The excitement and distress consequent upon the publication and investigation of the grave charges brought by the witness Harney, have so preyed upon and impaired his health, delicate and precarious at the best, as to give rise to serious apprehensions that the scandal will literally prove to be the death of him.—Chicago Tribune.

Archbishop Whateley did not despise a pun,—in fact, he rarely let an opportunity pass of perpetrating one, and sometimes, at a jolly dinner, would exert himself to make the worst pun of the evening. And it is to him we owe the valuable information that Noah's Ark was made of gopher wood, but Joan of Arc was Maid of Orleans.

BROTHER REED:

The poetry entitled "Our Home," published in the RESTITUTION of May 31, was not originally written by me, but was merely clipped and copied for publication, as it is in harmony with the Bible—the only faith of our faith.

The author of the poetry is to me unknown.

DIED

BROTHER REED

Please send word to the RESTITUTION of the following notice of the death of my brother:

Elder John Herron, son of John Herron, was born in Kentucky, and reared with his father, in an early day, to Rush-town county, Indiana, where he grew to manhood and was married.

He had united with the M. E. faith, but as he was a close observer, and a Bible reader he joined the Campbellite or Christian church, which faith he became able to defend, being an ordained elder for many years in succession.

While preaching to the knowledge of the Gospel, he heard Brother Stephenson speak on the Kingdom and its location, and the nature of man, and was by him baptized some 21 to 25 years ago. About eight years ago he removed to Fayette, Jasper county, Mo., where he proclaimed the good news. I was then preaching Evangelism in Benton county, Arkansas, and he came to visit me. He was convinced we and my wife that our faith was in part, wrong. I knew that if faith were wrong, baptism was also wrong, and baptism vain.

The result was that my wife demanded baptism at his hands, then home to do our first work over again. We had to begin on faith, on the saints' inheritance, and on the immortality of the soul. I held four days' meetings, and having the Bible fully on my side, I put the clergy to flight and baptized 16 of the Campbellites into the one faith in Benton and Washington counties, Arkansas.

As my Brother has fallen asleep in Jesus, to wait, with us, till Jesus comes to reward the saints of all ages, I now thank God that I left Barry county, Missouri, to spend four days with him and the church in Cordova. I delivered five discourses—exhorting the brethren and sisters to be steadfast in the apostles' doctrine. In my closing address I invited all who intend to meet me in the Kingdom, which I now come to give to their hand, silently gave the hand to assist and pass on over—my brother's hand, together both according to the flesh and the spirit being in feeble health, raised from his bed, and gave me his hand in token of his hope of that rest reserved for the people of God. Last fall I removed to Carroll county, Indiana. February 12th I received a letter informing me that my brother Isaac had fallen asleep in Jesus, at the age of 67, mourned for by all his friends and relatives.

I expect to meet him in GOD'S Kingdom.

C. W. HERRON.

BURT.—Earnest E., son of James and Eliza Burt, aged 1 years and 10 months.

Brother C. B. Stakeley preached the funeral discourse, from Job xiv. 14, to a large and attentive congregation—showing that man is mortal and lives by respiration, and that, from the violation of law, death passed upon all such.

He next showed that the state of death is a state of entire unconsciousness. Ps. xxx. 9; Job. xiv. 1-13. He then glowingly depicted the nature of man in the resurrection. 1 Cor. xv. 41-54; 1 Thess. iv. 13.

All were moved to be elevated by the words of Holy Writ, and tears flowed from eyes unused to weep. The children and sisters were with the bereaved to this trying ordeal, endeavoring to cheer them from the consolations of our most holy faith; and they were realgned to the will of Him who doeth all things well.

Another child of our bereaved brother and sister is quite low with inflammatory rheumatism. They do stand interested in our prayers, that God may strengthen and support them.

May we all meet the one called and glorified in a world.

Let Your Light Shine.

In view of the great work before us, and that this is the great year among the American people, it has been deemed best by some of our brethren to have a general distribution of tracts at Philadelphia. Some have already responded to the suggestion. Let every one do his or her duty in this direction. Tracts will be forwarded as soon as we get enough responses to the enterprise. Let us act at once.

AMERICAN CYCLOPEDIA.

A Comprehensive Library in Itself.

A Great National Enterprise in which every American may Take Pride.

Published by D. APPLETON & CO., 549, 551, Broadway, N. Y.

The Cyclopedia, now in course of publication, is entirely rewritten, and appears with about 4,000 maps and illustrations. To be completed in sixteen volumes of 800 pages each. Fourteen volumes now ready.

In the experience of book making and selling, this work is without a parallel. With the multiplication of steam presses, the publishers are still unable to meet the demand.

The sale has already reached over 300,000 volumes, and this in parts thus: The demand for the work is but fairly commenced; the orders are largely multiplying and the indications are that the sales of the work for 1876 will greatly surpass those of the previous year.

Thus the most sanguine expectations of the publishers are more than realized.

The publishers again repeat to the public that no expense has been spared in the writing, editing, or publishing departments of the American Cyclopedia.

The cost will be more than $200,000 to prepare the sixteen volumes for the press.

The Restoration.

Take boughs of goodly trees, the joyous palm
The willows of the brook, and keep the feast,
The mourner's wounds are healed with oil and balm,
The captive's tears are dried, her sorrows cease;
Rejoice with praises let Jerp and cymbal tell
How goodly are thy tents, O Israel!

As willows spring beside the winding stream,
So shall thy children's offspring flourish now;
Thy long captivity's become a dream
A sweet memorial is that willow bough
Of all thy sorrows, of that tearful exile, all,
On which, by Chebar's stream, thy soul was hung.

Planted in Canaan's fruitful ground,
Her stream shall nourish thy spreading root;
On thee no yellow leaf shall ever be found,
For Hermon's dew shall feed each verdant shoot
What hath Jehovah wrought? the nations cry;
"Great things for us!" the ransomed tribes reply.

Selected.

Fair Chance, and Bible Chance.

To all the Holy Brethren and Sisters:

It is an imperative duty, each for himself, to examine carefully and prayerfully the old Abrahamic Gospel and the "old, old story" of the New Testament, without paying any attention to the inferential reasonings and bold dogmatisms of uninspired men deduced from isolated Scriptures in order to bolster up their untaught doctrines. The Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing else but the Bible, subjected to the same rules of grammar, definition and logic, as other writings, always letting it explain itself by subjects and parallel passages when possible, is what should occupy our time and attention to the exclusion of all man-taught theories. That Book is as high as heaven, as deep as hell, and should wholly occupy the most brilliant intellects during life, without "being carried about by every wind of doctrine;" without being drawn away and entired by any Fair chance, Another Chance, or any thing else not plainly taught therein, and in its own words; for men of brilliant intellect, trained to thought and logic, profound in the wisdom of the schools, may, if so disposed, prove the worse to be the better side. All these gifts and attainments are good, grand, glorious, if sanctified and directed by God.

Now, we all admit that it is necessary to believe and obey the gospel of the kingdom, and that only in order to salvation. If this be so, then all formulated words and doctrines outside that gospel, whether made by men or angels are unnecessary, schismatic in tendency, and dangerous to the peace of God's church and cause.

The tendency of many writers and teachers to Universalism, and a Fair Chance Theory which is only Universalism revised and enlarged, and under more specious attitudes, is most assuredly to clog the cause of Christ to a triumphant position of sound doctrine and gospel obedience, and holiness of the household of faith.

No one would presume to affirm that it is necessary in order to salvation to believe either Universalism or the Fair Chance. All affirm that it is necessary to believe the Gospel. Therefore neither the one nor the other is the Gospel, nor any part of it. Did Paul or any of the apostles preach either? If so, let it be shown in their own words, and not by the logic and deductions of trained logicians and rhetoricians.

What about the Fair Chance—even admitting that it may be true? Do its speculations benefit us here? Are we preaching to the heathen? Is it our business to cease preaching the old-fashioned gospel here, where thousands upon thousands are exposed to the second death, and where Paul's gospel believed and obeyed would avert that doom—and turn our attention to instructing the Almighty in what he ought to have said concerning the heathen? Will such procedure save the heathen, or change the purposes of God?

The doctrine of the resurrection, too, must be invoked in favor of this dogma or against it. We must invent words to suit our purposes for or against. Hence, "the resurrection," "a resurrection of good and evil," words and phrases of the Bible will not do us, but we must coin a "a universal resurrection," "a partial resurrection." Had it not been for this modern child, the Fair Chance, there would have been no need of these words. The words of the Spirit would have sufficed us. But when we abandon the words of the Spirit, we must coin words of the flesh.

Who has called us to this work? Has the Almighty? Or is it not in the interest of those who have itching ears? Why dogmatize upon untaught questions? Will we convince the Almighty that it is to his interest, and in the interest of the world, to work in the path we mark out for him? Are we wiser than he? Had it been his plan, could he not have taught it in the words of the Spirit, and without our suggestions?

We shall briefly investigate some points in these dogmas. But we state beforehand that we are satisfied with the old Gospel words and plan. I am not now and here advocating any theory, true or false; the Gospel itself, in its own spiritual words, is good enough for me. I am only aiming to show that we may disbelieve this modern doctrine, and yet be in no danger. We may believe and teach it, and it has no power to save. The only power or influence it has, it seems to me, is to divide, to call attention from that Gospel which Paul affirms "is the power of God unto salvation unto all them that believe."

First Corinthians xv. 22, 23 is cited, and an interpretation fastened upon it in favor of the Fair Chance doctrine. It is affirmed that as Paul taught, all, the whole race, die in Adam, so the same all, the whole race, shall be made alive in Christ. The Scripture quoted is all right, but the interpretation forced upon the word all is all wrong. It is untrue, in fact, and can not therefore be what Paul meant.

The whole race do not die in Adam, nor out of him. Two exceptions have already occurred—Enoch and Elijah; and if the Scriptures are to be credited thousands upon thousands living when Christ comes shall never die. What becomes, then, of this Fair Chance dogma aimed to be deduced from this Scripture? The prop intended here to the Fair Chance dogma is: that if the heathen dead be raised, a class who never heard the Gospel, and could not be called either just or unjust, then a post mortem Gospel and a post mortem chance must be given them, or God could not be just!

Now this word, all, instead of always embracing the idea of universality, very frequently does not even embrace a majority. Here is the rock upon which all Gospel-makers split! Had not the Fair Chance dogmatized here, then there would have been no controversy.

What is Paul's meaning? Clearly this, as he writes to Christians only: That the all of whom and to whom he wrote who die in Adam, the same all, having become Christians, and being in Christ, shall be made alive in Christ. Not one of Adam's race is raised here, is made alive here, excepting those that are Christ's at his coming. Nor will any others be raised during his reign. Other Scriptures must be appealed to in order to prove the resurrection of the unjust. We may not legitimately prove by this Scripture only what Paul had in view in the writing of it, namely, that Christ would certainly raise from the dead and immortalize his people when he came to reign, and in order that they might reign with him, and immortalize his living saints, and give them this glorious position also.

But in no event can this Scripture be used in the interests of the Fair Chance. For though the race is in Adam, Paul's all here does not include the race; for at least two have not died, and thousands more will not die. So, as the all of this text does not embrace the race, even so the all that shall be made alive does not embrace the race. Therefore Fair Chance advocates must try some other text, or give up their dogma. They can not hew out from this text a necessity for a post mortem Gospel nor a post mortem Fair Chance.

This whole chapter is one of Paul's masterpieces to prove the resurrection of the dead in Christ to the same glorious honor and position. And he who tries to prove by it more than this, must travel outside of the record to do it.

John v. 28, 29, is appealed to in order to prove the universality of the resurrection. It will not do to give the word "all" here this interpretation, because it will flatly contradict the Scripture already quoted and commented upon, as well as many others, and because the all in the 28th verse can not embrace more than the same word in the 29th verse, as this gives the reason for a resurrection, and is only a further explanation of verse 28, which is to give life to those who have done good, and to bring damnation, to utterly destroy all who have done evil. There is no third class embraced in this text to be raised in order to a Fair Chance in the post resurrection state. None but those who hear the voice of the Son of God,—none but those to whom the gospel has been tendered, shall be raised; and of course where this has been done there can be but two classes—the one that has done good and the other that has done evil. "For where there is no law there is no transgression." "And sin is transgression of law."

Let Universalists and Fair Chance advocates put their fingers upon one plain "Thus saith the Lord" that a third party, neither good nor evil, will be raised from the dead in order that a Fair Chance, or any other kind of a chance may be offered them, and I yield at once. But this must be clear and undisputed—no far-fetched deduction from some isolated Scripture. If they do not do this, though they may appear more farseeing and benevolent than the Gospel, still I beg to dissent from them, and cleave to the Gospel of God.

I now turn my attention to a few passages of Scripture in which the word all is used, a very few out of the many, to show its Scriptural meaning, and thereby show that both Universalists and Fair Chance advocates use it illegitimately. The universalist forces it to teach their dogma of universal salvation, and Fair Chance advocates to prove that every human being of the race will be raised, and, that they may have a fair chance, there must be a post mortem gospel for them in the age to come.

It is said of the blind man whom Jesus made see—Mark viii. 25—that he "saw all men clearly." That is, according to these theorists, he saw every individual of the race. Evidently the meaning is that he only saw a few who were within the scope of his vision. This word all, then, unconnected with other words and potent reasons, is a poor one to prove either universal salvation or resurrection.

Mark xi. 32, avers that "all men counted John as a prophet." Does this include the whole race? Or did Mark use it in its ordinarily restricted sense?

The commission, in Mark xvi. 15, commands the apostles to "go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." Did the Savior want his apostles to understand that he required of them impossibilities. Surely he did, if he intended to convey the idea that they should travel over all the territory of the whole earth, or preach the Gospel to every one of the race. But when it is known that the Roman territory included all the world intended, and that its inhabitants included "every creature," then there was no impossibility required. Neither did Paul do when he said "the Gospel was preached to every creature who is under heaven."

Mark i. 5, says John "baptized all the land of Judea and they of Jerusalem," and yet the same book says "the Pharisees and lawyers rejected" John's baptism. And they were residents of Judea and Jerusalem! Does this Scripture contradict the other, or does Mark use the word all in its accommodated sense? Universalists use the word very ungenerously, to say the least, of it.

Romans xi, 26: "And so all Israel shall be saved. What, Paul, you among the Universalists? By no means; for just before this, ix. 6, 7: "For they are not all Israel which are of Israel; neither because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children." That is, the flesh and blood seed of Abraham are not the children of promise. They must be Christ's to be "Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise." So the word all, Scripturally, is seldom if ever used in the sense of the whole race.

Once more, Rom. viii. 22: "For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they (the whole creation,) but ourselves also." Here the strongest phrase in the Bible as to universality—the strongest phrase that could be used—in its Bible meaning here excludes the apostles from "the whole creation" of the Bible. So the words "all," "the whole creation," and others of a kindred nature, cannot teach Universalism or a universal resurrection.

If the general tenor of Scripture, the nature of the case involved, with all that legitimately belongs to said subject, does not support Universalism or a universal resurrection, then it is absurd to take the words "all," "every creature," "the whole creation," and try to bend these to the advocacy of such doctrines.

If for sin God destroyed the old world by a deluge, burned up Sodom and Gomorrah, and brought the most intolerable punishments upon the Jews, and denounces the second death and everlasting destruction, then Universalism is untrue, notwithstanding all its special pleadings upon the universality of meaning of certain words in the Bible. So, too, when the Bible speaks of a certain class that shall never see light, never be raised from the dead, shall be as though they had never been, shall remain forever in the congregation of the dead, it is worse than useless to give these a post mortem Gospel.

Why raise the old world, the Sodomites, the Amalekites, and a great portion of the wicked Jews, to punish them again for the same crimes for which God meted out to them their merited punishment? Why raise from the dead the heathen who have never heard nor violated God's law? To give them a chance? What a chance! If they are raised for a chance, then are they raised mortal. They then will have had two mortal lives to an one. Where is the fairness of this?

This doctrine, too, would raise millions upon millions of mortal men, unprovided with shelter, food and clothing, and powerless to provide them. The hell of Orthodoxy, with all its horrors and sufferings, would not be worse than their woes and sufferings until they died again. But I am answered that God could provide for them by miracles. True, if it were only a question of power. Why bring these into the world before he was prepared to give them a fair chance? He could as easily have done this during their life as to let them die, and then thousands of years afterwards, bring them to life again, and do for them what he could have done during their first life? Besides, if they were violated law, were not like Sodom unjust, why not make a new race when he is prepared to give a fair chance? This would be no injustice to these; for they never had the promise of eternal life. Having no promise, no hope, they have lost nothing.

Again, such procedure upon the part of God looks too much like child's play. It argues that God, like man, cannot do so well at the first effort as at the second.

This is Universalism run to seed. The devil might do better if he had a fair chance! So might the Sodomites and all others. But this doctrine of a fair chance, that is, an equal chance, is absurd in theory, and impracticable in practice. Were the sexes made equal? Have the nations been so made? Are all equal in intellect, riches, position? Was the patriarchal age of the world equal to the Jewish, which had their own light and privileges, and that of the previous age? Was the Jewish age equal to the Christian? Will this age equ. l the age to come—the millennial age?

Humanly speaking, there is no such thing as a fair chance—an equal chance for all. To reason after the manner of men, to give all an equal chance, why did not God make all angels at once, all immortal? Why have any suffering, any pain, any death? Why have some suffer here more than others? Why not at once make all upon an equality? And echo answers, why?

Whenever we leave revelation and commence reasoning upon these themes, we get beyond our depth, and are lost in the mazes and labyrinths of God's wisdom and providences. Man's puny, frail, mortal mind is too weak to unravel the mind and motion of the Infinite. All that we may now do, is to approach the Great White Throne, with hands uncovered, in the dust of humility, and in profound reverence; and all that we may now say is to cry "unclean! unclean!" and in our helpless condition, ask for grace to help in our every time of need! and to repose confidently in the wisdom, mercy and justice of God, being well assured of this one thing, that "the Judge of all the earth will do right."

Amen! and amen!

ALFRED MALONE.

The Emperor of Brazil.

On Friday morning last, Don Pedro visited the Temple Emanu-El, on Sutter street San Francisco, where the Rev. Dr. Elkan Cohn, Dr. Lilienthal and a few invited guests received the distinguished visitor. He admired the splendid Synagogue, and then requested to have the Holy Torah unrolled. The request being complied with, he commenced reading fluently, two chapters in Hebrew, translating the same readily. The Emperor thus proved himself a thorough Hebrew scholar. The Rev. Dr. Elkan Cohn presented him an elegantly bound Hebrew Prayer book.—H. Obs.

The Pedro of Jewish Origin.

The following historical anecdote may not prove uninteresting at the present time, when we have just received a visit from the Emperor of Brazil, and it may account for the deep interest he takes in Jewish affairs.

It is well known that the Jews of Spain and Portugal were a highly intelligent race, and that they rose to great honors in the Peninsula, both under Christian and Mohomedan rulers, but after the final overthrow of the Caliphs, the Catholic sovereigns no longer required Jewish assistance, relentlessly persecuted the Hebrews, and eventually expelled them. During these persecutions many Israelites left, or pretended to leave the religion of their fathers, and were known as "New Christians." These New Christians married freely with the highest nobility, and to-day there are but few Spanish or Portuguese families in the highest circles but what have an admixture of Jewish blood. A certain King of Portugal becoming alarmed at the power wielded by individuals of Jewish descent, issued a decree that every person with Jewish blood in his or her veins, should appear at Court, distinguished by a white badge; the king hoping by this edict to banish all such persons from his Court, as he believed no one would be willing to acknowledge his Jewish blood. On the day named he was surprised to see more than three-fourths of his Court wearing the white badge, and he was astounded when the Prime Minister entered, himself wearing, in a conspicuous manner, the same emblem. He asked him furiously what it's business was? His answer was: "I have come to carry out your Majesty's orders. Here are two white badges (at the same time producing them); one is for her Royal Majesty, your august spouse." "And for whom is the other?" thundered the King. The reply was: "For your Royal Majesty!"

It is needless to say that the edict was immediately recalled. If this anecdote be true—and there is no reason to doubt it—the Emperor of Brazil, who is a lineal descendant and true representative of the Kings of Portugal, must have a large quantity of Jewish blood in his veins.—Jewish Chronicle.

"Sunshine."

Our little paper has been published now six months, and is visiting regularly about 1,000 homes. It receives from all quarters words of encouragement and praise, showing that its visits are acceptable. It is, perhaps, not very modest in us to say that "Sunshine" is the equal, in matter and manner, of any paper of its cost published anywhere, and far the superior of the most that are published. But a candid comparison will justify what we claim.

We want to deal with the determination not to be outdone in this line, but to publish a paper of which no one need be ashamed, and we are assured that "Sunshine" meets fully, your expectations. It is an honest paper, financially, intellectually and religiously; returning one hundred cents to every dollar invested in it by its subscribers. Editor, contributors and printers are all doing their "level best" to give you a monthly for the children and family circle that shall be unexceptionable in every respect, and of which you may justly feel proud. But do you know what it costs to publish such a paper as "Sunshine?" Well, if you won't steal the trade, we will let you into the secret:

It has, thus far, cost us $60 monthly, and will not cost less, but more, for the remainder of the year. This is a total of $720 for the year. Now, our 1,000 subscribers have paid us $475. Where do you suppose the remaining $245 is coming from? Do not fear but it will come. "Sunshine" will not go down. But is it right that the editor should publish it at an actual loss, besides giving his time and labor, or that a few generous souls should finally come to the rescue and divide the loss between them? Now let me tell you how easily this thing can be managed. Do you remember that we asked for 2,000 subscribers? Now, in the first half of the year you have given us 1,000; just give us the other 1,000 in the remaining six months and the thing is done. Will you do it? There is nothing like a little recreation. If each subscriber to "Sunshine" were to get one more subscriber the chasm would be bridged. If each subscriber to the RESTITUTION were to respond with one subscription to "Sunshine," the thing would be more than done. But do you know that more than one half of the readers of the RESTITUTION have never seen but the first copy of "Sunshine"? And that was sent them gratuitously. "Times are hard." True, and none find it out sooner than editors and publishers. But are times really so hard that you cannot afford the luxury of a beautifully illustrated monthly like "Sunshine" for your children, or your neighbor's children, who are really too poor to take it, at a cost of 50 cents? If it is really so with you personally, in all sincerity, if you will send me your name you shall have "Sunshine" free. And we doubt not there are some thus situated. But let me say to you plainly, that if you chew, or smoke, or snuff that abomination called tobacco, or if you use those useless luxuries, tea and coffee, you need not send in your name—the "times" are not hard enough for you yet. But don't you see what a miserable hand I am to beg? Beggars should be polite, and put every one at their ease and make them feel good-natured—for that is the way to untie purse strings, we are told. But here is "Sunshine" in mortal need of your hearty co-operation to enable it to live through the hard times, and its editor gives you ill-mannered threats about using the filthy abomination of tobacco, and wasting your money on tea and coffee and then complaining of hard times, and so let a worthy cause suffer, or go down altogether, for want of the very means you waste in that manner. Well, it is very plain that "Sunshine" can never be sustained by begging. If its editor isn't better mannered,

But, seriously, are you not willing to assist us? We don't ask for donations; send us bona fide paying subscribers. Give us 1,000 more names in the next two months. If there are some who are not friendly to "Sunshine," then its friends must do a little more to make up for their lack. If we were making money in the enterprise it would be long before we should urge you to assist us: but are you not willing to do a little toward sustaining our joint enterprise, if the time and labor necessary to get out "Sunshine" every month are gratuitously bestowed?

J. F. WILLIAMS.

Go Slow.

DEAR RESTITUTION:—I have been much pleased with the liberal spirit of the managers in publishing the different views of matters recently. There is no way that truth can make headway so fast as when brought face to face with error; provided always, the articles are to the point, and in a good spirit. But it needs a wise management to avoid the dangers that such a liberal course may bring on. But what is the object? evidently to get at (as the writers say) the truth. What Truth? I ask; why the truth that will save those that will believe and obey it. Alright. I have been some twenty-five years listening, studying, reading, etc., to find out this same Truth, and I find it to be the Gospel:—nothing more or less. The Gospel is good news, glad tidings to all the people. Whosoever believes these glad tidings, and obeys from the heart, shall be saved. Now Brethren, is the resurrection of the saints a part of this good news? you say yes. Is the resurrection of all, or any of the wicked and their terrible second death, glad tidings to all the people? you say no. Did Jesus or the Apostles ever teach that a belief in the resurrection of all or a part of the wicked, was a part of the Gospel? I can nowhere find it. Again, some are very anxious to know just how much of Divine or Human nature there was in Jesus, all about his mysterious begettal and birth; and our Christadelphian friends leave by this, scattered themselves to the four winds.

The question to the frail Child is, can Jesus raise me up, and give me eternal life, and will he do it? answer, yes, if I am faithful to him. Is he the beloved and accepted of the Father? yes, if so I ought to be satisfied. If the bridge will carry me over safe, why trouble ourselves about the kind of timber it is made of? Paul tells us to avoid these questions and disputations, that bring strife and divisions.

Jesus promptly reproved Peter for his anxiety about things not his. When Jesus asked Peter to follow him, Peter wanted first to know what he was going to do with John. Jesus said to him, "what is that to thee? follow thou me." What has the resurrection of the wicked or (fair chance,) or the mysterious nature of Jesus, or any or all of the brother-dividing questions, to do with our salvation? Does not the reply of Jesus to Peter fit us? what is now wanted is a band of real live Christians, united by the simple gospel, as taught by Jesus and his Apostles, leaving out all these outside questions. This embraces Jesus in his official character, first, as the Child of Bethlehem, second, as the Lamb slain, then resurrected as the first fruit, then at his Fathers right hand as Mediator, then coming again to give life to the saints, and establish the grandest kingdom the world has ever seen. The things of his name; first, immersion into his name, [illegible] way by which our Relation [illegible] from aliens to citizens, or children, that by meeting as brethren and equals to his name in his own appointed institution, in which he has placed his name and has promised where ever two or three are so met he will be with them, and by so doing feed on him and keep alive that life first begotten by immersion; and then a faithful christian practice; a contribution of our means to help the poor and forward the good cause. And now a question arises: we all say we should avoid all evil. (Agreed;) but there are two kinds of evil, or sin: first of commission, second of omission. It is sin in us to omit doing good if in our power. Now let us bring this right home. Circulating papers and tracts is one of the most economical ways of doing good, then [illegible] among the people. Now suppose, as a brotherhood, we promptly assemble the first of each month to break bread, and at the same time give from ten cents to one dollar each, and an amount so small that hardly any one would feel it; see what a fund there would be to get books, papers, and pay expenses of those that labor among us. Take a little band of a dozen say, their weekly contributions, even but twenty cents each: it would be some $125 per year. Now brethren, why discuss things that disturb when the very life blood is freezing out of us by a want of live christain effort? who is that wise servant, that, when the master comes, will find him doing his duty? here is a platform that all looking for the appearing of Jesus can stand on.

I am pleased to see from England as well as various parts of this country a more liberal Christian feeling fast growing.

Yours from a Live Christian,

D. S. MORROW.

Humility.

No church establishment can stand and exert any far-reaching and practical benefit to mankind, that does not have the foundation of its influence on that divinest of all feelings—love of humanity and the love of man as man; of man as he stands undeveloped, uneducated, unadorned, unwashed, unredeemed. For here, down among the depths, and along the lower grades of life, are to be found to-day, as in all past times, the majority of those for whom God gave his Son, for whom that Son died on Calvary; and for whom the Spirit is continually striving, and for whose conversion and moral education the Church was primarily established, and is still upheld by the Divine Hand. You can not build up a church that symbolizes the real church idea, and yet rests on the upper level of fashionable society. If the Church intends to represent God, then must it fill its bosom with affection for the lowly, and with anxiety for those that are morally lost. "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners, to repentance." "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Indiana.
Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS,
THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to the end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the re-location of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the investigation of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Who Are the Nations? Who Are Those on His Right Hand? And Who on His Left?

Two sisters in the faith at Hesperia, Michigan, desire instruction on Math. 25. 31. 34., and suggest that it be published in the RESTITUTION.

"When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall He sit upon the throne of his glory. And before him shall be gathered all nations; and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats: and he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left. Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the Kingdom prepared for you, from the foundation of the world."

All things mentioned in this passage will transpire after the Son of man has come in his glory, and after the saints have been raised from the dead. In considering the passage I will notice the several points involved in it.

1. When the Son of man shall sit upon the throne of his glory, the saints also will sit down with him in his throne.

Peter said, "we have left all, and followed thee; what shall we have therefore?" And Jesus said unto them, "Verily, I say unto you, that ye which have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, guiding the twelve tribes of Israel." Math. 19. 27. 28.

Then the apostles must have been raised from the dead, at the time that Christ shall sit upon his throne.

Paul was one of the apostles and he said, "Hhenceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." Then the apostles, and all who love the appearing of Christ, will receive their crowns at the same time, when he shall sit upon the throne of his glory.

Christ said, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame and am sit down with my father, and to him will I give power over the nations." Rev. 3. 21-2-26. Then Christ, and the apostles, and all who love his appearing, and all who overcome, will receive their crowns, their thrones, and their power over the nations, when Christ shall sit upon the throne of His glory. This must be after the resurrection of the saints. When it is said that Christ sits upon his throne, it must include the saints who are to sit down with him in his throne.

2. Who are the nations?

The nations are the living inhabitants of the earth, after the saints have been raised from the dead, and the righteous living changed at the last trump.

"For the Lord himself shall descend from Heaven, with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord." The same thought is expressed in Paul's letter to the Corinthians. "Behold, I show you a mystery; we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." 1 Cor. 15. 51-52.

When the Lord shall descend from Heaven, he will stop on his way, in the region of the clouds before his feet stand upon the earth; and while there he will judge the dead, and raise up such as are found worthy to be raised from the dead, and fashion their vile bodies like unto his glorious body, and they shall be caught up to meet him in the air; ever to be with him.

The rest of the living world are left undisturbed for a while. These are the nations that are gathered before him, and which are to be separated, and which are to develop the sheep and the goats. There are no saints among these nations. They have all been gathered out, and with the resurrected ones, caught up to meet the Lord, and ever to be with him.

The next information we have of him or them, is found in Zech. 14. "The Lord shall come, and all the saints with him, (from the place where the saints met him in the air,) and his feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives. And the Lord shall be King over all the earth, and there shall be no more utter destruction, but Jerusalem shall be safely inhabited. All nations shall be gathered against Jerusalem, and the Lord shall fight against those nations as he fought in the day of battle." There are no saints among those nations, for all the saints are with the Lord." And it shall come to pass that every one that is left of the nations which came against Jerusalem, shall (be required to) go up to Jerusalem from year to year to worship the Lord of hosts. And it shall be that whose will not come up of all the families of the earth unto Jerusalem to worship the King the Lord of hosts, even upon them shall be no rain. and upon the countries that have no rain, will be the plague wherewith the Lord will smite the heathen that come not up to keep the feast of tabernacles."

Those of these nations that go up to Jerusalem to worship will be blessed, and those that do not go up to Jerusalem to worship will be cursed.

These nations are the same as the nations in our text. They are the living inhabitants of the earth after the saints have been separated from them. They are under the same reign, and of course subject to the same laws.

3. The object of this reign is to subdue these nations, and bless those who become loyal, and to curse those who remain disloyal.

The process by which this object will be accomplished is this: The seed of Abraham, which is Christ and the saints when perfected by a resurrection from the dead, will take possession of the throne of David, and have power over the nations, and will bless those that become loyal, and curse those that remain disloyal, and after all the wicked are destroyed, will bless all the nations of the earth.

"Thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies, and I will bless him that blesseth thee and curse him that curseth thee, and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed. The process is, to take possession, to subdue, and to bless. I do not know of any exception to this process in order to bless the nations, in the whole Bible. It is always either expressed or implied.

Let it be borne in mind always, that whenever the reign of Christ is mentioned, either in the Old or New Testament, the saints are included as reigning with him. The subjects of his reign are the nations, the object of his reign is to subdue them, and bless them, that they may serve him. If this is true in one case, it must be true in every case.

4. Who are those on his right hand?

They are those of the nations who become loyal under the reign of Christ. They are the all nations who are to be blessed in God's covenant with Abraham. They are the righteous who are to flourish under the reign of the seed of David, the all nations that shall serve him. Psa. 72. 7-11. They are the nations who cease to learn war under his reign. Isa. 2. 4. They are the people who are represented by the earth being full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea. Isa. 11. 9. They are those in the new earth who shall build houses and inhabit them, and plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them, and bring not forth for trouble. Isa. 65. 21. They are the all flesh who shall come to Jerusalem to worship the Lord, from one new moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another. Isa. 66. 23. They are the all people, nations and languages, under the whole heaven who are to serve him. Dan. 7. 14-27. They are those who do the will of God in earth as it is done in Heaven, after the Kingdom is established. Math. 6. 10. They are those in his kingdom who shall shine forth as the sun after those that do iniquity are gathered out of it. Math. 13. 43. They are those who shall be subdued under the reign of Christ that God may be in all. 1 Cor. 15-28. They are the nations who shall be saved, and who shall be healed by the leaves of the tree of Life. Rev. 22. 2.

These are those on his right hand, who are to blessed, and to inherit the Kingdom, prepared for them from the foundation of the world. There are no saints among those described above. They are the nations under the reign of Christ and the saints. The saints will inherit the Kingdom when he comes, the nations will be subdued and blessed under his reign afterward.

5. Who are those on his left hand?

They are those of the nations who do not become loyal under the reign of Christ. They are those that are to be cursed, under the reign of Christ. They are those that are to be cursed, broken to pieces, and who are to lick the dust. They are those that are to be gathered out of his Kingdom, and be destroyed, under the reign of Christ. These are those on his left hand.

6. How can these nations who are earthly inherit the Kingdom, when Paul said, flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God?

Paul was speaking of the seed of Abraham, who are to inherit the kingdom of God. Flesh and blood cannot inherit that position in the Kingdom. To prepare for that position, Christ and the saints must be raised from the dead incorruptible, so that they can die no more. This will qualify them to be rulers in an everlasting Kingdom.

These nations are to inherit the Kingdom prepared for them when the world was made. But they will not inherit it, in the sense of rulers; but in the sense of subjects; the same seasein which they would have occupied it, if Adam had not sinned. Adam was not to have dominion over men, "but he was to become loyal, and to curse those who remain disloyal.

The process by which this object will be accomplished is this: The seed of Abraham, which is Christ and the saints when perfected by a resurrection from the dead, will take possession of the throne of David, and have power over the nations, and will bless those that become loyal, and curse those that remain disloyal, and after all the wicked are destroyed, will bless all the nations of the earth.

"Thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies, and I will bless him that blesseth thee and curse him that curseth thee, and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed. The process is, to take possession, to subdue, and to bless. I do not know of any exception to this process in order to bless the nations, in the whole Bible. It is always either expressed or implied.

Let it be borne in mind always, that whenever the reign of Christ is mentioned, either in the Old or New Testament, the saints are included as reigning with him. They are the nations under the reign of Christ and the saints. The saints will inherit the Kingdom when he comes, the nations will be subdued and blessed under his reign afterward.

5. Who are those on his left hand?

They are those of the nations who do not become loyal under the reign of Christ. They are those that are to be cursed, under the reign of Christ. They are those that are to be cursed, broken to pieces, and who are to lick the dust. They are those that are to be gathered out of his Kingdom, and be destroyed, under the reign of Christ. These are those on his left hand.

6. How can these nations who are earthly inherit the Kingdom, when Paul said, flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God?

Paul was speaking of the seed of Abraham, who are to inherit the kingdom of God. Flesh and blood cannot inherit that position in the Kingdom. To prepare for that position, Christ and the saints must be raised from the dead incorruptible, so that they can die no more. This will qualify them to be rulers in an everlasting Kingdom.

These nations are to inherit the Kingdom prepared for them when the world was made. But they will not inherit it, in the sense of rulers; but in the sense of subjects; the same seasein which they would have occupied it, if Adam had not sinned. Adam was not to have dominion over men, "but he was to become loyal, and to curse those who remain disloyal.

He lost this position by transgression. The earth was cursed, and was to bring forth thorns and thistles. Man was to die and return to dust, and be excluded from the tree of life. In this condition, and under this curse, the posterity of Adam have lived, and will continue to live until they shall be subdued to God, under the reign of Christ and the saints. And then the King will say unto them, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the Kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. In what sense? Inherit it as it was prepared for you. Inherit it as subjects, to live forever on condition of obedience, by freely eating of the tree of life. Inherit it as an uncursed Kingdom.

The Kingdom which is promised to Christ and the saints is the Kingdom when all people, nations, and languages, dwell under the whole heaven. The seed of Abraham when made incorruptible will inherit the Kingdom as rulers. The nations will remain earthly, and inherit the Kingdom as subjects according to the original plan.

7. Who are his brethren?

His disciples are his brethren. These that do the will of his Father are his brethren. These are the seed of Abraham and heirs with him to the Kingdom. Christ said, "who is my mother? and who are my brethren? And he stretched forth his hand toward his disciples, and said behold my mother, and my brethren. For whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is brother, and sister, and mother." Matth. xii. 48-50, again he said, "Go and tell my brethren, that that they go into Galilee and there shall they see me." Matt. xxviii-10 "Then the eleven disciples went into Galilee where Jesus had appointed them." Paul said, that "Christ was the first born among many brethren." Rom. viii-29.

Then the words "these my brethren" in the connection of our text, must refer to the resurrected saints who are set down with Christ in his throne, the many brethren among which he was the first born. The seed of Abraham which were made alive at his coming.

8. What will be the test by which these nations will be judged?

The test will be their treatment of Christ. For he said, I was hungry, and thirsty, and a stranger, and naked, and sick, and in prison, and ye ministered unto me, and they say unto him when did we do this? and he said, inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the last of these my brethren ye did it unto me. This is in harmony with what God said unto Abraham. "I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee." This is the same test by which these nations will be judged. Christ is the seed, his brethren are also the seed. Those of the nations who accept Christ as their King, and love him, and serve him, and imbibe his spirit so that they minister unto the wants of the needy and the suffering will be set on his right hand, all others on his left.

This work of judging, and subduing, and separating, and blessing the nations under this reign, will not be done in a day, but a long period of time will be required for its accomplishment. In conclusion, let the seed Christ was born to sit upon the throne of his father David, and to fulfill the oath made of God to Abraham, and as he was raised from the dead to sit down on the same throne, according to God's oath to David, and as he went to heaven to receive for himself this kingdom from his Father, so he will come again and take possession of the kingdom and reign.

When he comes, he will raise from the dead his brethren, who are the seed of Abraham, and jointly with them, will sit down upon his throne, and have power over the nations. He will then execute judgement upon them, by blessing those that bless Abraham, and by cursing those that curse Abraham, and thus seperate them one from another. And then shall he say unto the loyal ones, Come, ye blessed of my father, inherit the Kingdom prepared for you, from the foundation of the world, as God promised to Abraham and to David.

European War Prospects.

Although reports for several days past have been favorable to peace in Europe, there indications continually cropping out that the serenity is only on the surface, and that the sudden calm is deceitful, and may prove the forerunner of a storm as portentous as that which was threatened two or three weeks ago. A glance below the surface will show that all the elements of a great war are seething in the political caldron. Every political change in Turkey during the past two or three weeks has been accomplished by violence. There can now be but little doubt that the late Sultan Abdul-Aziz shared the fate of a long line of illustrious predecessors, and was murdered after dethronement. His violent death has been followed by the assassination of Hussein Avni Pascha and Reshid Pasha, the new ministers of war and foreign affairs, who had hardly obtained their portfolios before they were murdered. It may be said that the deed was the work of a madman, and that he has been promptly punished, but it has none the less demoralized the new administration, which looked to these to officers more than to all the rest of the government officials to determine the attitude of Turkey toward the insurgents and the European powers. Their sudden assassination has plunged the government into dire confusion. The new ministers had commenced to inaugurate measures which would have re-established the Mussulman ascendency, and thereby relieved the empire of foreign influence and the possibility of foreign intervention. They had also promised protection to the Christians and pledged themselves to adopt a policy which would have led to economy, justice and reform. The new policy, however, is swept away with them, a Constantinople dispatch of the 19th inst. affirming that the ministers of the sultan differ among themselves upon the question of creating a new assembly, and have indefinitely postponed the adoption of the new constitution which has been promised. Worse than this, the Christians can no longer rely upon the promise of protection which had been held out to them. Accounts from all sources are full of apprehensions of violence, and in Constantinople itself the Christians fear a general uprising of the Mussulman fanatics. In Bosnia, the Turks have unfurled the green flag, which means no quarter to Christians. In Jerusalem, the Christians, alarmed at the excesses of the Turkish authorities, and the prospect of an uprising of the Mussulman population, have barricaded their houses and are preparing to defend themselves. The German colony in the city, which is the successor of the ill-fated New England colony, has sent to the home government for military assistance, and a Turkish army is now encamped by the Holy Sepulchre. Meanwhile a powerful Turkish fleet is on its way to Crete, where the rebellion has become formidable. Thus it will be seen that in Constantinople itself, in Bosnia and Bulgaria, not to mention Herzegovina, Montenegro, and Servia, in Southern Crete, and in far-off Jerusalem, the clouds of war are still ominously gathering. Again, the relations between Turkey and her rebellious provinces have not changed in any particular, notwithstanding the change of administration. One of the first acts of the recently-assassinated ministers was to offer terms to the provinces in revolt, which were instantly refused. Herzegovina, Montenegro, and Bosnia have refused to lay down their arms. Their armies are still in the field, threatening Turkey. Servia, through the Prince of Milan, has made a formal proffer of loyalty to the new sultan, but it is not the act of the people of Servia, who are already repudiating it, and openly giving expression to their discontent with the reigning prince. Their army is still under arms, and their intention not only to assert their independence, but also to annex either Herzegovina or Bosnia to their possessions, is just as strong as ever. Meanwhile the great powers remain quiet, with the relations between Turkey and the insurgents unchanged. If the Turks inaugurate a religious war, they must interfere and wipe Turkey out. If the Turks merely attempt to enforce their authority, will the great powers stand calmly by as spectators? Is this the new policy secured by Disreali, in refusing to agree to the Berlin memorandum, to let the Turks and their subjects fight it out and maintain peace outside the Turkish frontiers? It looks so. In such an event, Turkey's doom is sealed.—Chicago Tribune.

Dr. Watts on Death.

Death to a good man is but passing through a dark entry, out of one little dusty room of his Father's house into another which is fair and large, lightsome and glorious, and divinely entertaining. Oh, may the rays and splendors of my heavenly apartments shoot far downward, and gild the dark entry with such a cheerful gleam as to banish every fear when I shall be called to pass through it.—Dr. Watts.

Now it seems to me that Dr. Watts in this beautifully worded paragraph, has made one very serious mistake. If he had said, "emerging from the death state to a good man" etc., all that follows would have been most excellent and true. "Lightsome and glorious and divinely entertaining," is the building beyond, but it does not come until the "earthly house of this tabernacle is dissolved." The heavenly and divine building succeeds the earthly. The one is temporary and will soon pass away, the other is eternal and shall abide forever. Yes, there are rays of splendor that shoot downward and light up the dark entry from one house to the other. More than once has heaven held communion with earth and permitted mortal man to get a glimpse of the glory world. Glimpses will suffice only for a time, the reality must come ere long.

JUDEX.

Decline of Popery in Europe.

Dr. Herbert Vaughan, the Romish bishop of Salford, has lately returned from a visit to the "prisoner of the Vatican," and though he brings cheerful news as to the health of the Holy Father, he has been telling the faithful in Lancashire that things on the continent, and especially in Italy look very gloomy, indeed. He assures them that a Liberal conspiracy has been entered into throughout the continent, the effects of which are painful to contemplate, and still more painful to feel.

He suggests that in Italy the new ruling power is going at such a terrible pace that we may expect soon to see it abolishing the Decalogue. From these doleful words of Dr. Vaughan it is safe to conclude that the wholesome current of progress, detested by such men as he, must have set in very strongly; and this inference is certainly sustained by the political incidents in Rady, France, and Spain, which are reported simultaneously with the lugubrious speech of the ex-editor of the Tablet.

In the first named of these countries, Italy, the political unity of which cannot be said to be fully consolidated so long as its institutions repose on the basis of the present restricted suffrage, a Royal Commission has been appointed to draw up a scheme for the extension of the franchise, and all who know the antecedents of the leading members of the new Italian cabinet, are expecting to see a decided step in advance taken, though of course the great mass of people,—thanks to the protracted rule of the priests of the past—are by far too ignorant to permit of their being suddenly added to the electorate.

In France, where the efforts that are being made by the Republican majority to effect the divorce of the church from the state provoked the Ultramontane Conference, the most of whose proceedings were conducted in secret session, we see the Government issuing an order with respect to the circulation of newspapers, which has almost a frank English feeling about it, and which is one of many heralds proclaiming that for our neighbors on the other side of the silver streak better days are at hand.

At Madrid the discussions in the Cortes during the past week have been mainly on the religious question, and the tone of the debates has been exceedingly hopeful. It is true that Senor Ortiz did not succeed in carrying an amendment which sought to reintroduce the more liberal article on religious tolerance contained in the constitution of 1869, though even for that a sturdy band of thirty-three Senators voted in the division; but on the other hand the Ultramontane factions were powerless against the overwhelming majority which declared in favor of continuing to Protestants the measure of tolerance which they at present enjoy. Perhaps the most significant incident in the debate was that which occurred at the close of the great speech of Senor Ortiz, when he demanded to know of the Ultramontane members whether their party would close all the Protestant places of worship at present existing in Spain, and expel all Protestants from the country. To this question Senor Ferdinand Alvarez replied, with brutal frankness, that they would, but we perceive one token of the great change which has come over the spirit of the land of the Inquisition when we note the words that are added by the Parliamentary reporter.

The answer of the leader of the priest party, we are told, created a great sensation. It evidently shocked the majority in the assembly, pretty much the same way as it would have shocked an English audience. For an amendment proposing that Dissenters should be restricted to private worship, only twelve votes could be mustered, the majority which thrust out the hateful thing numbering 193.

Thus we find that in Madrid, as well as at Versailles and Rome, things are moving in a healthy flow; and we can not wonder that English reactionaries like Dr. Vaughan, of Salford, are in a somewhat despondent mood when they survey the position of affairs on the continent. The great heart of England, however, rejoices in the fresh tokens that lands long cursed with superstition are coming, slowly, it may be, yet surely, into the clear daylight of civil and religious liberty. Belfast Witness.

THE RESTITUTION

PLYMOUTH, IND., ...JUNE 28, 1876.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

☞ The Investigator comes to hand as full of pain (Paine) as usual. Its issue of June 14th contains five articles which are devoted to him, or his memorial, besides others which are composed more or less of the same material. The burden of its song, week after week, is Paine—Thomas Pain—and pain generally. Even the advertising columns follow the example of editorials and correspondents, and his name appears in this one department twenty-eight times. Still as fast as other advertisements fall off, we expect to see an extra dose of Paine. Of course this is a free country, and any paper has a perfect right to devote itself to one idea if it chooses, but we cannot see the propriety of continually stirring up the poor man's bones, under the circumstances. If, as the Investigator believes, Paine is dead, and the dead rise not, why not let him alone? If he has not now, nor never can have, a conscious existence, of what benefit to him or anybody else is this constant agitation? The editor seems to keep himself in continual fear that somebody will fail to do him justice or quote something that he said without giving him credit. We are strictly in favor of giving everybody their dues, but we cannot see the use of chronic obituary notices. We want justice done to the memory of the dead, but we don't want the funeral procession to keep going over the road just for the sake of coming back and going over it again. Hence we cannot see the propriety of so much post mortem examination of this subject.

If there is no future life for Thomas Paine—if he has entered into the halls of eternal oblivion, and long since gone back to dust, why can't Mr. Seaver let him alone? What is the use of bringing him up a dozen times a week? What is the use of building a Paine Hall and lighting over it until everyone is in pain, that has anything to do with it? What is the use of a constant war of words about his life and conduct? What difference does it make whether he was good, bad or indifferent? If we were all to fall down and worship him what good could it do, if he is never raised from the dead? How can a world's adulation benefit or gratify a man, who has not now and never can have, any consciousness of it? We would suggest to the Investigator that its Paine (pain) is becoming chronic, and might be relieved by diverting the mind of the patient to some other theme.

A Centennial Paper.

Some have suggested that donations be made to circulate a large amount of tracts this Centennial year. Others have proposed that a double-number of the RESTITUTION, containing a diversity of carefully prepared articles on the great themes of Scripture truth, be printed and widely circulated.

For various reasons it is thought best, by those who have consulted on the subject, to print a double-sized paper to the amount of about 6,000 copies for our brethren to circulate, both at Philadelphia, and elsewhere. To do this, would require an extra outlay of one hundred dollars. This would furnish regular subscribers with a double number each, and leave about 3,000 copies for general distribution. It would be the best plan to distribute as widely as possible. This might be effected, through the country generally, by the aid of our ministering brethren and those who now take the paper. Our brethren in Philadelphia could distribute to Centennial visitors as many copies as circumstances might demand. If an extra copy were sent to each subscriber it might certainly be placed in the hands of some one who would be interested in reading it. This would scatter the paper far and wide. Ministers, and interested, active brethren, could circulate a number of copies where they would be appreciated and do good.

Carrying out some such plan would widely disseminate Bible truth, and, as we would hope, enlarge the subscription list of the RESTITUTION; which is indispensable for its final prosperity and success. Have we not one hundred brethren who will contribute $1 each for this purpose? Would it not be more pleasing to God than to waste more than this in some worldly celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of our country's liberty? Sowing seed in this way will result in a return in that harvest to life eternal. Some can do less, and some can do more; some can give ten cents, and some can give ten dollars. Let our brethren respond without delay; if we do not receive enough to print a double number we could print a larger edition of a special Centennial, as a regular issue, or circulate tracts, as some have proposed. Let us, however, have the double number. Brethren in this part will make a start, and, whatever they may do, do at once. The number should be issued a month or six weeks before the close of the Centennial Exposition. Let brethren everywhere act at once. Let us have enough right away to print 5,000, or even 6,000 copies of a Centennial RESTITUTION. Secular papers are supplied with funds for this purpose, and the demand for them exhausts the editions printed. The very idea and name of—Centennial paper—excites an interest. Let us avail ourselves of this feeling.

The paper would be better than tracts because it would contain a greater diversity of themes, be printed much cheaper, and be much more easily and cheaply distributed. About one third of the expense and labor would come in the line of regular business, and many would read a Centennial paper that would throw a tract aside unread.

A Triumph for the Truth.

During the progress of the late debate on the Kingdom of God between myself and W. B. Hendrix, pastor of the Disciple church at Remington, Ind., the following correspondence occurred, which will explain itself:

GOODLAND, Ind., May 27, '76.

L. H. TAFEL,

836 Arch Street, Phil., Pa.:

Dear Sir:—

In a recent public discussion on the teaching of the Holy Scriptures concerning the fate of the finally impenitent, I introduced the Hebrew word אָבַד (avad). To determine its use, I referred to Num. xvi. 30; 2 Kings ix. 8; Job viii. 13; xviii. 17; xx. 7, as instances of its occurrence. I did not have a Hebrew concordance or Bible with me at the time to verify the statement; seeing which, my opponent made bold to deny, in the most positive terms, the occurrence of the word in the instances mentioned, and subsequently both he and his partizans publicly charged upon me an attempt to wilfully mislead the public. Having obtained the books mentioned, and verified the fact, I called upon him by letter to publicly correct the error on his part, and withdraw the charge at the beginning of the debate which is now in progress between us. In writing to him I used the English letters, Avad, instead of Ah vad, which are employed in the Englishman's Hebrew concordance. Taking advantage of this, he publicly insists that I used the Chaldaic form of the word, which is thus represented, and which he insists is another word entirely, with a different meaning. In this he is backed by his clerical friends, who, together with himself, claim to be Hebrew scholars, and claim also the recently obtained endorsement of some Hebrew scholar of reputation.

In this dilemma I make bold to appeal to you, as unquestioned authority, both for the sake of the truth and to relieve myself from an unjust imputation, trusting to your love of truth and fair dealing to give me an immediate reply covering all the points in dispute, so that it can be publicly read before the close of the present debate. I promise, also, to faithfully read your decision to the same public if it be adverse to my position as here presented.

Meanwhile, I am, my dear sir,

Faithfully Yours,

J. F. WILLCOX.

THE ANSWER.

PHILADELPHIA, June 2, 1876.

REV. J. F. WILLCOX:

Dear Sir:—I have received your inquiries as to the word אָבַד

1. As to its representation in English characters, I prefer abhad, although ahad or aoad would be a transcription by which a Hebrew Scholar could at once identify the word.

2. As to the Chaldee אָבַד I would write it abhad or simply avad. It is the same root as the Hebrew, and means the same thing, namely: to be lost, or to perish.

3. You ask whether the Hebrew word אָבַד occurs in Num. xxi. 30; 1 Kings ix. 8; Job viii. 13; xviii. 17; xx. 7. On referring to those passages I find that the word אָבַד occurs in all of them.

With the hope that your discussion will bring out the truth of God clearly to all, I am,

Yours very respectfully,

L. H. TAFEL,

One of the authors of The Interlineary Translation of the Sacred Scriptures.

The authority of the above decision will not be questioned, as its author is well known and justly esteemed. And lest any one should say that he is a partizan on my side, it is but just to to say that he is an Orthodox clergyman, well skilled in Oriental languages.

A similar inquiry was made of Bro. S. A. Chaplain, associate editor of the RESTITUTION, a gentleman of fine attainments and unquestioned ability, but of great modesty, whose scholarly analysis was not read at the time of the debate as it would have been open to the objection that he was a partizan. It is, however, now appended, as containing points of interest not brought out in the response of Dr. Tafel.

J. F. WILLCOX.

PLYMOUTH, Ind., April 25, '76.

DEAR BROTHER WILLCOX:

The Hebrew word (abhad) אָבַד occurs in Num. xxi. 30; 2 Kings ix. 8; Job xviii. 18; Job viii. 13; and Job xx. 7.

In Num. xxi. 30, the form is אָבַד of which the grammatical technicality is kal preter. 3. Pers. sin. masc. 2 Kings ix. 8, prefixes ו to the above form, which makes the tense future. Job xviii. 17 is strictly in the past tense but is connected with future constructions in the preceding verses. The Bible Union renders it by the present tense:

"His memory perishes from earth;
And he has no name on the face of the fields."

His-memory-has-perished read all as one word, nearly represents the Hebrew—perished memory, i. e. wholly forgotten. Job viii. 13 is the regular future Kal 3 pers. sin. fem.—form תֹּאבַד The word rendered hypocrite strictly means "polluted," "ungodly," "profane." Bible Union renders—"The hope of the impure shall perish."

Job xx. 7, has the form יֹאבַד kal fut. 3 pers. sin. mas. The Bible Union renders this phrase—"According to his greatness, so shall he perish forever;" but Gesenius sustains King James' version, and refers to 1 Kings xiv. 10 for an explanation of what he calls "a degrading figure of destruction."

Truly, S. A. CHAPLIN.

To Brother Allerton.

Your criticisms have been read. They only need a restatement of the leading positions taken in the article which you evidently did not read critically.

I. In 1 Cor. xv. 12, the issue clearly is, resurrection or no resurrection.

II. In verse 21, the apostle lays down his premise by the unlimited phrase, "Since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead." Then deduced his own legitimate conclusions from this premise, leaving nothing for us but simple faith in what he said. "For as by Adam all die, so by the Anointed also will all be restored to life". Diaglott. 1 Cor. xv. 22:

1. The apostle could not, and surely I cannot, use a stronger or more appropriate word to express ALL, than the word all, the decision of Brothers Malone and others to the contrary notwithstanding.

2. There are, according to the teachings of this same apostle, three classes of living men, and, of course, three classes of dead men. Therefore, if all shall be raised, these three classes of dead must come up. If this brings up the vile persons referred to in Brother Allerton's chaste language, I am not responsible.

In the next verse the apostle divides the all, who will be restored to life by Christ, into different classes, "each in his own rank." The low characters referred to by Brother Allerton, will be raised in their own rank. Christ and those who are his are one rank. This rank, or company, will be raised at the coming of Christ, and (eita) afterward the (telos) end or the rest of the dead when the last enemy, death, shall have been destroyed, which will not be until Christ shall have reigned until he has put down or destroyed all interposing rule and power, the last of which will be death. Of course, when these tyrants shall be destroyed, their enthralled millions, whether living or dead, will be emancipated. Then the rest of the dead will live again.

The apostle has clearly defined the dead to whom he refers, in verses 42, 43, 51 to 57. He says: "And as we have borne the image of the earthy we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." The first personal pronoun we, grammatically stands for Paul and the church at Corinth, and has for its antecedent the noun, dead, qualified by the adjective, the, in verse 42. But that this pronoun represents all Christians, living and dead, is evident from verse 51, in which the apostle says: "Behold, I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed. In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible." The definite adjective, the, points out the dead represented by the pronoun, we.

So, also, in the triumphant song of "Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ." The pronouns, us and our, limit the dead referred to in the 42d verse.

No, Brother Allerton, I rely upon such phrases as "all in the graves," "By Christ will all be restored to life," "By the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life." "The rest of the dead lived not again till the thousand years were finished." "The dead, small and great, stand before God." "The sea, death and hades delivered up the dead in them."

What language could the spirit use to teach universal resurrection if the foregoing does not? If such language can be narrowed down to only represent the smallest minorities, then, indeed, is language powerless to prove anything.

When able men, like some of our reviewers, resort to ridicule, and to impugning the motives of those who may differ from them, they clearly evince a want of confidence in their own arguments. If such would emulate the kind Christian spirit of Brother Allerton and Magruder, it would do them good, and exert a better influence.

Does it follow that because all will have a chance, therefore all will avail themselves of these opportunities? Have all in the past who have heard the gospel obeyed it? Is Brother Malone opposed to giving as many as possible a fair chance now, or in the future age? If so, we had better stop preaching. I am laboring much more extensively than he is to teach men in reference to what they should believe and do to be saved. I cannot remember when I preached on fair chance, but I have a right to preach or write what I believe without incurring the charge of being covertly a Universalist.

Let us have hard arguments, brethren. All who have confidence in our word will understand that we do not believe that a single son or daughter of Adam will be made immortal without having complied with the conditions prescribed in the Word of God

Yours fraternally, J. M. S.

A New Feature in "Sunshine."

There has been some misunderstanding among the readers of "Sunshine" as to the purpose of the valuable papers for "Our Bible Class," prepared monthly by our worthy co-laborer Bro. Westbee. Some have supposed that they were designed for general use in Sunday Schools as "Lesson Papers;" but have, of course, found them too deep for that purpose, and have been compelled to abandon them. We scarcely need to do more than to refer such to the department of "Sunshine" to which they belong. They are only for use in "Our Bible Class." It will be remembered that in the second number of "Sunshine," we expressly stated that we could not at that time take upon us the preparation of "Lesson Papers," nor furnish room in "Sunshine" for them, but at some future time if necessity seemed to demand it. That time seems to have come. Inspired, possibly, by the publication and assistance of our little visitor, more of the children are being gathered into Sunday Schools and the want is felt of Sunday School literature and Sunday School helps as never before. What course of study shall we pursue, and have? is being constantly asked. Shall we adopt any of the "Lesson Papers" now published? Can we safely do so? These and a hundred similar questions show the necessity of the preparation of a course of study for each Sunday in the year for our Sunday School classes old and young; and finding none other willing to assume the direction of the matter, we have cheerfully undertaken it, although it involves much additional labor and study. We shall hereafter then devote one page of "Sunshine" every month to four lessons. They will be arranged both for young pupils and old.

The infant classes taking only a part while the more advanced will master the whole. We design not merely to assist the young in acquiring a knowledge of the Scriptures but to enable them to arrive at a thorough comprehension and mastery of it, especially of those parts that contain the Christian faith and hope. It is not enough to make Bible scholars of the young, we should always aim to so instruct them that they shall "early be wise unto salvation." But we cannot do this unless we make the Christian faith the prominent thing in our instructions. We must remember that the Bible is the vessel only; the Christian faith the precious oil and wine which it contains. They can only "be wise unto salvation, by faith that is in Christ Jesus." In our lessons, therefore, we have began at the foundation of the Christian faith; the promises of God unto the fathers; and shall seek by easy and successive steps to unfold those promises to the minds of the young. The origin and early history of Abram; his call; his journey into the Holy Land and going down into Egypt; with such historical and geographical othnological and theological facts in relation to the nations and countries, rivers and cities mentioned as shall forcibly impress the Bible narrative and the spiritual truths gradually revealed in it, on the mind of the learner; constitute the subject matter of the first four lessons, or the matter for the July number of "Sunshine." From this we shall advance step by step till our work is done.

The method is adopted of putting the lesson into the form of questions and answers, short, simple and easy to memorize, with scripture quotations in full, which the older ones are also expected to master. A reading lesson for the day is indicated, and a series of hints or suggestions to aid the teacher in illustrating or enforcing the lesson is ordered for the benefit of such as need or desire such assistance.

These lessons will be published only in "Sunshine" as a demand for them at first will not be large enough to justify the extra expense of printing in the form of extra sheets. They will be numbered merely—not dated—so that they can be used without inconvenience at any time. This is done so that any Sunday School can change the order of lessons they are now pursuing and adopt the "Sunshine" series and method at their convenience and begin at the beginning without disorder.

It is to be hoped that wherever there is even a small band of our brethren they will gather their own and their neighbor's children together every Sunday and proceed to instruct them into the glorious Gospel of our blessed Saviour. And where they live isolated or alone "Sunshine will still extend a helping hand to aid in the discharge of the much neglected duty of "bringing up" the little ones "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord."

Your fellow laborer for Christ,

J. F. WILCOX.

Certain of the Dead Shall Never Rise.

MR. EDITOR:—One of your correspondents, Jno. O. Branson, in your issue of June 7, asks an explanation of certain scriptures he quotes, from "those who think that such as have heard the gospel of the Kingdom, and who wilfully reject it, will be raised from the dead to be punished and then destroyed."

The enquirer, by quoting the texts cited, seems to imply that his citations, in his opinion, stand opposed to the conclusion that the man who wilfully and knowingly reject the gospel which has been preached to them, will be raised and punished for that rejection. But if J. O. Branson or the reader, will turn to the passages recited—Pro. xxi. 16; Ps. lx. 20; Jer. li. 39; Amos viii. 11-14; 1 John v. 17: he will discover from the context that the text in each case refers not to the knowingly guilty rejectors of God's word, but to the future fate and destiny (of non-resurrection at all) of those who are thus out of the way or means of understanding "of him who sits in places of honor, yet understandeth not," etc., a description entirely inapplicable to those in his premises who have wilfully rejected the gospel, for to do so they must have first heard it.

Now I confess that, like Mr. Branson, I shall be glad if some one, holding the position that all will be raised, and that none shall remain in the congregation of the dead, like Brethren Stephenson, Sweet & Co., should rise to a personal explanation, and show us how such upright and downright and outright authorities as the passages quoted are to be harmonized with their faith in a universal resurrection? Will they please do so—if they can't for, like Mr. Branson, I am most willing to reject the wrong, and accept and defend the truth.

Until taught a more excellent way, I must adhere to God's words, "There shall be a resurrection of the just and the unjust;"—no others in the premises. "They that are out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead." "They are accursed; they shall not rise." "No law, no transgression," and consequently and logically, no reward and no punishment, as to those without law and knowledge.

"Every man (under law) according to his works," and without God and out of Christ there are no good works which God can estimate; for the great Teacher taught, "This is the work of God, that you believe on him whom he has sent."

"They that have sinned without law (the heathen) shall perish without law," and "they that have sinned in the law shall be judged by the law," &c., &c.

Thus we see that Scripture sustains reason; that all men's responsibilities are justly measured by their opportunities. This is right, and like all that comes from God, is "holy, just and good." Amen.

Faithfully submitted.

The Centennial Proposition.

I noted with interest the proposition made by Brother Wagoner, to raise a fund for the distribution of tracts at the Centennial exhibition, with Brother Myers' amendment that a special number of the RESTITUTION be issued for this purpose. I heartily approve of the amendment, but would like to offer a suggestion concerning the distribution of the papers.

The Philadelphia brethren, if requested, would undoubtedly do all in their power for the faithful distribution of these papers; but I am free to confess that, in my opinion, our much esteemed brethren have made a mistake in thinking the city of Philadelphia at this time, a good field for missionary labor. If they could but spend a day in the atmosphere of excitement which surrounds the great exposition, I think they would agree with me that to scatter religious literature among the Centennial throng would be love's labor lost.

It is difficult for one who has been familiar with the exhibition from its first inception to its glorious completion to keep within bounds of excitement; and I can only imagine what would be the effect of the million of flying banners in the streets, the almost daily parades, and the untold wonders of the exhibition on the mind of a stranger. Judging from the condition of my own mind after spending a day among these wonders of the world, I should say that they would be in no mood to be interested in expositions of prophecy, or care to read concerning the nature of man, eternal punishment, or the end of the world.

The experience of evangelists has demonstrated that the country is a much more profitable field for labor than the cities, and the West than the East. As our laborers are but few, would it not be best to send them where the harvest is most plentiful? I would therefore suggest that this "Centennial RESTITUTION" be supplied for free distribution to audiences wherever the word is being proclaimed and I have no doubt but that our preaching brethren would be glad to receive such valuable aid. This would be sowing the seed in good ground; whereas, to distribute them among the promiscuous crowd gathered at the Centennial exposition, would be literally scattering seed by the way-side.

Yours for the spread of truth.

SAMUEL WILSON.

Rome and the Bible.

We distinctly charge Rome with hostility to the free use and circulation of the Bible. Among their converts they reckon sixty tribes of heathen, but nowhere have they translated into their language the Scriptures they go out to preach; or if they have, all notice of the fact has eluded our most diligent search. It seems strange, that out into the midst of sixty different peoples they should so freely go preaching a gospel, but never showing a single copy of the documents.

There is no Papal Bible society, either Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, and all other sects, include this among the objects of their gifts and care; but show us the Papal Bible society! Thousands of infidel patriots, notwithstanding their infidelity, help on the distribution of the Bible for their country's sake; but show us the Papist high in authority who ever does it. Some pious priest in his simplicity may, but where is the bishop that ever has included this in the list of his beneficences? Many earnest petitions for funds go from our land to the Leopold society for crucifixes and images, to scatter among the Indians, but not a penny is bespoken for a Bible to give them.

They oppose Bible reading in the schools—not the Bible that we use alone, but the Douay, as well, is objected to. In the edition of 1840, approved by four bishops, is the admonition to men not to read it, without permission from their spiritual guide—not ignorant men only, but even "men accomplished in all kinds of learning" are warned away. Washington, Marshall, Franklin, must not read! This is not in the edition of Naples, or of Lisbon, with 1849 marked in the title-page, but of Philadelphia, in 1840. Other peoples' Bibles, of course, they do not less oppose. Pope Leopold III. warns all men against Bible societies, and quotes Pius VII. to the same effect. Gregory XVI. was in sorrow, night and day, on account of them. Poor old man! made sad by the growing universality of the diffusion of God's word! The ruling Pope is no more favorably disposed. He speaks of the insidious measures of the Bible distributors, and regrets the recent improvements in the art of printing, which so greatly increase the facilities of the distributors of the Scriptures among other dangerous books. The council of Trent, the highest authority of the Romish church, is very guarded in allowing the reading of the Scriptures to learned laymen at the bishop's dictation.—Church Union.

Armageddon.

COMMUNICATED.

The night of the Gentile again shall descend
On the fold of the Lord at the time of the end;
The legions of earth shall be marshaled again,
And come like a cloud that will cover the plain.

And the navies of earth will be ruling the seas,
With banners defiant aloft in the breeze;
And the sound of the trumpet will call from afar
To the prancing of steeds and the chariots of war.

All the powers of the earth from the line to the pole
Will gather in phalanx under Satan's control:
In the pride of his heart, and with insolent boast,
Apollyon will lead in the van of that host.

With great swelling words he will curse the Most High,
And, with impious taunt, his power will defy;—
At the height of his boasting the Lord will look down,
And cast on his pride a withering frown.

And the might of the Lord shall against him prevail,
And scatter his legions with tempest and hail;
By the fire of his eye, and the blast of his breath,
That host will be scattered and withered in death.

And the might of the Gentile no more will be known,
And the king of the ages will sit on the throne;
And the banner of peace to the nations unfurled;
And the glory of God shall fill the whole world.

The Parliamentary elections in Belgium have gone in favor of the Ministry. The Roman Catholic majority in the Chamber of Representatives will be twelve instead of fourteen as before.

The result of the election was the occasion of riotous proceedings in various cities. The streets of Brussels, the evening after, were filled with crowds of people hissing and hooting in front of the Catholic institutions, which were protected by bodies of the Civic Guards. At Ghent the mob made a monster demonstration before the Catholic Club, and broke the windows of the building. At Antwerp there was intense excitement over the success of the Catholic candidates. Fighting was going on in all parts of the town. The Civic Guards were called out and several arrests made.

The disturbances were renewed at Antwerp the next day. Many thousands marched through the streets shouting "Down with the Ministers." The mob attacked and wrecked a Catholic institute. The gendarmes charged upon the rioters, and several persons were wounded. A number of arrests have been made

LONDON, June 24.—The Daily News publishes a letter from its Constantinople correspondent, dated June 16, giving the details of the atrocities committed in Bulgaria by Bashi Bazouks' Turkish irregular troops. The writer says that all movable property has been plundered, houses and villages burned, and all men, women and children indiscriminately slaughtered. It is estimated that the province which heretofore yielded to the government an annual revenue of $4,000,000 will not pay one quarter of that sum this year, or for years to come. Various estimates place the number of lives sacrificed at from 18,000 to 30,000. The correspondent names 37 villages known to have been destroyed. Among the refugees, the number of whom is very small, there is not a girl over ten years of age. In the village of Gemstitza, district of Philippopolis, fifteen hundred persons are known to have been killed. This village consisted of four hundred houses and was prosperous and peaceful. Every house has been burned and all the inhabitants killed except a few women and children, who took refuge in Philippopolis, and some women who were carried off by Bashi Bazouks. These cruelties have made a great impression at Constantinople, and the English embassador has intervened with the government to put an end to them.

Iowa Quarterly Conference.

The quarterly conference of the Church of God, in Iowa, assembled as per previous notice, on Thursday evening, June 8th, 1876, at the Rock Creek Center school house, Jasper county, Iowa, at which time Bro. J. T. Prime preached on the Christian's Hope. On Friday morning Bro. Webb preached; subject, Man's Future State. At 4 o'clock Bro. Prime again addressed the people. Saturday, at 10 o'clock, meeting opened by singing, and prayer by Bro. A. F. Dugger, after which Bro. A. J. Eychaner, preached from Matt. v. 5. Brethren VanMeter, Winchester, and Milton Eychaner, were chosen as a committee of arrangements, and conference adjourned until 3 o'clock, for conference business.

At 3 o'clock, convened as per adjournment, Bro. J. T. Prime in the chair; the following resolution was offered, and, after being fully discussed, was unanimously adopted, viz:

Resolved, That we believe the differences between the conference of the Church of God, in Iowa, and the Advent Union Christian conference of Iowa, are principally in name and not in faith, and, as we believe in but one body, we earnestly desire the union of all that believe and obey the Gospel; therefore, be it

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to take such steps as may seem to them best to bring the subject before the Advent Union Christian conference at its next meeting in August, and report the results at our September meeting. Brethren J. T. Prime, R. J. Hill, and A. J. Eychaner, were chosen by vote as said committee.

Committee on arrangements report that Bro. Dugger preach this evening, and Bro. Webb, followed by Bro. Aulls, at 10 o'clock to-morrow; Bro. Prime at 4 o'clock, and Bro. A. J. Eychaner in the evening; after which business was adjourned until 9 o'clock Sunday morning, and a social meeting engaged in, which was well enjoyed by those present.

In the evening Bro. Dugger preached on the Restitution of all things, spoken of by the Prophets; giving a masterly exposition of this important subject, and was ably followed by Bro. A. J. Eychaner. On account of a heavy rain during the night, the brethren did not get together until time for preaching, and conference business was layed over; and Bro. Webb preached from Psalm lxxii. 7, and was followed by Bro. Dugger as a substitute for Bro. Aulis.

At 2 o'clock, convened to finish business; on motion, it was decided to hold the annual conference at West Irving, Tama county, Iowa, beginning on the evening of the 21st of September, 1876, and holding over Sunday; after which the minutes of this meeting were read and approved, and the secretary requested to furnish a copy of the same to the RESTITUTION for publication. On motion conference adjourned to meet at the time and place above stated. At 2:30 o'clock, Pro. Prime preached; subject, "Preach the Word." This subject was handled in an able manner, showing the brother to be an earnest student of the Word. This subject was continued by Bro. Eychaner in an able and eloquent manner, after which we repaired to the water, and Bro. William Eychaner was baptized into the Christ.

At 8 o'clock in the evening, Bro. A. J. Eychaner preached on the subjects of Salvation, and the Resurrection, receiving the closest attention, and we trust sowed some of the good seed that will bring forth fruit. At 9 o'clock Monday, the beautiful stream called Rock Creek, was again visited, and Sisters Aulls and VanMeter were buried in the likeness of Christ's death, arose, we trust, to walk in newness of life. Thus ended our conference, which we trust, has been both pleasant and profitable to all present.

Conference Report.

PINE CREEK, Mich., June 13th, 1876.

BRO. H. V. REED: I have the pleasure of transmitting herewith a brief report of the late annual Conference for publication in the RESTITUTION:

The nineteenth annual Conference meeting of Michigan commenced on Thursday at 7 o'clock p. m., June 1st, 1876, at the school house near Bro. E. Miller's in Mendon township, St. Joseph county. Exercises opened by singing and prayer. Introductory discourse by Bro. E. Hoyt, subject, the Signs of the Times, pertaining to the restoration of Israel, from Romans xi. 25-28.

Friday morning we met at 9 o'clock for a social meeting of an hour and a half. A goodly number of the brethren and sisters were present, and nearly all gave testimony concerning their faith in the "Gospel of the Kingdom." Bros. E. Hoyt, E. Miller and D. F. Spencer were appointed a committee of arrangements.

Bro. G. M. Myers, from Plymouth, Ind., being present, was requested to speak at half past ten o'clock which he did, from Daniel II. relative to the second coming of Christ and the setting up of his Kingdom.

Bro. H. R. Kendall, lately from the Christian church (comparatively a stranger here) being with us, was called upon to speak at 1 o'clock p. m., which he very ably did from Luke vi. 47-48., relating to our works. At 5 o'clock p. m., Bro. Myers again occupied the time in speaking from Mark xvi. 14-15-16. Saturday morning at 9 o'clock after singing and prayer we proceeded to business. First was the read'ng of Secretary Hoyt's and Treasurer Miller's reports which was accepted. Next the Evangelists; (E. Hoyt, J. A. Simonds and E. Miller) reports were called for. The work reported as having been done was but little. A report from the churches was next in order, but very few were represented, and of those only two or three reported as being in anything like an organized or prosperous condition.

Next was the election of officers, which resulted in the choice of E. Chesebrough, President, Pine Creek, Calhoun county. D. F. Spencer, Secretary, Pine Creek, Calhoun county. W. H. Knapp, Treasurer, Galesburg, Kalamazoo county.

The following brethren were elected as Executive Committee, viz: E. Hoyt, E. Miller, J. A. Simonds, A. Graves, B. Woodward, L. S. Bronson, A. Babcock, Wm. McCrodon.

A recess of thirty minutes, meeting again at 1 o'clock. Preaching by Bro. Simonds. Subject, Christian Fellowship from 1st John, i. 3. At the close of this discourse a goodly number went to the water a distance of about three miles where five intelligent young believers put on Christ by baptism, two brothers and three sisters. Commenced again at 5 o'clock, listened to, Bro. Hoyt, from John xvii. 21-22, urging the necessity of Christian Union.

Sunday morning at 9 o'clock we came together for a social meeting for an hour and a half. There was a good deal of interruption on account of the multitude assembling, as more facilities for seating had to be provided. When the time for preaching arrived, (half past ten) the house was filled to overflowing, notwithstanding good order prevailed. Bro. Myers preached upon the creation of man from Gen. ii. 7. Man's transgression and punishment. Gen. iii. latter part, also his redemption from 1st. Cor. xv.

After a few minutes recess came to order at 1 o'clock p. m. Bro. Kendall discoursed upon the prophecies concerning Christ from Numbers xxiv. 16-19. Bro. Myers preached at 5 o'clock from Romans vi. commencing with the 20th verse and ending with the chapter, showing conclusively the the death on account of disobedience to God's laws is cessation of life instead of a moral or spiritual death as is generally claimed.

After the discourse the congregation was dismissed the brotherhood remained and partook of the Lord's Supper which was observed with due solemnity. This concluded the exercises of the conference. Good order, good attendance and a good feeling generally prevailed throughout the meeting.

The executive board engaged with Bro. H. R. Kendall, of Galesburg, Kalamazoo, county, to labor as an Evangelist during the present summer. Bro. Kendall is a live, energetic defender of the truth, and never fails to awaken an interest wherever he preaches. It is hoped that the brethren throughout the state will make an effort to secure a place for him in their vicinity to preach. Address him as above.

D. F. SPENCER, Secretary.

Correspondence

I have no faith in the Fair Grames, or Universalism. "Whose end is destruction." "They who have sinned without law, shall perish without law." Or, in other words, God is under no obligation to save me or anybody, except through that gracious and merciful provision he has seen fit to make. "The tares are to be burned." Redemption is not complete. Men in the flesh will have right to the tree of life by keeping the commands of God.

The Lamb of God will take away the sin of the world, and restore men in the flesh so they will be able to keep his law. He will take away the stony heart, and give them a heart of flesh, and they shall keep his statutes and do them. The man Christ Jesus is the model man. CHAS. BOARDMAN.

DEAR BRO. REED:—Being requested by brethren to make a report of my proceedings, during my evangelical labors this spring, I will state, that, I left home on the 12th of May, and went to Wheatland, Hicoy county, Mo., preached at Brethren Crawford's, Scott's, Dent's, and at Wheatland, and at Wablow; found the brethren alive to the good work; baptized Sisters Brown and Butcher; preached thirteen discourses, and started on my return home, came to Red Hill on the 9th of June, and found Bro. Steri Simmons dead; was requested to preach a funeral discourse, which I did on Saturday at 2 o'clock, from Job xiv. There was a large concourse of people, and he was mourned for by those that were not brethren, as much as by those that were. He was universally esteemed by those who knew him best. He left a wife and four small children to mourn his loss; but they sorrow not as those which have no hope. May the time soon come when we shall be allowed to see his face in the kingdom of God. From Red Hill started again for home; paid Bro. Butt a visit, found all well but his daughter, who has been confined to her bed for eight weeks.

I have been attending several quarterly conferences, preparatory to our annual conference for Arkansas and south-west Missouri, which is to begin on the 15th of September, at 10 o'clock a. m., about ten miles south-east of Fayettville, Washington county, Ark., on the main fork of White river, and we desire that the ministry of Missouri and Arkansas be represented by Bro. James Butt, of Lawrence county, Mo., and that he open the conference by a declaration of the principles of our faith, and close it with a discourse on practical Christianity. Brethren everywhere are cordially invited to attend. Ample provisions will be made to accommodate all that visit us. Come brethren, one and all, and let us have a good time. Delegates from Wheatland, Mo., are, Josh Kidwell, Sam Dent, B. Scott, Tho. Crawford.

GEO. KIDWELL.

DIED.

EVANS—May 30, 1876, James A. son of D. D. and C. Evans, aged 17 years and 9 months.

He was born on January 11, 1859, by H. V. Lyon. His disease was catarrhal fever, ending in death after nine days.

BILLOWS—Sister Sarah A. Brown, after a long illness fell asleep in Jesus on the 10th day of June, 1876, aged nearly 60 years.

She was faithful member of the Church of God that meets in Forest View, in Warren county, Indiana. She leaves two sons, a daughter and other friends to mourn her loss. But they sorrow not as those that have no hope.

She will be missed both in the family circle and in the church. Thus as time flies, Death claims its victims. There can be no exemption till he comes whose right it is to reign. Then, if faithful, we shall meet her and others who have gone before.

In hope, WM. T. EVANS.

BUSINESS DEPARTMENT.

Put Your Name on this List.

Recently quite a number of brethren have concluded that an easy and effectual way to get the truth before the minds of the people is to send them the RESTITUTION for three months. This is a good device. It is almost impossible for the paper to be received and read by any household for three months without its making an impression upon their minds for good. So send on your names and money. We hope to have a goodly number report. The following is a List of those we already have above referred to:

In view of the great work before us, and that this is the great year among the American people, it has been deemed wise by some of our brethren to have a general distribution of tracts at Philadelphia. Some have already responded to the suggestion. Let every one do his or her duty in this direction. Tracts will be forwarded as soon as we get enough responses to the suggestion. Let all act at once.

THE
AMERICAN CYCLOPEDIA.
A Comprehensive Library in Itself.

A Great National Enterprise in which every American may Take Pride.

Published by D. APPLETON & CO., 549, 551, Broadway, N. Y.

The Cyclopedia, now in course of publication, is entirely rewritten, and appears with about 4,000 maps and illustrations. To be completed in sixteen volumes of 800 pages each. Fourteen volumes now ready.

In the experience of book making and selling, this work is without a parallel. With the multiplication of steam presses, the publishers are still unable to meet the demand.

The sale has already reached over 300,000 volumes, and this in panic times! The demand for the work is but fairly commenced; the orders are largely multiplying and the indications are that the sales of the work for 1876 will greatly surpass those of the previous year.

Thus the most sanguine expectations of the publishers are more than realized.

The publishers again repeat to the public that no expense has been spared in the writing, editing, or publishing departments of the American Cyclopedia.

The cost will be more than $300,000 to prepare the sixteen volumes for the press.

SOLD ONLY BY SUBSCRIPTION.

BOOKS.

Cruden's Concordance to the Bible. Of course no student of God's Word can do without it. Cloth bound, $1.50; sheep, $2 25, half calf $3 75.

Greek Concordance. A Critical Greek and English Concordance of the New Testament, by C. F. Hudson. This is a work of 566 pages, sufficiently small to be made a constant companion, by one travelling. Every minister and Bible student ought to possess a copy. Price, cloth, $2 50.

Eagle's Flight, with marginal readings and references between the verses. They are printed on clear, strong paper, and well bound. Plain cloth binding, gilt edges, $1 50. Full Turkey Morocco, gilt edges, $5. Another one, with larger type, beautifully printed and easily read by failing eyes. Roan binding, $4 75. Turkey Morocco, $6 00.

The Doctrine of Immortality. By James H. Whitemore. This is a work that has been in market several years. But it is an exhaustive treatise upon the subject of Immortality, and sets forth the Bible view in a masterly manner. Every student should have it in his library for reference as well as use in teaching to those who are feeling after truth. It contains 360 pages. Paper covers, 40 cents.

Emphatic Diaglott containing the original Greek Text of what is commonly styled the New Testament, according to the Recension of Dr. B. F. Griesbach, with interlineary word for word English translation; a new Emphatic Version, based on the interlineary translation, on the renderings of eminent critics, and on the various readings of the Vatican Manuscript, No. 1209 in the Vatican Library, together with illustrative and explanatory foot notes, and a copious selection of references, to the whole of which is added a valuable alphabetical appendix. 853 pages. In muslin, bound neatly in muslin. Price $4. Extra binding, $5.

Here and There a Gem.

BY SARAH HOCHNEY.

Must the old joys be evermore withholden?
Even their memory keeps me pure and true;
And yet, from out Jerusalem the Golden,
God speaketh, saying, "I make all things new."

"Father," I cry, "the old must still be dearer;
Stifle my love, or give me back the past!
Give me the fair old earth, whose paths are dearer
Than all thy shining streets and mansions vast."

Peace, peace,—the Lord of earth and heaven knoweth
The human soul in all its heat and strife;
Out of his throne no stream of Lethe floweth
But the clear river of eternal life.

He giveth life, ay, life in all its sweetness,
Old loves, old songs, old memories to restore;
Only the curse of sin and incompleteness
Shall faint in the new earth and vex thine heart no more.

Primitive Christian Faith.

That the Christians of the three centuries after Christ were premillennialists, in their faith, is incontrovertible. Gibbon in his history of the decline and fall of Rome, says: "The assurance of such a Millennium was carefully inculcated by a succession of fathers, from Justin Martyr and Irenæus, who conversed with the immediate disciples of the Apostles, down to Lactantius, who was preceptor to the son of Constantine. It appears to have been the reigning sentiment of orthodox believers, and contributed in a very essential degree to the progress of the Christian faith." In the light of this declaration we may understand to a very great extent, in what "the apostacy" consists, as pre-announced by Paul to the church at Thessalonica. (2 Eph. 2:1.) Chillingworth says, "It was believed and taught by the most eminent fathers of that age next to the Apostles, and opposed by none."

When controverting Romanism he says: "That this doctrine is by the present Romish church held false and heritical, I think no man will deny. That the same doctrine was by the church of the next age after the Apostles held true and Catholic (universal,) I prove by these two reasons: First, whatever doctrine is believed and taught by the most eminent fathers of any age of the church, and by none of their cotemporaries opposed or condemned, that is to be esteemed the Catholic doctrine of the church of those times; but the doctrine of the Millennium was believed and taught by the most eminent fathers of the age next after the Apostles, and by none of that age next after the Apostles, opposed or condemned; therefore, it was the Catholic doctrine of those times. Second, whatever doctrine is taught by the fathers of any age, not as doctors, but as witnesses of the tradition of the church, that is, not as their own opinion, but as the doctrine of the church of their time, neither did any contradict them in it; Ergo, it is undoubtedly to be so esteemed." Again he says "It appears manifest that this doctrine was in the judgment of Irenæus, Apostolic tradition." (By tradition is meant doctrine, as by Paul in 1 Cor. 11:2. 2 Thess. 2:15. 2 Tim. 2:2.)

Justin Martyr (a Greek writer, born in A. D. 89 and converted 133-3, and writing from 140 to 160 A. D. in his "Dialogue with Trypho," the Jew, says: "Those are destitute of just reason who do not understand that which is clear from all the Scriptures, (the Old Testament writings,) that two comings of Christ are announced," placing the Millenium beyond the first resurrection, and in the restitution of all things, quoting Isa. 65: particularly v. 17, 18 and 19, with other prophecies in proof. He says, "I am not such a wretch, Trypho, as to say one thing and mean another. I have confessed to thee, that I and many others, are of their (the christians,) opinion, (on the Millenial reign.) So we hold it to be thoroughly proved that it will come to pass. But those of that race of Christians who follow not godly and pure doctrine, do not acknowledge it," for I have demonstrated that these are indeed called Christian, but are atheists and impious heretics, because that in all things they teach what is blasphemous, ungodly, and unsound. If, therefore, you fall in with certain who are called Christians, who confess not this truth, but dare to blaspheme the God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, in that day there is no resurrection of the dead, but that immediately when they die, their souls are received up into Heaven. Avoid and esteem them not Christians. But I, and whatsoever Christians are orthodox (sound in the faith) in all things, do know that there will be a resurrection of the flesh, and a thousand years in the city of Jerusalem, built, adorned and enlarged according to the prophets. Moreover, a certain man among us, whose name is John, being one of the twelve Apostles of Christ, in that revelation which was shown to him, prophesied that those who believe in Christ, should live a thousand years in Jerusalem; and after that there would be a general, and in a word, an universal resurrection of every individual person, when all should arise together with an everlasting state and future judgment." Of Justin, Milner finds him. Dr. Burnett calls him "a witness beyond all exception." Dr. Elliott says, "testimony to his learning and piety has been borne by nearly all the succeeding Fathers." Dr. Adam Clark says, "he abounds in sound, solid sense, the the product of an acute and well cultivated mind." He was martyred at Rome, A. D. 163 or 165, by decapitation. Eusebuis Eccl. Hist. But, Rome was not in the habit of killing any except those, for "the word of God, and the testimony of Jesus."

Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons, about A. D. 178, was a staunch believer in, and teacher of, this doctrine. (We would like to quote largely from him, as a witness near the Apostles, but our space will not permit.) He was a pupil to, and trained up under the tutorage of Papias and Polycarp, both of whom were disciples of John the Revelator. "This," says Burnett, "goes to the fountain head." Irenæus says, "that certain heretical opinions had arisen, proceeding from ignorance of the arrangements of God, and the mystery of the resurrection and Kingdom of the just; and it therefore became needful to speak of them. He then proceeds to show that the covenant of the inheritance, made to Abraham and his seed, refers to Christ and the church, and not having received it during the whole time he lived in it, it is necessary that he should receive it, together with his seed, in the resurrection of the just, and reign in it." He sustains this position by many quotations from the Old Testament. (That the mode of applying and expounding Scripture in those primitive times of the church may be seen in our day, we give his texts bearing on this subject in his own order. Isa. 26:19. Ezk. 37:12-14, and 38:25-25. Jer. 23:7-8. Isa. 30:25-26 and 58:14. Luke 12:37-40. Rev. 20:5. Isa. 6:11. Dan. 7:27. Jer. 31:10-15. Isa. 51:3 and 52:1 and 54:11-14, also Isa. 65:18-20. He was beheaded A. D. 203-5.)

Daniel Whitby, D. D. (A. D. 1672,) was the author and originator of what he himself, calls a "Sure Hypothesis," i. e. the "frost millenial theory, of a Spiritual coming" of Christ and the conversion of the world, during the "thousand years," anterior to Christ's personal coming. He gives nevertheless good testimony for pre-millennialism in the words following: "The doctrine of the Millenium, or the reign of saints on earth a thousand years, is now rejected by all Roman Catholics, and the greatest part of Protestants, and yet it passed among the best of Christians for two hundred and fifty years for a tradition Apostolical; and as such is delivered by many Fathers of the second and third century, who spake of it as the tradition of our Lord and his Apostles, and of all the ancients that lived before them; who tell us the very words in which it was delivered, the Scriptures, which were then so interpreted, and say that it was held by all Christians who were exactly orthodox." This admission is most fatal to the doctor's own theory, for if, as he allows, it was an "Apostolical tradition," it was most undeniably sound doctrine, was truth, and if so then, is so now, and will be so forevermore. The True Nature of Mind.

Mind, The intellectual power in man; understanding; opinion; notion; will; disposition; to heed; to care for or for other; such intransitive, to be inclined, or disposed.—Webster.

There now remains to be disposed of in some way, the question as to the true nature and reality of mind. I am forced to differ widely from the great physiologists who pretend to know so much about soul. Most people, following, in part, early instruction, and revelation, in part spiritual manifestations, and in part trusting in their own consciousness, hold that the human mind is a spiritual substance, which is associated with the body during the life of the body in this world, and which remains in existence after the death of the body, and forms the spiritual clothing or embodiment of the immortal soul, and that the individual lives on after death as a spirit in the human form; that of this spiritual man the soul is the essential being, of which may be predicated a good or evil nature, while the mind which clothes it as a body consists of the spiritual substances, affections and thoughts which it cherished and formed during the natural life. Together with the above convictions respecting themselves, most people when thinking independently of theological sublimations, feel willing to admit that animals have in common with them fewer or more natural affections and thoughts, which make up their mind, but the inner and immortal soul, which would retain them as a part of an individual after death of the body, is not possessed by the beasts that perish.

In short the vast majority of mankind when thinking quietly, and especially in seasons of bereavement, feel well assured of the real and substantial existence of the human mind, independent of its temporary association with the perishable body.

But in antagonism to this simple and comforting faith, stand theological incomprehensibilities on the one hand, and scientific skepticism on the other. The former would have us believe that the soul is a mere vapor, a cloud of something ethereal, of which can be expected nothing more useful than floating around the throne, while the latter asks us to recognize the existence of nothing which the eye can not see, and the finger can not touch; to cease imagining that there is a soul, and to regard the mind as the product of the brain, secreted thereby as the liver secretes the bile.

Let us hear what the two great leading nervous physiologysts have to say upon this subject:

"The brain is not, strictly speaking, the organ of the mind, for this statement would imply that the mind exists as a force independent of brain, but the mind is produced by the brain substance; intellectual force, if we may term the intellect a force; can be produced only by transmutation of a certain amount of matter. There can be no intelligence without brain substance."—Flint.

"The mind may be regarded as a force, the result of nervous action, and characterized by the ability to preserve sensations, to be conscious, to understand, to experience emotions, and to will in accordance therewith. Of these qualities, consciousness resides exclusively in the brain, but the others, as is chiefly shown by observation and experiment, cannot be restricted to that organ; but are developed with more or less intensity in other parts of the nervous system."—Hammond.

Thus do the two extremes of theology and science meet upon a common ground of dreamy emptiness, and we, who confess our comparative ignorance, are comforted by the thought that some other things have been hid from the wise and prudent, and revealed unto babes. Yet, while feeling thus, it must be admitted that the existence of spirit, and a Creator, do not yet seem capable of logical demonstration; the denial of their existence is not incompatible with a profound acquaintance with material forms and their operations; and, on the other hand, the belief in their existence and substantial nature, and in their forms, as first causes, have never interfered with the recognition of so-called material forces, and of the organisms through which they are manifested, at present, at least; these are purely matters of faith; but although the spiritualist, using the term in its broadest sense, as indicating a belief in spirits, may feel that his faith discloses a beauty and perfection in the union otherwise imperceptible by him, we find no support for any Bible doctrine of immortal souls of dead men ever coming back or holding communion with the living; but, as we will show from physiology that man is a unit, let us see what the Psalmist says about man:

"Man dieth, his breath goeth forth. He returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish."

"The dead know not anything. Praise the Lord while thou art living, for there is no knowledge or wisdom whither thou goest."

"While I live I will praise the Lord. I will sing praises unto thee while I have my being."

This was the teaching of David. Let us look at man. We can view man at almost any standpoint. We look at the chemical man. We see him in his solidity and strength: we place him on the scales, and suppose his weight is one hundred and forty pounds. Now, who would think of this identical man is a standing body of water, with a few pounds of solid substance? It is even so. Seventy per centum of him is water; and if we analyze him we will find one hundred parts of water, and only thirty-nine parts of solid substance; if we burn him, we will get a few ashes; the rest has been evaporated, and if we have not the man, we have not brain or thought.

First, I will show that thought is dependent on the brain. The third function of the brain is thought. In what manner the brain acts when one thinks, we may, perhaps, never know; and yet we are certain that it is the instrument of thought, as we know its connection with sensation and motion. Compression of the brain suspends consciousness and thought. As the brain and spinal cord is considered as a single organ, performing at least three independent functions:

1. It is the source, either directly or indirectly, of all muscular motion.
2. It is the seat of sensation.
3. It is the organ of thought.

To suppose that the power of thought belongs alone to man, is perhaps the most common mistake on this subject. There is unmistakable evidence that the inferior animals think, and that in them the power of thought is more or less perfect, according to the degree of brain development. M. C.

The First Dominion.

What is it? Some expositors say it is the dominion God gave to Adam—the whole world. If it is, to whom will it be restored? Let Micah answer. "And thou, O, tower of the flock, (or Adar, marrying), the stronghold of the daughter Zion, unto thee shall it come, even the first dominion; the kingdom shall come to the daughter of Jerusalem,"—the Church, God's people whom he foreknew, whom Paul said he had not cast away. "In that day saith the Lord, I will assemble her that halteth, and I will gather her that is driven out, and her that I have afflicted; and I will make her that halted a remnant, and her that was far off a strong nation; and the Lord shall reign over them in Mount Sion from henceforth even forever."

We think we have the word of the Lord to establish the fact, that the first kingdom ever established for God's people, was the Kingdom of Israel. And God watched over them, and blessed them above all the nations of the earth, until they rebelled against him so much, that he afflicted them in many ways; and at last he broke them up, by giving them into the hands of their enemies; the Gentiles, and they were carried away captive among all nations, and Jerusalem, their place of worship, has been desecrated by the most barbarous nations of earth, and will continue to be until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled.

When Israel refused to obey the Lord, and wanted a king, he gave them a king in his anger, and took him away in his wrath. Saul, the son of Kish, was their first king; and he was so wicked he was slain by his own sword. Then God chose David, the son of Jesse; and he was anointed king, and reigned over Israel forty years. When he died, Solomon, his son, reigned in his stead. Have they not had many kings, and the last one was a very wicked one. God said unto him, "Thou wicked and profane Prince of Israel whose end is come, Thus saith the Lord God, remove the diadem, take off the Crown; this shall not be the same. Exalt him that is low, abase him that is high. I will overturn, overturn, overturn it, and it shall be no more until he come whose right it is, and I will give it him."

God made promise to Mary, of the lineage of David, that she should have a son, and should call his name Jesus, —he shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end. His disciples asked Jesus: "Wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel."

1. They knew the Lord had promised to restore the kingdom to them, and they believed it, and I believe he will, for his promise can never fail. Though heaven and earth should pass away, yet not one jot or tittle of his word can fail until it is all fulfilled.

Now we will see what Ezekiel says about it, or the Lord by the mouth of that Prophet. "And say unto them thus saith the Lord God, Behold I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land. And I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all; and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all. And David my servant shall be king over them; and they all shall have one shepherd; they shall also walk in my judgments, and observe my statutes, and do them. And they shall dwell in the land I have given unto Jacob my servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt; and they shall dwell therein, even they, and their children, and their children's children forever; and my servant David shall be their Prince forever. Moreover I will make a covenant of peace with them; it shall be an everlasting covenant with them, and multiply them, and will set my sanctuary in the midst of them forevermore. My tabernacle also shall be with them; yea, I will be their God, and they shall be my people. And the heathen shall know that I the Lord do sanctify Israel when my sanctuary shall be in the midst of them forevermore."

Now these were God's covenanted people, and God has special blessings in reserve for them on that account. But we are Gentiles; the wild olive tree, and are grafted in the good olive tree by faith. Then let us be careful that we do not boast against the natural branches, lest we be broken off. I want to be among the hundred and forty and four thousand, and all the redeemed hosts of God's elect on Mount Sion, whither they will return with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads, and sorrow and sighing will forever flee away. I am looking for that glorious day, when Jesus will say "Come my weary ones and drink of the River of Life and thirst no more." An old pilgrim seventy-one years old.

LYDIA WHITAKER.

An Open Letter to Elder U. Smith.

SIR:—From time to time your brethren here have loaned me your writings upon The Sanctuary, and Two Thousand Three Hundred Days, (literally, Heb. evening morning), "then shall the sanctuary be cleansed" (or justified).

Now I understand you affirm that "the sanctuary to be cleansed, is in heaven, where Jesus now is." But why do you make the above affirmation without giving one "Thus saith the Lord," for proof? For I think any one reading Dan. viii. 11-14, must come to the conclusion that the sanctuary to be cleansed in verse 14 is the identical one cast down and trodden under foot, as found in verses 11 and 13. And the two thousand three hundred days was the answer to the question—how long? Hence there is but one sanctuary alluded to by the angel to Daniel, or one saint speaking. And from the time of giving both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot, until the same identical sanctuary shall be cleansed, will be 2,300 days—not years as you believe.

Let us compare "shall be cleansed," with "thou shalt be clean." 2 Kings v. 10. Was Naaman cleansed when he had dipped seven times, or was that the commencement of the tedious process of cleansing? v. 14. So in like manner, when the 2,300 days are ended, the sanctuary shall be cleansed —not just commenced, as you desire to have it. Now, if Jehovah had wished Daniel to understand those days to be years, he would have said so, as in Numbers xiv. 34. Hence I believe those days are literal ones, in not giving any "private interpretation," as Peter forbids it.

You write of "Christ going from the holy place into the most holy place," even to specify the year—1844—without giving one shadow of proof for making such an assertion. Now if Jesus was made a priest after the order of Aaron he would necessarily do as Aaron did. But that is not as Paul writes. Hear him: "What further need that another priest should arise after the order of Melchisedek, and not be called after the order of Aaron?" Heb. vii. 14. So if I have your premise correct, it is that "Christ is now in heaven, and cleansing the sanctuary spoken of in Daniel viii. 14." Then you assume the position that I fail to find the least intimation of in all the Scriptures! Why? Because the sanctuary to be cleansed in Daniel viii. 14 must be the one cast down in verse 11, and the identical one trodden under foot in verse 13; and "what God hath joined together, let no man put asunder." There can be no allusion to the sanctuary in heaven being cast down, let alone being cleansed, as you believe.

Paul, in describing that which is called the sanctuary, has the second vail between the sanctuary and that which is called the holiest of all. So if Jesus is now in the holiest of all, it would, to my mind, be mere assumption upon your part to say Jesus is now in the sanctuary found in Daniel viii. 14. And for you to affirm or assert so, without one text of Scripture, I must treat the declaration as I do the one so popular, "the soul is immortal."

I do not doubt your sincerity in the sanctuary question at all; yet I believe that if you will read Daniel viii. once more, you may be able to find that the sanctuary to be cleansed is the one cast down and trodden under foot, and the only one alluded to by the angel in delivering God's message to Daniel.

I am sincerely, your friend, in hope of eternal life,

S. S. HAYDEN.

The Fair Chance.

BRO. REED:—It is with no small concern that I have looked upon the communications in your paper, upon such unpractical subjects as the Fair Chance Theory, Universal Salvation, and such like. It reminds one of the great expenditure of logic, in former times among the school-men, in the debate of similarly useless points; such, for instance, as the question: "How many angels could stand on the point of a cambric needle?"

We are told in the works on Metaphysics, written in our days, that until Lord Bacon turned the labors of philosophers into a profitable direction and on fruitful subjects of enquiry such speculations as the above absorbed their time and attention, and elicited the warmest debates. Suppose we could know certainly, whether those who have lived before us would have a fair chance for salvation, how could it affect our actions? They are beyond the influence of our exertions certainly. If Noah, instead of preaching God's promise, or offer them made to men, had preached about "the Gospel of the Kingdom, and the baptism" to be instituted "for the remission of sins."—In the future age,—he would have lost the opportunity of saving himself and family, and have failed to bear testimony to the cause he pleaded. If our brethren do not forbear to expend the precious time given them in such, at best, idle and unpractical enquiries, may they not be found unready for the emergencies which await them?

Our Lord said, "The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light." It seems still to be the case in our day. I will give an instance of it. It is not customary, I think, among our brethren—for them—("the children of light") to attend the ministrations of the sects whom we shall call "the children of darkness," but circumstances, a week or two since, called me to one of their churches where I heard a sermon, of which I would like to give you a sketch, that you may see if it be not a picture of the Fair Chance that is more within the scope of present action than the other theory now known by that name.

The text was from 2 Peter i. 10, in these words: "Make your calling and election sure, etc., for so an abundant entrance shall be ministered unto you into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." The preacher proceeded to say, that a man's business was sometimes called his calling, medicine, Law, manufacturing, etc., but that such was not the Scriptural sense of the word "calling." It was easy to see by the context. The Scriptures meant by that word the work a man has, no matter in what avocation he may be engaged, to add to his faith virtue, and to virtue, knowledge, and to knowledge temperance, and to temperance, patience, and to patience, godliness, and to godliness, brotherly kindness, and to brotherly kindness, charity."

He dwelt at length upon the difficulty of this calling, upon the engrossment of all the powers of a man, which it required to accomplish it, the great importance of winning, and the sad misfortune of losing the race. He held before them the great reward offered, "if ye do these things, ye shall never fall." He did not spend his time in endeavoring to show that if they should fail they would have another chance. Peter had not done so, and he did not do so; but he bade them spend all their time and expend all their energies on making sure of this present chance. If our brethren would embrace the opportunity before them, by preaching, by the Sunday School, by a godly walk and conversation, in improving their present chance, they would do more wisely than in dreaming of chances for others past or coming. This is the Fair Chance. No other deserves the name.

PHEBE, A SISTER.

Holy Ghost, or Holy Spirit—Which?

WILL THE LEARNED PLEASE ANSWER?

Is not the general idea of φαντασμα, φαντασμα & φαντα that of unreality? The first word expressing the power of the mind to represent to itself an object that is not really present, and, sometimes, that exists only in fancy. The second word, such fancied objet; and the third word, signifying the appearance of such an object to the mind. "Ghost" is given as a definition both of φαντασμα and φαντα.

Is not the general idea of πνευμα that a living, breathing reality?

φαντασμα occurs only once in the New Testament—Acts xxv. 23; φαντασμα only twice,—Matt. xiv. 26, and Mark vi. 49, and σκια not at all. Inspiration has but little use for such ghostly words.

πνευμα occurs in the New Testament 382 times, and is 92 times connected with αγιος "holy." It is a useful word in the Gospel of eternal life, and is never used to represent a fictitious object.

Now, is it not absurd if not outrageous, to translate πνευμα αγιον "Holy Ghost," instead of "Holy Spirit?" Or, how is the usual translation of that term by "Holy Ghost," in the New Testament, justified? And, if it is not justifiable, should we always read "Holy Spirit" where "Holy Ghost" occurs?

Will Bro. J. P. Weethee, or Bro. J. B. Cook answer? Or will the editors of the RESTITUTION, if they think the matter of sufficient importance, select some competent person to give the needed information on this subject? I would not be captious nor over-scrupulous. O. R. L. C.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things spoken by the mouth of all the Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates the setting up, in this land, the re-establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the re-location of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the soul destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sin, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Life's Mission.

One of the greatest needs of this age is moral stamina. The faculties need the restraining power of truth sanctified by a well-ordered life. Man has a higher mission than mere animal existence; there is a summer-land of thought where the deeds of virtue grow in luxuriance and ripen into manhood. To live and move in the humoral region of passion is to degrade us below our position in the scale of created intelligences, and place us on the denizens of the animal world.

There are many beings around us who have the appearance of happiness, but within the angels of death rule the soul and wither the tender plants of goodness which are budding beside the heart-fountains of their better nature. A life spent in undermining the resolutions of the young, or in betraying the hopes of the innocent, weakens our faith in humanity and leads to misgivings as to the progress of moral truth.

That man whose bright intellect and keen conceptions of justice are blunted by his ambition for wealth or fame, presents to our view a column of marble broken down by his own strong will. Life has a mission and an altar, where the good angel of our nature brings the sweet offerings of grateful hearts—hearts that were yesterday bleeding under the stroke of misfortune, but to-day are healed by the good Samaritan of humanity.

Some people imagine that if they only get through this world by any method, whether it be noble or ignoble, their mission is filled and their highest ambition realized. But there is a deeper and a holier view. Abundance is not life; fame and position do not reach it. These may be assistants at the outer court of life's temple, but they form no part of it.

The world presents a vast scene of suffering, and every one should become a missionary to enlighten and restore. Look around you and see the woe and tears, hear the half-smothered sighs of grief; poverty, wretchedness and want meet you in the alleys, on the corners of the street and in the prisons; then, ask whether there is not something more of life than mere self-love and "home comforts." Some people make their religion an outside garment, which can be worn on stated occasions, but laid away, when convenient, with the prayer-book and the Bible. What is needed is more earnest labor in the field of mortal conflict. The whole life-power should be dedicated to the great work of elevating the brotherhood of man, and in sending forth tokens of relief to the fallen.

Then we can see the practical features of life and the noble qualities of man. Then life has been given to the world for an object, and has proven a blessing. It is the surest road to self-conquest to labor for the moral growth and development of others. In doing this, we forget self, and work for the common cause of humanity; labor thus given will yield a bountiful harvest of blessings, not only to the suffering, but to ourselves. Each one can easily find a field of useful action, and the cry "come over and help us," salutes the ear from all points. The difficulty is not in the lack of opportunities to do good, but in the disposition. The effort seems to be to close the ear against the appeals of the suffering, and this only deepens sorrow and makes the inequalities of life more apparent. We often see our alms wasted and our kind deeds converted into aids for crime, and here lies one of the great secrets of indifference among those who would ever be active and true to the interests of the fallen.

But there is a remedy for this admitted evil; it is found in moral discipline, and in exerting the hallowed influence of kindness over the clouded mind, and in letting into the unfurnished parlors of thought the sunshine of happy words and kind deeds. The struggle may be long, and at times uncertain, but it must win at last.

The Beyond is full of triumphs; crowns gleam on the brow of the emancipated brotherhood. White-robed victors will then weave chaplets of fame for those who have made life a ministry of goodness and the sweet remembrance of other generations will compensate the service rendered for a higher and purer civilization.

Holy Ghost or Holy Spirit—Which?

In answer to Bro. Crozier:

It is on the latter second thought, I trust, that I am constrained to note the leading facts which your questions embrace. But my aim is to be brief; and not get to the windward of any one to whom the laboring oar may be deputed, and more worthily employed.

1. Your first paragraph is well stated, as to phantasm, etc. It answers to our word phantom: an apparition; a fancied vision; that which appears to the mind, usually, as a vain notion: "God knoweth that the thoughts of the wise are vain."

2. The Greek word for "spirit, (pneuma) is from pneo, I breathe, etc. But we get our word spirit from the Latin, spiro, to breathe, primarily to rush or drive; and ghost is Saxon-English. The Saxon original is "Gast;" and signifies ghost or gust; of which "the radical sense is to move, to rush —English, gush, gust." The word, somewhat varied, prevails over Central and Northern Europe; in the German, Danish, Russian, etc. It has an extended range in the civilized world; and a very respectable support among the nation. This is all in brief, of course.

3. The seeming difference between ghost and spirit, lies in the diverse languages from which the words are derived. But as to the matter of fact in the premises, our Saxon-English word ghost, is as legitimate as other terms of a like direct Saxon origin. You are aware that the beauty, simplicity, and strength of our version of the Bible, lies in its largely Saxon original.

To illustrate, God is referred for its origin directly from the Saxon, while Deity is derived from the Latin Deus. Now who would not object to the substitution of Deity for God in our Bibles and Christian converse? But the two cases seem on this point precisely alike. If we ought to alter our Bibles, and substitute spirit for the word ghost; then, for the same reason, we should substitute Deity for God. Other illustrations, alike pertinent, might be made, perhaps, by the hundred!

True, we are not confined to any one class of terms, that may be suited to our purpose. Hence, writers, preachers, and translators are bound to employ such words as will express the truth most distinctly to their hearers, or readers. Good taste, ardent piety, and love to souls, would seem, however, to choose God rather than Deity, and ghost rather than spirit, because most nearly native to our best Saxon-English. While, on the other hand, the most foreign, or at least, less native, but equally truthful terms, Deity and spirit, may be used with propriety when the occasion calls for it.

The objection to the word ghost may lie, not in its origin or import, but only in its mis-use, in foolish and ghostly stories. However, if this may be the ground of objection to its use, it would and should apply to spirit and apparition, from the Latin or Greek, as well, for nothing more weird and phantasmagorial or ghostly, among the nations of Northern Europe, could transcend those of Greece and Rome, in the south. We could ignore the terrible truth, that the whole world lieth in the wicked one?" 1 John v. 19—in the snare of the devil—and under the veil —over all nations. Isa. xxv. 7 ; 2 Tim. ii. 26.

My absence from home delayed my sight of your questions till now. I answer as the matter lies in my mind. The subject needs to be better understood generally. Yours for the truth.

J. B. Cook.

Unfulfilled Prophecy.

First of all, the midnight cry: "Behold the Bridegroom" has not yet been heard. No kind of spiritual doctrination in many or all of the reports need and fulfill the parable of our Lord. Each and all of the cries made were false as to One at least. This cry, spoken of by the anointed Jesus, is not a false alarm. When it is made, the wise that have oil in their vessels with their lamps; the wise, who were to understand the visions of prophecy, will go in to the marriage and the door will be shut.

2. The messenger of Rev. x. has not yet appeared. This messenger, when he does appear, will make the great cry: "Behold the Bridegroom; go ye out to meet him." If Elias comes first, as Jesus said to the disciples, as they came down from the Mount, where they had seen in vision the Son of Man coming into his kingdom, then this messenger of Rev. x. is the Elias. If John the Baptist filled the mission of Elias at the first coming, who will fill it at his second coming? Let me ask the student of prophecy, what do all these tokens that are seen clustering around this angel, then here is the cloud, the rainbow; his face shines as the sun, his feet are as pillars of fire. If he has appeared, what was in the little book? What did the seven thunders say? for if he has made his report the thunders have spoken. What time did he fix on?

3. The two witnesses of Rev. xi. have not yet stood on their feet. No event in the past can be construed as a fulfillment of this.

4. The four angles bound in the great river Euphrates, have not yet been loosed, unless it has been done in the last few days, this date being June 30th.

5. The seven angels that have the seven last plagues, have not yet come, clothed with a white stone, and girded with the golden girdle.

6. The sun and moon have not yet been darkened, nor has the stars fallen.

7. The kings of earth have not yet been assembled in the Armageddon.

And yet all these events may, and doubtless will, take place in a brief space of time. Six months in advance of Messiah's first advent to the people, his messenger proclaimed his coming. There is no evidence that a longer time will be given after the angel of Rev. x. cries, As Jehovah lives, time is no longer—the time noted in the little book opened in his hand, of course.

In Christ.

The wilderness is nearly traversed Canaan and Jerusalem are almost within my view; the summits of the everlasting hills are already appearing. What manner of person then, ought I to be in all holy conversation, and godliness, looking for and hastening unto the coming of the day of God? I must press forward; and so much the more as I see the day approaching. I must be consistent and heavenly-minded, so walking worthy of my calling, and setting my affections on things above. For what have I, who have a crown in prospect, a Kingdom in reversion to do with the vanities or pleasures of this poor passing world? My eye is above; my treasure is in heaven; shall not my heart be there also? If I am in Christ, I must seek to be like Him, and to follow Him more and more closely, as the night is hastening to an end, and the day about to break. If I am in sorrow, I shall call to mind that weeping endureth but for a night, joy cometh in the morning. If I am in comfort, I must see that this prosperity which God has given me is making me a holier man, and a more self-denying worker for Him who loved me and washed me from my sins in his own blood. If I am poor, I shall rejoice that my day of wealth is just at hand. If I am rich, I shall take this gold which my Lord has given me and lay it all at His beloved feet. Mine must be no half discipleship, no service of two masters—no divided heart. The night is far spent, the day is at hand. What remains of this brief life of mine must be given wholly to the Lord.—H. Bonar, D. D.

The Signs of the Times.

It is not given us to know the exact time for our Savior's appearing, for if so, there would be no significance in the many admonitions to watch for it. "Watch therefore; for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come." And of its approach we may know, for "when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors."

The signs are numerous, and to occur in all parts of the social, political, religious and natural world.

We have, besides, in the vision of 2300 days (Daniel viii. ix. chapters) a grand prophetic measuring line, by which to calculate our position, and the end to which our Savior referred when the disciples sought for signs of his coming. We have never accepted the usual interpretation that the cutting off of the seventy weeks were fulfilled in the coming and crucifixion of Christ. To our mind the whole tenor of the prophecy and Daniel's prayer forbids it. Daniel was seeking to know what, and how long should be the tribulation of his people. The whole period, (2300 years,) referred to their tribulation, and the seventy weeks, or four hundred and ninety years, were measured off to show their existence as a nation. "Seventy weeks are cut off on thy people, and thy holy city, to finish (their) transgressions and to make an end of their sins." The city was to be destroyed, the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, the people to be cast off, and the sanctuary (the land) to lay desolate until the consummation or the end of the days, when it, (the land) should be cleansed. The reference to, and prophecy of Christ was an incidental one and connected with it, but the cutting off applied to the people, the city, the temple and the land, and consequently the time cut off applied to them also.

At the crucifixion of Christ not one of these events was fulfilled: the city, people, temple and sacrifices were unchanged. But forty years after, these prophecies were accomplished so fully and completely, and in so terrible and naked a manner, as to make it obvious that this was their fulfillment. The city was utterly destroyed, the temple was demolished, over one million of the people slain, and the remainder cast out of the land. When the disciples inquired of the Savior (Matt. xxiv chapter.) Tell us when shall these things be, and what "shall be the sign of thy coming and of the end of the world." He referred them to this prophecy of Daniel, and so connected the destruction of the temple with his coming and the end of the world, that many have assumed that they were all fulfilled in some manner at the destruction of Jerusalem. Christ connected these events to show that they belonged to, and were included in the one prophecy. The indignation to be inflicted upon the Jews was one step, the first; and his coming and the end of the world (or age) the next step, and the last. The first ended the Jewish dispensation, the last the Gentile dispensation—each event was to be heralded by the same class of signs—the first signs (Matt. xxiv-7) were "wars and rumors of wars," "nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom, and there shall be "famines pestilences, and earthquakes in divers places."

Previous to the destruction of Jerusalem, or from about A. D. 33 to A. D. 70, the world, especially that portion inhabited by Jews, was a scene of fearful calamity and confusion. Historians tell us that during this period earthquakes occurred uninterruptedly—Rome, Crete, Smyrna, Miletus and Samos, were visited, with numberless other places, and Pompeii and three cities of Asia Minor overthrown. (Tacitus annals xiv-2). Josephus declares there happened in Judea vehement winds, dreadful thunderings and lightnings, and vast movings of shaken earth which in the judgement of all "portended no small evil."

Severe famines prevailed, which are alluded to in Acts xi. 28, and are mentioned by Eusebius and other Roman authors. Wars and internal commotions prevailed everywhere. Four Roman emperors were slain within eighteen months, and human slaughter was indiscriminate and universal, especially of the Jewish people.

This same class of events are to precede and herald the advent of Christ, and it would seem as if we are now passing through them. Wars and rumors of wars, the winds let loose, and earthquakes in divers places.

Another sign, (Luke xxi. 25,) is "upon the earth," distress of nations with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for "fear." Josephus mentions dreadful storms that took place at that time, in which the sea broke in upon the land with frightful inundations. Kitto declares, "the condition of the country became so deplorable that the well disposed citizens sought refuge in foreign countries. The land was overrun with robbers. The office of high priest was offered to the highest bidder, and the mass of the people abandoned themselves to all evil."

This picture of Jewish society then we see fast developing in these days all over the world.

Another sign (Matt. xxiv. 14,) "And this Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness, and then shall the end come." This was accomplished by the disciples in those days to the Jewish nation. The apostles, with the activity inspired by a new faith, went among them everywhere, preaching the Gospel of the kingdom. The entire Jewish nation was made acquainted with the coming and kingdom of Christ. Acts ii. 39.

So also at the commencement of this century as by a sudden impulse the idea was impressed upon the churches to proclaim the Gospel to the heathen. This has been accomplished in a wonderful manner, and missionaries have penetrated the most remote corners of the earth, and bibles have been scattered like leaves of the forest. The very interior of Africa has been possibly the only region not fully reached, and that has been recently opened up by the researches of Livingstone and Stanley in the Providence of God, for this purpose.

Another sign is (Matt. xxiv. 24,) "false prophets shall arise." Previous to the destruction of Jerusalem, impostors arose in every direction claiming to be the Messiah, and drawing after them many deluded followers. In our day we have the Mormon Prophet, "crying, behold he is in the desert;" and the spiritualist looking for a spiritual coming, declaring that "he is in the secret chambers." The last sign is (Luke xxi. 20,) "when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that redemption draweth nigh." The same event will close both dispensations. When we shall see the armies of Russia and her allies surrounding the Holy City, as were those of Rome and her allies, then we may know that this coming is near, even at the doors. The nations are arming, they know not why, and every eye is turned to the land of the prophets.

It may be said that the cutting off of the seventy weeks by the destruction of Jerusalem in A. D., 70, and the casting out of the Jewish people, makes the ending a certainty in 1880, and not a matter of uncertainty, and therefore conflicts with the Scripture "Ye know not when the time is." This would be true but for the fact that the days were shortened an indefinite period for the elect, (see Matt xxiv. 22, which would bring the prophetic ending sometime after the year 70, and the ending of the 2,300 days, after the year 1880. Events can only determine how near. That the 70 weeks were not cut off at the crucifixion of Christ, refer to Acts xiii. 40, where Paul speaks of it as their future. "Beware therefore, lest that come upon you, which is spoken of in the prophets."

We think that all of Daniel's prophecies relate to the Jewish nation. The Christian Church has its prophetical message in the Seven Churches and the book of Revelations. The object and centre of all of Daniel's visions apply and relate to the land and the chosen people. "Hath God cast off his people, God forbid." And the 1,290 and 1,335 days of Daniel xii., we think apply to them, and in no sense to the Papacy or Christian Church. It is not to be presumed that these periods end together. The sense and connection forbid it. We are not to suppose that all things are to be accomplished in a single day of twenty-four hours at the coming of Christ, and one or both of these periods may extend into the millennium, for we are taught that the gathering of Israel will be a work of process, as the last period may reach to their full gathering into the kingdom, out of the nations. Jer. xvi. 16.

The 1,290 days of Daniel xii. 7, may apply to the Mohammedan power, which dates its era from 622. And the Turkish year to-day is reckoned from this epoch and written 1,254, instead of the Christian era 1876.

Perpetual Fire.

In the neighborhood of Baku, on the Caspian Sea, there is a Phenomenon of a very extraordinary nature called the everlasting fire, to which a sect of Indians and Persians, called Ghaours, pay religious worship. It is situated about ten miles from the city of Baku, in the province of Shirvan, on a dry, rocky piece of ground.

On it there are several ancient temples built of stone, and supposed to be all dedicated to the fire, there being one among them in which the worship is now carried on. Near the altar there is a large hollow cane, from the end of which issues a blue flame. The worshipers affirm that this flame has continued ever since the Deluge, and they believe if it were suppressed in that place it would break out in another.

At a short distance from this temple there is a horizontal gap, two feet from the ground, about six feet long and three broad, out of which comes a constant flame of of the color of that in the temple. When there is a strong wind it rises to the height of eight feet, but is much lower in calm weather.

The earth around for more than two miles has this extraordinary property, that by taking up two or three inches of the surface and applying a lighted lamp, the part uncovered immediately takes fire, even before the flame touches it. The flame makes the soil hot, but does not consume it nor affect what is near with any degree of heat.

It is said that eight horses were once consumed by this fire under a roof where the surface of the ground had been turned up and by some accident had ignited. If a cane or tube of paper based about two inches into the ground, closed with earth below, and the top of it touched with alive coal, a flame will immediately issue forth without consuming the tube, providing the edges be covered with clay. Three or four lighted canes will boil water in a pot, and are sometimes used to cook victuals. The flames have a sulphurious smell, but are inoffensive.

God's Plan of your Life.

Never complain of your birth, your training, your employment, your hardships; never fancy you could be something, if you only had a different lot and sphere assigned you. God understands his own plans, and knows what you want a great deal better than you do. The things you most deprecate as fatal limitations or obstructions, are probably what you most want. What you call hinderances, obstacles, discouragements, are probably God's opportunities; and it is nothing new that the patient should dislike his medicines, or any certain proof that they are poisons. Choke that envy which gnaws at your heart because you are not in the same lot with others; bring down your soul, or rather, bring it up to receive God's will, and do his work, in your lot, in your sphere.—Dr. Bushnell.

The Foreign War.

The news from Europe looks warlike and at the same time gloomy. The Turks are thus far victorious in the last week's conflicts. This war at first appeared very insignificant, but it has now assumed a serious phase. It is a conflict between the Christians of Servia and the Turks. Russia it seems is in close sympathy with Servia, and will not allow that province crushed by the Turk. If it should occur that Russia becomes involved nothing can prevent a general war in Europe. No one can foretell the result. The whole map of the old Roman empire will undergo a change, and the ten things will appear as the final end of Daniel's metallic man. We shall keep our readers posted so far as possible upon this subject. We are living in the days of swift events. The great epoch is crowding close upon us. Happy is he who is ready for impending changes and to stand before the Son of man.

A British firm has completed for the Ottoman Government an iron gunboat, and engaged a skilled pilot to take it to Naguzar go which has such power that there is not a fort in any of the Turkish ports that can resist damage from its shot.

THE RESTITUTION

PLYMOUTH, IND., ... JULY 19, 1876.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

☞ The Centennial issue will be just the thing to circulate among those who are unacquainted with our views. A number of our best writers will have articles in this number explanatory of our faith and hope. Our brethren thus far have not responded very liberally toward this issue. It is to be hoped that every one will order as many extra copies as possible, and thereby help us in our work. Let the gospel light shine, and let us know the truth upon the great questions now moving the world. The times are ominous, and it becomes us to work and watch until the day dawns.

The Hidden Life.

That is a strange saying: "Your life is hid with Christ in God." The Christ-life is not made to appear in its fullness in this state of being. Its ways, its examples and foretastes appear in faith; but its great balance of existence is now hidden with Christ. If the reader will only stop and reflect a moment, he will see what a revelation or truth is here stated:

1. The life is now hidden.
2. It is hidden with Christ.
3. Christ himself is hidden.
4. And all is hidden in God.

If we were to stop here, the whole picture of Christian patience would fail. But another sentence comes to our relief: "When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory." Col. iii. 2 3. In these words we get the sequel of it all.

1. Christ is our life.
2. He is to appear again.
3. Then the saints come forth in life and gain the fruition of hope.
4. When Christ appears in glory the saints also appear in glory. Hence the hidden life comes not until the Life-giver returns.

Looking for the Unseen.

The Apostle Paul informs us that the Christian looks for those things which are unseen. At first this seems to be a paradox, but as we reflect upon the point we see a blessed truth hid away in these words: "While we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal." The vision of faith reaches beyond things temporal and finds the eternal in the world beyond death. The language here is like that where the apostle speaks of Moses seeing the invisible one, and yet preserving his life. Prophecy and promise are not bounded by things temporal, they rest on the immutable and eternal. The unseen state is not a state of oblivion but of realities, brightness and peace.

We have many beautiful truths which meet with a glorious fruition in connection with the unseen. Crowns gleam upon brows once made sad in life's pilgrimage. Thrones become our inheritance when the kingly princes reign in the age of the eternal, and no mortal vision unaided by the divine spirit could enter the mystic future and bring before our enchanted gaze those supernal triumphs of faith and hope. But the things temporal, must give way. The old must give place to the new, the mortal to the immortal. Even death must cease and life eternal gleam in the world of the unseen. "The things which are not seen are eternal." What a vision; who could bring out such a mystery and make it plain but an inspired prophet? The kingdom, the King, his associates, the city and throne, the new world and the victories are all eternal. Blessed triumph; who would not struggle to overcome that he may gain a realm so grand and filled with companionships ever true and loyal, and blessed with the immunities of endless life?

The Eastern War Cloud.

We clip the following from the Chicago Tribune. It presents the latest and most important phase of the conflict in the dominions of Turkey:

The most important feature of the war news from Turkey is the probability that Roumania may cast in her lot with Servia and Montenegro. The motive seems to be the same in each case. Servia announced to Turkey as her ultimatum the cession of Bosnia, with an indefinite suspension of tribute. Montenegro announced her ultimatum as the cession of Herzegovina and a strip of sea-coast upon the same condition, and now comes Roumania (Wallachia and Moldavia) with a memorandum to the guaranteeing Powers, explaining the unsatisfactory position in which she is placed under the Treaty of Paris, and formulating seven points, the last of which is for the cession of the whole delta of the Danube from Tultcha down to its four mouths, which would give it possession of a strip of coast on the Black Sea about 80 miles in length, and extending inward 40 miles. This would not only give the Roumanians control of the Danube at its delta, but would also afford the Russians easy access into Turkey, and would tip the scale of strength as against the latter Power. To this end the first step has been taken by the introduction of a bill in the Roumanian Parliament, emanating from the War-Office, for the mobilization of the army and calling out the reserves. This introduces a new element into the conflict, and, taken in conjunction with the additional news that a general Bulgarian uprising is planned, will place all the Sclavonic provinces north of the Balkans, from the Adriatic to the Black Sea, in revolt against Turkey.

In this situation of affairs, a few facts concerning Roumania will be of interest. Roumania is composed of the two provinces, Wallachia and Moldavia, which were united in 1861. It is ruled by Prince Karl I., who was originally an officer in the Prussian army, and married the German Princess Elizabeth Von Neuwied. The legislative power is vested in a Parliament, consisting of a senate of 76 members and a chamber of 157 deputies; the executive, in the hands of the reigning Prince, assisted by a council of five ministers. Nearly the entire population belongs to the Greek church. It has a population of 4,035,510, of whom 217,424 are Jews, the remainder Christians. It has a network of railways connecting the capital, Bucharest, with western Europe and with Russia. Its army, which is a very powerful one, is divided into four classes: The permanent party and its reserves, embracing 8 regiments of infantry, 4 battalions of riflemen, 1 battalion of pompiers, 2 companies of foot gendarmes, 1 company of discipline, 2 regiments of hussars, 1 squadron of instruction, 5 squadrons of horse gendarmes, 2 regiments of 7 batteries, 1 company of pontoniers, and 4 companies of engineers, besides workmen, hospital and transport service; second, the territorial army and reserves of 22,163 infantry and 12,184 cavalry; third, the militia, composed of all those between 21 and 37 years, not drawn for the permanent or territorial armies; and, fourth, the national Guard, including all men from 37 to 46 years of age, who may be called out for garrison service. If Roumania, therefore takes part in the war, it will probably add at least 100,000 effective and trained men to the Sclavic forces now in the field.

The Dead Century.

All things in the natural world have their periods of growth and decay. One age succeeds another, and time unlocks to us the secrets of the future. The past has its deeds both good and bad enrolled upon its pages; the present is hurrying by, the future is coming with robes of whitsand shining crowns. The old century is dead. Orators have charmed the multitudes who have gathered to hear of its deeds of valor and victories. Poets have rekindled the fires of patriotism and made them glow as never before. Artists have placed on canvas the struggles of the Revolution, the heroism of brave men, and the triumphs of the Republic. But the century is dead! Bells tolled, cannon boomed, and the people wept, as the great year was placed in the tomb of the ages agone. Survivors can build the monument while the goddess of peace throws the roses over the grave of the silent sleeper. There have been other centuries filled with events which marked the course of empire, and shaped the destiny of man and give a higher and nobler view of life. There have been storms, but the bow of peace arched the cloud. There have been upheavals that rocked kingdoms and shook the world, but they are still. Stars glittered on the sky of nations in the early morn of the century, which became dim as mighty empires arose. But in our own blest land each star yet shines out in the peaceful heavens, awaiting the day of full-orbed brightness and the age of peace. We now stand upon the threshold of the new century. As we enter the new we hear not the tramp of armies; banners stained with blood are not lifted in the smoke of battle; clouds dark with impending storms, do not blacken our sky. We enter the new century with every promise, and hold within our hands the emblems of progress. It is grand to live in an age like this. The great republic moves on in the quiet assurance of being blest by Him who is the arbiter of nations and the God of peace.

Voices of love and warning yet ring from the old to the new. While a sister by securing some one to do it if not happy family are before the great altar pouring out their libations of good will to men, may the new century bring the long hoped for day, when the clarion of war shall be still and the martial trumpet be laid by. The future is bright with promise, and will grow in brightness and truth if men will be loyal and walk in the way which leads to the temple not made with hands.—H. T. R., in Farmer's Monthly.

The Organization of Local Churches.

The question of organization is deservedly receiving considerable attention at present. I was assigned a place on a committee raised on the subject at the Christmas conference in Plymouth. The part assigned to me towards a report by the chairman of that committee is that expressed by the caption of this. Having completed my task, and the report not likely to be called for sometime, I enclose it to you for advance publication if you judge it expedient.

Four questions were asked by Bro. Wilcox in assigning to me my share in the work:

1. What was the Scriptural order? II. Can we adopt it? III. Have we a right to vary from it? IV. What plan would you recommend? and my report is made accordingly:

1. What was the Scriptural order?

The N. T. nowhere gives us a descriptive account of the organization of the churches, either as instructive as to how it should be done; or historically as to how it was done in any particular instance. All the information given is fragmentary. Still gleaning the acts and the epistles we can gather the essential features of it. From Acts xiv. 21. 22. we learn that Paul and Barnabas visited several cities encouraging and "confirming the souls, of the disciples and ordained them elders in every city." We also learn Tit. i. 5. that Titus was left in Crete to "set in order the things that are wanting and ordain elders in every city." From Paul's discourse to the elders of the church of Ephesus, Acts xx:28. "Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own Blood," we have their duties, viz: the general oversight of the church. From 1 Tim iii:2-7, and Tit i:5 ff, we learn what kind of men they should be to execute this supervision most acceptably.

From 1 Tim iii:11-12 we learn that another office in the church is that of deacons and the exemplary characters they and their wives should exhibit. Their duties are no where named in connection with the official name, but rather inferred from the meaning of the original word—servant or minister—and the duties for which the first appointments were made, Acts xi:1-6, viz: to serve the church in management of its temporalities.

These seem to be all the executive officers of local churches. With these the church is ready for work; and without these its appointed work cannot be efficiently prosecuted. Without the overseeing bishops the instruction and discipline of members will be but imperfectly attended to, and the regularity and the edifying interest of its meetings but indifferently secured. The body will lack a head. Without its ministers of service—the deacons, to look after its temporalities; as a place for meeting, fuel and lights, materials for the supper, the raising, custody and disbursement of the funds, these matters must be left to others who have no authority in the matter and of consequence, be but imperfectly done. But with an efficient board of bishops of the apostolic pattern, more or less in number as the number and interest of the church may require, as the organic head of the body, under Christ, we may expect the spiritual interests to be faithfully cared for; and with the deacons, also of apostolic stamp, in place, we may look for the work of the Lord to prosper in their midst; and with evangelists to proclaim their faith in outlying localities, the whole work of the body will prosper.

Pastors are mentioned, Eph iv:11. but it seems to be but another name for bishops; as the original word signifies shepherds. The appropriate business of shepherds is to take care of and feed the flock, which is the work assigned to the bishops, as we have already seen.

Teachers are also named, but I think not as officers, any more than evangelists, who are also named in the same passage. The work devolving upon the body could not go forward without evangelists to proclaim the word in new places, or teachers for the instruction of members. To provide for this teaching is evidently the business of the bishops or elders, as they are required to "feed the flock." They do this either by their own "labor in word and doctrine," 1 Tim v:17. competent themselves.

These bishops and deacons have authority, each in their respective spheres as executive officers to see that the members walk according to the requirements of the Word. Evangelists are elected by the church, or if any one church be too feeble to sustain one, by several churches in co-operation. As evangelist, he has no authority in the church or churches that elected him. His work is to proclaim "the word of the kingdom," induct the believers into Christ, and set them in order in proper time. Till then he is their overseer and should not leave them to the wolves.

Then to organize a church may not require anything more than to bring the believers of the place together, and elect or ordain and install in their places these officers, and bring the members to realize that they are to walk under the rule of those over them, and to submit themselves Heb xiii:17; and to make provision for evangelist work.

2. Can we adopt it?

I see no reason why we cannot if the brethren can be educated to set a just estimate upon it. Bring the members to appreciate the truth, that the Lord has enjoined upon the body a work; the proclaiming of his gospel to them without; and the development of characters of holiness in the members, and also the relief of the disorders and sufferings of the world; and that to effect this requires, not only the most zealous and self sacrificing efforts of Christians individually, but also the most efficient combined effort. Teach them that this work must be prosecuted to the extent of their ability or they are culpable; and that it can no more be done to advantage in a loose, or disorganized way than any other business; but that otherwise, it requires the best order, the most efficient leadership, and the most zealous co-operation of the membership Show them, in short, that organization is a necessity, and that every member of Christ's body is in duty bound to be an enrolled member of some efficiently organized church, and I think there will be no difficulty in adopting the organization of the early churches. In all our efforts toward independence of church obligation is to be found the great hinderance. The extensively prevalent feeling, as exhibited in practice is that they are at liberty to attend the meetings regularly or irregularly as they are inclined; and if any cause of complaint arise they may absent themselves entirely, even without labor to remove the complaint; that they may pay the church treasury or not as they please Where lack of sense of church obligation prevails effective organization will be difficult.

3. Have we authority to vary it?

Evidently the original organization of the churches resulted from the necessity of the occasion. The first step towards organization was at Jerusalem Acts vi:1-6. when the complaint that the Grecian widows were neglected in the daily distribution of necessities led to the appointment of seven men to attend to this work, that is, to serve the church in its then present temporal necessities. Out of this grew the office of deacon. While the church remained mainly together, under the personal supervision of the apostles this was all that was necessary. But after the dispersion from Jerusalem, when churches were being gathered in many places, putting it beyond the power of the apostles to personally oversee them; elders, bishops or overseers were appointed in every church, as also when the distress of the poor saints at Jerusalem made it especially necessary that there be a general collection of funds, instructions were given in regard to this—if not to all the churches—to those of Galatia and Corinth and Titus was sent to Corinth to perfect the church there in that grace also. The object sought in this, appears to have been to secure a liberal contribution from each member according to what he had, or "as the Lord had prospered him," statedly given, and that the fund be on hand when wanted.

Whether they kept a record of the names of members, or a history of the body, with an account and date of its addition, with the name and date of deaths and removals etc., we are not told. But as they were governed by the necessities of the occasion and reason, we suppose that, in the absence of instruction in the matter, we are to be so guided also. "It is not reason that we should leave the word of God and serve tables" said the apostles. Acts vi:2. Our reason teaches us that a record of the names and doings of the body from its rise onward, is a great convenience, if not a necessity for its order and prosperity.

When a particular course of action has been required of God's people it has been particularly marked out. As no such order of organization has been given; and as the apostles were governed by reason and the necessities of the occasion, it would seem that it was designed that the church should be at liberty to adjust itself to the circumstances of the times and conditions in which it should exist; and that in using its God given reason it should adapt itself to the times and customs of the day so as most effectually to prosecute its appointed work, using due care that no requirement of the word be transgressed. The lostness of the church to develope a holy character (in its members, to proclaim the gospel to the world and to do good to all men as occasion offers, demands that it should bring all its forces of mind to bear upon it, that it be most successfully prosecuted just as we do in the various occupations of life. If the business habits of the times requires, in order to the greatest success, some additional officer, or some business regulation not named in the N. T. we may conform to that requirement, only seeing that we do not annul any feature of the order as far as given in the word.

4. What plan shall we adopt?

I recommend the following plan:

Premising that after due notice of time, place and object of the meeting, the members are all present; then

1. An enrollment of the names.
2. A statement of our position.

Having been called out from the world by the belief of the gospel—"the glad tidings of the kingdom of God," and thereby having become pilgrims and strangers in the world, but heirs of the kingdom of God—"heirs of God and joint heirs with Jesus Christ." Having become "Abraham's seed and heirs according to promise;" having through the obedience of this faith come to cherish the "hope of the promise made of God unto the fathers," in which hope we derive "strong consolation" from the promise and oath of God to Abraham that his seed should possess the gates of his enemies, and in his seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed; and if having been made our duty to "contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints"—and to "walk in love as Christ also hath loved us"—to "be one as Christ and the father are one"—to "all speak the same thing and that there be no divisions among us, but that we be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment;" therefore in accordance with the custom of the apostolic churches; and that we may most successfully prosecute the work assigned us, and secure that unity and love required by us; we heartily unite in organizing ourselves into one body to be known as the church in ——. To this end we anew give ourselves to God and to one another in the Lord in solemn covenants; acknowledging that the word of God is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness."

3. Covenant.

We, members of the body of Christ in —— hereby solemnly and truly covenant with our Heavenly Father and with each other to walk together as the church in ——; that we will strive to walk together in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless; that we will maintain a faithful watchcare over one another, and endeavor to provoke one another to love and good works; that we will attend faithfully the stated appointments of the church; that we will be honest in our deal, faithful to our obligations, temperate in our habits and just toward all. That we will labor together for the spread of our precious faith in the world, and to this end will contribute of our means to the treasury of the church as God shall prosper us; and that we will strive together to imitate the example of our Savior by doing "good to all as we have opportunity, especially to them of the household of faith."

4. Officers.

From among the elders in the faith elect one or more as Bishops, or overseers, to take the oversight of the body, as maintaining regular meetings; seeing that they are conducted orderly and to edification; providing for the administration of the word; looking after any who may be delinquent; warning, reproving, exhorting or cheering as the conduct and circumstances of any may require etc.

Also elect one or more deacons to supervise the temporal matters of the body; as providing a suitable place for meeting and keeping it in order; providing the bread and wine for the Lord's table; the collection and disbursement of funds etc.

Also elect one as clerk or scribe to keep a record of the membership and doings of the body.

Also elect an evangelist if able to maintain one, if not make such provisions they may be able to do looking towards co-operation with sister churches in doing so.

5. Funds.

As it is impossible to prosecute the work assigned to the church without funds; so no church is efficiently set in order without the adoption of some plan of finance by which each member shall contribute statedly, at short intervals as God has prospered him. For each to contribute as God prospers him, secures equality in bearing the burden. Each church must devise its own way of ascertaining the measure of its prosperity, whether by a comparison of estates, or a comparison of incomes. Apparently the comparison of incomes will secure greater equality. The point urged is that each church when being set in order, before dispersion, adopt for their guidance some plan by which the injunction of the apostle, that "every one of you give as the Lord has prospered him; be faithfully carried out.

6. Membership.

As all members of Christ's body are entitled to all the privileges of that body, each church should cordially receive to their fellowship, and permit the enrollment of their names as members any who may come among them bearing evidence that they have been inducted into the body, by the belief of the gospel, repentance and baptism, and that they are walking in newness of life; and any who shall become believers of the one faith and be baptized in obedience to it.

7. What numbers may institute a church?

No definite numbers are required. Where a number of believers, more or less live so far from the place of meeting of any church as to prevent their frequent attendance, they should organize and take position as the church of the place in which they reside. A very few, even but three or four may do so much to their profit. If they have no one of their number possessed of the gift of overseership, so as to justify his appointment to that place, let them select one from a neighboring church and arrange with him to meet with them as often as may be; and elect the best material they have for his assistant that he may be educated to the work. When believers live isolated it would seem advisable that they enroll themselves as members of the church the most convenient and attend the meetings as often as possible.

8. How often should the churches meet?

From what we read Acts xx:7, we should say on every first day of the week, there being no unfavorable hinderance. If such hinderance exists come as near to it as possible. Whatever the intervals between, let the meetings be statedly; and break bread in remembrance of the Lord at each meeting.

Conference Report.

The brethren of Northern Illinois and Southern Wisconsin, met in Bro. Diven's barn, Friday evening, June 23. We met very late, consequently we had a short discourse. On Saturday morning we met for conference, and were called together by the chairman. The writer was chosen Secretary. Not much business was on hand, but it was recommended in consequence of a misunderstanding on the part of the brethren, as to the time and place of meeting, and an oversight on the part of the editor in not giving notice at the proper time), that conference notices be inserted in every issue, from three or four weeks prior to the time, until the time of meeting, then no misunderstanding can possibly exist.

The brethren who were present from Fairfield, Green county, Wis., were willing, and desired that the annual conference be held at that place, and if no objections are made, it is considered as appointed at that place on the first of September. As the time for preaching arrived, we listened to an able discourse by Bro. J. F. Willcox, from Isaiah lv. 8-12, showing how infinitely greater are God's thoughts than man's.

In the afternoon Bro. Willcox preached from 2 Thess. ii. chapter. In the evening it rained, and none but those who remained at the barn were present. Bro. Trotter addressed the audience. On Sunday morning Bro Willcox delivered a sermon from John viii. 12. In the afternoon, from Luke xxiii. 38, showing in what sense Jesus was the King of the Jews.

In the evening Bro. Willcox preached on "The Signs of the Times," showing that Paul is soon to receive his crown, and not only Paul, but all those who love the appearing of Jesus; showing also that the fig tree is budding and Israel soon to be restored.

A Short Sermon.

Learn from the earliest day to insure your principles against the peril of ridicule. If you think it right to differ from the times, and to make a point of morals, do it, however antiquated, however rustic, however pedantic it may appear. You can no more exercise your reason if you live in the constant dread of laughter, than you can enjoy life in constant terror of death. Sydney Smith.

Sweet Day of Rest.

BY H. G. M'CULLOCH.

TUNE.—"Sweet hour of Prayer."

Sweet day of rest, sweet day of rest,
I long to see thee and be blest;
I long to view thy peaceful light,
And wear the robe of spotless white.
When Jesus comes on earth to reign,
The wilderness shall bloom again;
The weary saint will then be blest,
When thou shalt come, sweet day of rest.

Sweet promised land, sweet promised land,
By faith I view thee near at hand;
O may my anxious spirit burn
With warm desire for thy return.
With joy I read the blessed word,
That hope cannot be long deferred;
And gladly join the pilgrim band
That wait for thee, sweet promised land.

Lord Jesus, come, Lord Jesus, come,
And take thy waiting people home;
Let earth for sleeping Jewish yield,
Let Satan, vanquished, quit the field.
O may we soon behold our King,
And shout, "O death, where is thy sting?"
Into it earth, restored again,
When Jesus comes on earth to reign.

Correspondence.

Dear Brother Reed:

I have for some time contemplated writing you as follows:

I dwell in the midst of an intelligent community of working men who with their families number over one hundred, one half are Roman Catholics, the remainder Protestants or of no denomination. I stand alone in the faith. A few to whom I have communicated Glad Tidings receive it without disputation, and I believe, that if some one of our many able brethren would be willing to engage in missionary labor here, an abundant harvest would be their reward. They can be made comfortable in my own house and family, but, for further (pecuniary) remuneration must trust to the benevolence of their audiences.

Our place is near to several prosperous little towns, the largest of which numbers about one thousand, and in neither of which has the truth ever been disseminated; of course much opposition might be expected. But our place is an entirely new settlement, and is situated on the P., C. & St. L. R. R., about 100 miles east of Pittsburgh, Pa., and about 80 miles east of Columbus, O.

Bro. J. M. Stephenson, on his way to Canada, stayed with me a few days and delivered a short course of lectures which was well received.

I shall be much pleased to hear from some one of the brethren willing to engage in such work. Or, should any of them be passing this way, at any time, I shall be pleased to have them stop off with me for a few days.

Your Brother in Jesus,

WILLIAM RENNIE.

PORT WASHINGTON, O.

Editors of Restitution:

I take this method of forwarding to you the subscription price for your valuable periodical for another twelve months, hoping the cause you advocate and disseminate may meet with that encouragement which it so justly merits; and that you may receive your just reward, not only in this life, by a prompt payment therefor, but also enjoy that future and better state where there shall be a restitution of all things. With these hasty remarks, I subscribe myself, as ever a lover of the truth,

AMOS JARVIS.

Editors Restitution:

I send you $1.50 for two copies of the RESTITUTION. I cannot do without the RESTITUTION, as we have no preaching here and I am almost alone. I read the paper over and over, and find much to comfort an old man that has been trying for twenty years or more to find out the truth, among so much error as is going about the world at the present time.

I long for the coming of the Lord; for this world needs a better government, better laws, and better rulers to execute them.

Yours in hope,

F. FANNO.

Editors Restitution:

I want you to write some of the best articles you can on the Sabbath, as A. F. Dugger is traveling over Kansas and Iowa, among our brethren, teaching the Sabbath law, and making some converts. He is introducing a light, chaffy paper in place of the RESTITUTION, in continuation till you get through with the subject. There is some prospect of a debate between myself and Dugger on this question, but I have no fears at all.

Yours in hope of eternal life,

JOHN POORE.

Editors Restitution:

The Diaglott is received. I anticipate that it will be of great value to me, as its renderings are so clear, being couched in the language of modern times.

I am preparing, as fast as I can, to preach the glorious gospel of the blessed God. Here in Texas the harvest is great but the laborers are few. Thousands are starving for the true bread of life, being fed on the husks of Babylon.

Ministers are as bitterly opposed to the proclamation of the truth as the blind guides were in the days of our blessed Master. They scout the idea of the future establishment of the kingdom of God for the purpose of blessing the nations. This they do when haranguing their flocks, but when challenged to meet the truth, in fair and open debate, they invariably turn away with the remark that they "have nothing to do with untaught questions." This shows that they are afraid to risk their fables in a platform breeze. Well, enough of this. I am sending for all the books I can, calculated to assist me in the study of the Bible. Should you know of any, send list.

In hope of life eternal in the kingdom of God, Yours,

S. H. OATMAN.

Editors Restitution:

As soon as you can, give our town a call, there are many that would be glad to have you do so. Dear brother in Christ; assist me by your prayers that I may labor more effectually for the Master. It will require some time to regain what I have lost in the last year; I do hope, by the grace of God, soon to defend the cause.

Many want you to come. Let me know, if you can come, two weeks or so before hand. I am still seeking for glory, honor, and immortality and eternal life.

WM. CULVERHOUSE.

Editors Restitution:

I noticed an article in your issue of June 28, by Phebe, entitled The Fair Chance, calling it unpractical, universal salvation.

Would it not be well for all to examine the Scriptures in reference to the universal salvation we hear of—that God reckoned all under sin that he might have mercy on all, and that Adam brought the race under the curse of sin and death, and that Christ is to redeem the race from under the curse of sin and death, and that man is not accountable for Adam's transgression? but every man is or will be accountable to God for himself; not for Adam's sins but for our own sins, and consequently that is universal salvation, (not to eternal life) but from under the curse that Adam, through his disobedience, brought the race.

Now, in reference to the text, 2 Pet. 1. 10, "Make your calling and election sure." Does our sister suppose she has had an equal chance with Peter, who has the promise of sitting on one of the thrones with the Savior, to rule and reign with him in righteousness? or does our sister think of the millions who have not had the opportunity of having heard of God's love to the world in the gift of his dear Son our Savior? Will they all be condemned for not having heard of God's love to a perishing world? or will they be brought to a knowledge of the truth and be saved? or in other words, will they never hear of God's love to the world?

God says it is his will that all men should come to a knowledge of the truth and be saved; and if it is his will that all should come to a knowledge of the truth, and all have not yet in this, and past ages, had that truth, will not God do as it pleases him? His will is that all should be saved, and come to a knowledge of the truth, and as far as Adam's transgression under death they will be saved from it. See Ezek. xviii. 4 and 20.

Where people generally close the door of mercy, God throws it wide open, for he says God's mercy endureth forever.

D. B. SALTER.

DEAR BRETHREN:—It has been some time since I gave a report of my travels and labors. Since my last report, I visited New Palestine. Had a good meeting, and the few encouraged. The next week I spent in Indianapolis. Held two meetings at Bro. Wilkins, and preached twice in the city park. While there I immersed one man into the one body, the true brother is able to defend the truth, as he is a public speaker. He once was with the Christian or Campbellite church. He has been investigating the truths of the Bible for some time, and he is able to stand before kings. The brethren need that kind of a man among them. He and Bro. Cox are both able to defend the truth. Sister Sharpe and daughter have returned from California again, and will be a help to the little flock there. From Indianapolis I visited Laketon, but owing to the bad roads and rainy weather, there was but few out; and my health was quite poor at the time. From there I visited the brethren and sisters near Bro. Henry Messimore's, but my health was bad during the meeting. But Bro. J. L. Wince came to the meeting and assisted me. The next Sunday I was with him at Bro. Gullins, in Huntington county, but the weather was bad for meeting. Then I went to Wolcot, in White county, and held meeting a few nights and over Sunday. This has new point. There is but two believers in the place, Brother and Sister Jones. He is a good brother, and is not backward in talking the truth. May God bless them and save them in his kingdom.

The Debate at Remington, Ind.

As this debate was in some respects an unusual one, a report may not be uninteresting or unprofitable to the readers of the RESTITUTION. But to understand the merits of the case a few preliminary facts should be made known before detailing the positions and arguments of the debate itself.

The place where it was held is a thriving village of 1,000 or 1,200 inhabitants, on the Toledo, Peoria & Wabash R. R., in Jasper county, Indiana. The inhabitants are an intelligent, honest, fair minded people; but generally uninformed on the questions debated.

Like the world in general, they are given to money making and pleasure seeking more than to Bible reading; but, while attached to their faith, they are open to conviction. The Methodist and Congregational churches take the lead in the place, but the Disciples are, or were at one time, numerous and active, proselyting and belligerent. There is also a large Catholic element in the place, whose sympathies were steadily and strongly in favor of my opponent throughout the contest.

The truth had never been fairly presented in the place. Brother Waggoner held a series of meetings there at one time, but the prejudice was so strong he did not have a fair hearing. Brother Reed spoke a few times; also Brother Winslow. Brother Halstead had attempted several times to sustain the truth, but the opposition became more and more bitter till bigotry reached its climax by thrusting him out of their synagogues. Nevertheless through it all the right prospered and the more honest and candid began to enquire if these things are so. Old Father Babb, proprietor of the Babb house, the sure to call on him; his latch string hangs out to a brother or an honest enquirer; but if you are neither, I wouldn't advise you either way, for I don't like to be responsible for the result; deserves commendation for the zeal he has manifested in the cause. The opposer, who her Jew or Gentile, Greek, Scythian or barbarian, bond or free, has learned to respect and fear his keen blade; while many an honest soul can thank him for the word that set him free.

Through these various instrumentalities many were persuaded to investigate the Word for themselves, and, as is inevitable when they are honest and thorough in the work, were convinced of the truth; among these were several members of the disciple church, and when convinced they would not keep silent. Hence, trouble and confusion, ferment and opposition, which culminated in a general wish for a debate. Of course some of our people are always to be found who are ready to accommodate belligerent spirits of that sort, and happening along at the right time, and speaking a few times, it fell to my lot to gratify the wish.

And this is how the debate came about: Learning that the Disciple church were exceedingly anxious for the contest, and that their pastor, W. B. Hendryx, would not challenge, but would accept if challenged, I sent him the following letter:

REMINGTON, Ind., Nov. 26, '75.

ELDER W. B. HENDRYX:

Dear Brother:—A desire has been expressed by several prominent men of this place, (and among them some who are members of your society,) to have the differences between us on the question of man's nature discussed in public. For my own part I am willing, when my arrangements will justify, to do so. But if when you are ready I am not, I will furnish a representative man to take my place. As to the form of the proposition, that is a matter of little moment. Any set of words that will correctly express either your faith or mine will be satisfactory to me and my brethren. So I leave it for you to frame the proposition to suit yourself, and I will take either the affirmative or negative as you choose. Unfortunately, I am here by accident, as it were, and must leave in the morning for Plymouth, and thence to Michigan, but will return or send a man when you are ready. Please respond at your convenience and oblige

Yours for the Truth alone,

J. F. WILLCOX.

To this Mr. Hendryx responded as follows:

REMINGTON, Ind., Nov. 26, '75.

ELDER J. F. WILLCOX:

Dear Brother:—Yours of to-day is before me. I accept your proposition to debate at a convenient time. I am under promise to hold two protracted meetings of indefinite extent, and can not well engage in the proposed debate before they are over. I will correspond with you in reference to propositions.

Should anything occur that I should not be enabled to engage personally, I will furnish a worthy man for the occasion.

In the love of the truth,

Yours, &c.,

W. B. HENDRYX.

This was followed by a correspondence in which propositions for debate were fully discussed, and upon which we could not agree. It is unnecessary here to introduce it, as it is quite voluminous; but I will add that the impression I received through it was that Elder H. did not care whether we agreed on propositions or not.

After my removal to Goodland, in March, the project of the debate was again revived, and in answer to a telegram I went down, and for the first time met my antagonist, and without much difficulty three questions were decided upon for debate.

The debate began Monday, April 3d, in Exchange Hall, a fine, large, commodious hall, capable of seating, when filled, between 400 and 500 people, owned by Messrs. Shaw & McIntire, bankers and real estate agents, and members of the Disciple church. About three full weeks were spent on the three questions, one week to each. Two weeks continuous debating, evenings only, but Sundays excepted, on the questions of the nature of man and the punishment of the wicked was followed by four weeks' intermission. Then the kingdom question was disposed of in another week.

My antagonist is a gentleman of about 40, a diligent student and a well read man; small of stature, mercurial temperament, good reasoning powers, and more than usual oratorical ability; a fluent, rapid speaker, and made, favoring circumstances a pleasant, genial, good natured man, and as honest as a bad cause put into desperate straits, which must be defended at all hazards, would permit him to be. With the truth on his side, he would make a powerful workman, and a dangerous antagonist. And I do not altogether abandon the hope that it may sometime be that he shall contend for the truth as ably as no opposed it in the debate.

With a few exceptional instances, now deplored by all parties, the debate was unusually free from personalities and irritating incidents, and passed off pleasantly.

The truth, as always, so now, had to contend with the prejudices of the entire community, and their organized opposition. Mr. Hendryx was at first the accepted champion of the entire Orthodox population, Protestant and Catholics; and if they in a measure withdrew their influence and support before its close in consequence of absurd or untenable positions taken by him, let them consider fairly how much was due to a bad cause, and ask themselves if they could have done better. No man could ask better auspices under which to perform a task. A large number of his preaching brethren, including Messrs. Walker and Robinson, of Kokomo, who are regarded as experts by their denomination, were with him almost constantly to give him all the moral and material aid possible; he had the sympathy and support of the religious part of the community, as before remarked; he was at home, among his friends and in the bosom of the church of which he is pastor; he had the advantage of an extensive library and unlimited control of the purses of his friends, to supply any book that was lacking; and last but not least, being a prominent Free Mason, he had the sympathy and support of all secret society men, which I discovered meant something when a decision of the chair was required.

On My own part my only assistant was Brother Kendall, then a stranger and a member of their denomination, but in sympathy with us on the questions debated; and he was with me only on the first two questions debated. Added to these difficulties was the fact that it was impossible to obtain a fit man for chairman—an unbiased, capable gentleman.

We each chose a moderator, and they chose the chairman. During the debate no less than five chairmen were chosen, and they were without exception, strong Hendryx men. Three of them were members of his church, one a Free Mason and a warm friend of Mr. Hendryx, and one a Presbyterian, deeply imbued with a sense of the horrible character of our faith, and, per consequence, a bitter enemy to it; howbeit, a genial, pleasant man.

Thus, single handed and alone, the truth contended for the mastery before a packed bench and jury—and won! Clearly and unmistakably won! Entered the stronghold of error, battered down her bulwarks, and delivered many joyful captives.

To God be all the glory.

Conference Notice.

PARIS ILL., JULY 3, 1876.

BRO. REED:—The Conference by Bro. Amos Sanford is to be held July 27, 1876, six miles south-west of Paris, near Bro. T. A. Young's. Brethren coming here by railway can stop at Paris, where there will be teams to convey them to the place of meeting. Those coming from the south, will stop off at Swango station. Come one, and all, and let us have a good meeting. Any further information can be had by writing to G. J. Humphreys.

BUSINESS DEPARTMENT.

Put Your Name on this List.

Recently quite a number of brethren have concluded that as easy and effectual way to get the truth before the minds of the people is to send them the RESTITUTION for three months. This is a good decision. It is almost impossible for the paper to be received and read by any household for three months without its making an impression upon their minds for good. So send on your names and money. We hope to have a goodly number report. The following is a list of those we already have above referred to:

Let Your Light Shine.

In view of the great work before us, and that this is the great year among the American people, it has been decided, by some of our brethren to have a general distribution of tracts at Philadelphia. Some have already responded to the suggestion. Let every one do his or her duty in this direction. Tracts will be forwarded as soon as we get enough responses to the enterprise. Let all act at once.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The undersigned would beg leave to call the attention of the brethren of the One Faith to the proposed conference at Philadelphia, to be held on the third Friday in September, 1876, and continue until the succeeding Sunday night. I would likewise call on the brethren who are readers of the RESTITUTION to announce the same to the several churches, as is recommended at the last conference. By this means we hope that all of like precious faith that possibly can come, will come, and that we may have a happy time in greeting, and in assembling with each other.

It is unnecessary for me to speak of the other numerous attractions in the city of Philadelphia at this time, where may be seen a sample of the "wonders of the Gentiles."

Brethren from Canada, and from the West and South, and from Europe are particularly requested to meet with us, and let us have the pleasure of their society, though but for a short time.

In accordance with a resolution passed at our last conference, to the effect that those who could would subscribe 50 cents a month, less or more, in order to help to defray the expenses of the meeting, so that we may be of as much burden as possible to the brethren here in Philadelphia. All subscriptions should be sent to Brother I. Wetherill, 122 Court St., Brooklyn.

Brethren who intend to come, will please send a postal card to Justice H. Dull, 6 N. Canal st., Philadelphia, Pa.

J. F. WILLCOX,
Secretary of Conference.

The annual conference of the Church of God in the state of Indiana, will convene at Antioch church house, five miles south of Plymouth, and two miles north of Argos, on Wednesday at 2 o'clock p. m. August 16, 1876.

As there are several papers relative to church and general organization to be read for the edification and deliberation of the brotherhood, and much other business to be attended to, it is desirable that the brethren and delegates be prompt in attendance at the first of the meeting.

It is also desirable that the congregations send their delegates fully instructed as to pledges in the missionary work, that we may be able to make a forward move another year.

Brethren from other states are invited to attend our meeting.

Plymouth can be reached from the east or west by the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad, and from the north by the Indianapolis, Peru & Chicago Railroad. Those attending from the south will stop Argos, on the L. P. & C. R. R.

Greek Concordance. A Critical Greek and English Concordance of the New Testament, by C. F. Hudson. This is a work of 668 pages, sufficiently small to be made a convenient companion, by one traveling. Every Minister and Bible Student ought to possess a copy. Price, cloth, $2 00.

Bagster's Bibles, with Marginal readings and references between the verses. They are printed on clear, strong paper, and well bound. Plain Roan Binding, gilt edges, $2 50. Full Turkey Morocco, gilt edges, $6. Another one, with larger type, beautifully printed and easily read by tallow lamps. Roan binding, $3 75. Turkey Morocco, $6 00.

The Doctrine of Immortality. By James H. Whitemore. This is a work that has been in market several years. But it is an exhaustive treatise upon the subject of Immortality, and sets forth the Bible view in a masterly manner. Every student should have it in his library for reference as well as used as a text book in their studies. Every one should have it in the hands of their friends to read, as well as used in loaning to those who are feeling after truth. It contains 300 pages. Paper covers, 60 cents.

Bagster's Diaglott containing the original Greek Text of what is commonly called the New Testament, according to the Recension of Dr. C. V. Griesbach, with interlineary word for word English translation; a new Emphatic Version, based on the latter inspiry translation, on the readings of ancient versions, and on the various readings of the Vatican Manuscript, (No. 1,209 in the Vatican Library,) together with Elucidations and explanatory foot notes, and a copious selection of references, to the whole of which is added a valuable alphabetical appendix. 504 pages, 12 mo. bound neatly in cloth. Price $4. Extra bound in leather, $5.

I See.

"Whereas I was blind, now I see." John ix. 25.

Whence Jesus came, I cannot tell,
Nor why he came to me:
One thing I know, and know it well,
Though I was blind,—I see.
I once was blind, but now I see!
I see,
And that is news enough for me.

When all was dark, One touched my eyes,
And that is all I know;
For light came down from paradise,
And all my soul aglow.
I once was blind, but now I see!
I see,
And that is light enough for me.

How it was done, I cannot say,
Nor even think nor dream.
Nor what a touch of medicated clay
Should make things what they seem.
Once I was blind, but now I see!
I see,
And that is truth enough for me.

It is the Son of God! His grace
Makes trembling weakness strong,
Wipes tears away from Sorrow's face,
And tunes grief a song.
I once was blind, but now I see!
I see,
And that is joy enough for me.

The law of sight I may not guess,
Nor reason out my views;
For faith itself is meaningless
For Pharisees and Jews.
I once was blind, but now I see!
I see,
And that is faith enough for me.

The Resurrection.

Brother Reed:

Permit me to suggest a few timely thoughts on the late arguments of our brethren concerning the all-important theme, viz: the resurrection of the dead. It is due to your readers, and the cause of truth demands, that we have some thought to guide in the right direction.

We shall not go into a labored argument on the subject, because we have had argument in the line of complicated theorizing, and Scripture quoting till it has become stale. We protest against this mode of dealing with the Scriptures. What we want first is to establish true and honest principles. The truth can then be reached just as easily as we can prove any simple sum in mathematics.

It is admitted on all sides, and is a fundamental principle in all argument that if our premises are wrong, our conclusions will be wrong. Hence the importance of starting right. All theories have their arguments, and any amount of Scripture can be and is quoted to support the false notions inhabiting the mind of man. But it is strange that such men as J. M. S. and A. B. M., occupying the positions they do relative to the Bible, should make such fatal mistakes. But it is not strange that men with such marked ability, words and language at their command, can and do make their arguments look plausible. But what does all this amount to, if regardless of first and correct principles? It amounts to just this: It will avail nothing against the authority of God and nature—or against sound, logical reasoning and common sense.

The first grave mistake made by all parties when treating on this subject is in the nature and constitution of man.

We have too many points to notice here in this short article to go into detail, and therefore state in substance. There is too high an estimate placed upon man. He is put into the scale of being where he does not belong. We have the right to protest against any theory which sets forth man to be what we know he is not.

What is man? By nature man is just what God has made him, and he acts out that nature in common with all other animals. And in point of character and law, God does not regard or recognize man any more than any lower animals, when only there is an adjustment of the animal forces. A just God cannot punish that which he has caused to exist. Sin and crime is a disease. It is not a matter of choice, but of necessity. Men are of necessity good or bad, as they are of necessity white or black. Sin being a disease, is no more a fault to be punished than is smallpox or malaria. And the only way out of this contamination, is to follow the line marked out by God. His precepts are given solely to govern our animal natures.

This line of argument is the true basis of man's nature. It must be readily perceived by all thinking minds, where and how the argument will end when carried out in all of its points.

And now, to claim from these principles, that God will retaliate and hold mankind responsible for all the acts of frail human nature, with a two-fold retribution to follow,—one beyond this life,—has no foundation in the Bible, and is out of joint with all philosophy of reasoning.

The fact is, God has made everything subject to cause and effect—and a penalty is attached to every transgression of law natural or revealed, and to be meted out in this life only. We have the foundation principle laid down in God's word thus: "The wages of sin is death." Paul says it is appointed unto men once to die" not to die twice. The Interpreter as the Ends, we can not mistake the nature and penalty of God's constitutional law, and the one death for all of Adam's race, any more than we can mistake the constitutional law of any state in regard to crime. We find no honest judge or jury striving to evade or change the statue law of a state, but they seek to maintain the integrity of such laws. We should be as reasonable and consistent in regard to divine law.

Who are the presuming parties who are striving to alter and warp God's law to the fancied, wild notions of men? Certainly we cannot be the guilty party, from the simple fact that we are in harmony with Paul. We establish the law. It will not answer to parry the force of this by claiming the above quotation, with the context, Heb. ix. 27, "But after this the judgment," has reference to a future retribution and judgment for all of Adam's race. The fact is, Paul had in view the first giving the law to Adam. The whole Scripture quoted has reference to Adam and God's dealing with him, and whatever we find in this instance is the standard principle to govern the whole world.

Adam must first have a law before he could transgress law. It is plain, in the history of Adam's case, and in God's dealing with the race, that dying is not the penalty of God's law. The wages of sin is death—therefore death is the penalty.

Adam was made mortal, subject to decay and death. But he was on trial for life, and that life was made conditional by, or in giving the law; and as Adam had no knowledge of his origin and destiny, God made the same known to him by telling him he should die if he ate of the forbidden fruit. And by this offense Adam forfeited all right and claim to eternal life. The result was as follows:

A judicial and executive judgment. Adam had a fair and honest trial, and a direct examination, and was found guilty. The Judge of all the universe passes sentence as the final result. "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return."

Please bear in mind that death is a state, and there is no reprieve from this death state, only by complying with God's terms of saving men. Adam had his day of trial, the antediluvians had theirs, and we have our's,—all governed by the same immutable law, and the same result must naturally follow.

As a body of believers, we occupy the same position to-day in regard to the resurrection of the dead as Paul, the Scribes, Pharisees and Sadducees did in their day. In regard to the two identical positions, there is a particular doctrine that demands strict attention, viz: the resurrection of the just and the unjust.

We quote from A. B. Magruder's article: "A firm believer of the opposite conclusion—that there shall be a resurrection (as Paul teaches,) of the just and unjust."

We emphatically deny that Paul taught or believed in the doctrine of the resurrection of just and unjust. We have have had enough speculation on this subject, and it is high time for proof in support of this assumption. We will accept as evidence any precept or example found in the Bible, where God has recognized or ever will recognize but two parties, good and bad, or righteous and unrighteous. We want no parables as proof. We have yet to learn that an infinite, just God has so varied in his dealings with the world of mankind, and that human nature has so changed, that this nineteenth century has brought forth a third party, to be dealt with in contradistinction to former dispensations. If the same demand be required as proof at our hands, give us time and space, and it shall be forthcoming.

The doctrine of the resurrection of just and unjust is based solely on Acts xxiv. 15. There are some characteristic features overlooked or ignored by our brethren in the history of Paul's case in this instance. Therefore we propose to notice them, and endeavor to draw out the truth.

It would seem by the arguments advanced that Paul had misstated his case, or did not understand the issue between the contending parties. But modern theologians have discovered the great secret. We prefer Paul's version.

"Men and brethren, I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee; of the hope and resurrection of the dead, I am called in question. And when he had so said, there arose a dissention between the Pharisees and the Sadducees; and the multitude was divided, for the Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel nor spirit. But the Pharisees confess both. And there arose a great cry; and the Scribes that were of the Pharisees' part arose, and strove, saying, we find no evil in this man."

We have quoted at length here for the purpose of a correct understanding as we proceed in the investigation of the matter:

I. Paul has forever settled the point that the only question at issue was the resurrection of the dead.

II. Who were Paul's most bitter enemies, and the ones most prominent in the strife to persecute him?

The history of the church in all past time declares that with the strictest sect of religionists has existed the persecuting element, and this class are the bitterest enemies to the reformers and dissenters from their craft. Paul was a Jew, a reformer, a dissenter from the Pharisees' craft, and were his most bitter enemies from the foregoing and following reasons:

1. The Scribes withdrew from the contest, finding no fault with Paul.

2. It could not be the Sadducees, for they believed in no resurrection.

1. Paul addressed a party who believed in a general resurrection, therefore the Pharisees must be the accusing party.

We have now driven this question to its last extremity and obvious conclusions:

4. Both parties believed in the resurrection of the dead, but both did not believe in the resurrection of the just and unjust. "And have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust."

2. Paul could not endorse the Pharisaic view from the fact that theer were conflicting opinions between them in regard to the resurrection of the dead. Who ever heard of a case where one party was striving against another, with harmony of sentiment? No such case can be found. The most bitter enemy will sympathize with you where there is perfect harmony of sentiment.

3. Paul could not endorse the sentiment of the Pharisees, from the simple fact that he never taught the doctrine in his epistles, and all his arguments, here and elsewhere, are totally against it.

4. Paul, to be in harmony with the whole tenor of the Scriptures, and the pious Jews, must necessarily have believed in a partial resurrection of the righteous only.

The proof that the pious Jews did not believe in the resurrection of the wicked will be found in the history of the Jews. 2 Maccabees vii. 1–41.

Now, to claim from these principles that Paul believed in the resurrection of the just and unjust, is begging the question, and tampering with Paul. With the same propriety of reasoning we should say that because J. M. S. advocates a universal resurrection, we, as a body of believers, believe the same.

The word all demands a brief reply before we close our remarks. As J. M. S. is so technical and precise in his play on words, we will apply the same.

The word all is limited or unlimited. If it can be proven in one instance where it is limited, the link is broken in the chain. This proposition can be sustained in the reading of the Bible where the word all is limited. We give one example: "For as in Adam all die." 1 Cor. xv. 22. If the word all is here unlimited, it embraces Enoch and Elijah in the death; this rule will not work, because these worthies did not die. The word all being limited, therefore, explodes the universality of the resurrection.

Respectfully submitted.
G. F. MITCHELL.

"Holy Ghost, or Holy Spirit—Which?"

By request of Bro.'s O. B. I. C., and S. A. C., of the RESTITUTION, I send you the following items:

Our translators are not responsible for the changes in the meaning of words of the living languages into which the Scriptures have been translated. Spoken languages are changeable and progressive. Language, being the medium of thought, varies with the thought.

As new objects take the place of old ones, so do new words, and old words and expressions become obsolete. King James' translation is now at fault in this particular.

Words part with their original signification, and, sometimes, take opposite meanings. A sample is found in 1 Thess. iv. 15: "Shall not prevent them which are asleep." The word "prevent," now signifies to hinder. Its original meaning was, go before, from "pre," before, and "venio," I go. That is evidently its meaning in the passage above, and was so understood by the translators.

"Ghost," belongs to the same class of unfortunate words—orphans. Ghost and spirit are the English of Saxon gast-gast, and the Latin spiritus,—breath. Ghost and spirit, originally, had the same meaning. "Holy Ghost," and "Holy spirit," are the translations of one expression, and have the same meaning, holy breathing, or breath.

"Hell," is another of the unfortunates. Its original import was, "covering"—Anglo-Saxon. A house was "helled," from the word "helan"—to cover. A wound was helled, covered, healed—cured. It was then used in a good, now in a bad sense.

Ghost and spirit are the English renderings, of the Saxon and Latin translations of the Greek πνευμα—breath, wind, air. If our language had continued stationery, ghost and spirit would now, as formerly, convey the same idea.

The Greek name of our modern "ghost," φαντασμα—phantom—the creation of a diseased brain. As the two ideas were expressed in Greek Scriptures by two different words the law would require a similar variation in the translations, which would be φαντασμα—phantom, and not ghost.

The unpopular reading of Luke xxiv. 37, is πνευμα and not φαντασμα. The same also in verses 39, 50, also, in Matt. xiv. 24, 25; Mark vi. 49. There are three words in Greek to represent three ideas. παρακλητος—comforter—Jno. xiv. 16, 26; xv. 26; xvi; vii. 7. φαντασμα—phantom; and πνευμα—spirit. Translations, to avoid obscurity, should keep this fact distinctly in view.

The rise of the term ghost is equally objectionable in the Old Testament translation. It is found in Gen. xxv. 8; xxxv. 29; xlix. 33; Job x. 18; xi. 20; xiv. 10, and Jer. xv. 9.

In translating the Hebrew of Gen. xxv. 8, which describes the death of Abraham, our English version says: "Abraham gave up the ghost and died." In Gen. xxxv. 29, it said—"Isaac gave up the ghost and died." In Gen. xlix. 33, we have, "Jacob gathered up his feet into his bed and yielded up the ghost." Each was, in his personality, "gathered to his people," and yet, in the estimation of modern expositors, by the expression, "gave up the ghost," each one is to be understood as surrendering his immortal, conscious entity, called by them his deathless spirit, or soul, to God—who takes it into heaven, while he (who?) goes to his people—the congregation of the dead. The original of the sentence, "Abraham gave up the ghost," conveys no such an idea. The meaning of the Saxon translation is, gave up his breath.

The Hebrew of Gen. xxv. 8, is—"Wa yigwa wa yamuth Abraham." "Abraham breathed out (that which God breathed into his nostrils) and died." Substitute the Saxon and Latin translations (rendered into English) and we have the idea as above stated, which is true to nature. Abraham, first, breathed out his breath (not his ghost, as now understood); then his life ceased. The breath stops; then organic action, or life. That is not a translation which covers or conceals the original meaning; for translation is the removing of an idea from one language to another. God breathes in, man breathes out.

The same Hebrew words are used to describe the deaths of Isaac and Jacob. Gen. xxxv. 29, and xlix. 33.

In Job x. 18, the same word "yigwa" is translated gave up the ghost. In Job xi. 20, it is maphpach blast, or breathing out; from naphach, and napheh life—margin, puff of breath. The same idea is continued. The same rendering of yigwa is found in Job xiv. 10. In Jer. xv. 9, the Hebrew is naphach—breathed out, and naphesh—breath or life.

It is said of Jesus (Matt. xxvii. 50), "he yielded up the ghost." Greek—αφηκε το πνευμα—"he emitted, or sent forth the breath." In Acts v. 10, "she yielded up the ghost." Greek—εξεψυξε—breathed out.

Parallel with Matt. xxvii. 50, are Mark xv. 37, and Luke xxiii. 46. Mark xv. 37, is εξεπνευσε—breathed out, and Luke xxiii. 46, is εκπνευσας—breathed out. Same idea is continued. In Matt. xx, is breathed out the breath, and in Mark and Luke it is simply, breathed out.

In conclusion allow me to say:—

1. A word in the translation which does not express the original idea, should be discarded.

2. Ghost, as now understood, does not express the original idea. Therefore,

3. Ghost should be discarded.

J. P. WEETHEE.

A deputation of the Nestorian Christians of Koordistan has been sent to England to ask protection from Mohammedan oppression, and the establishment of English missions. The result of the appeal to the government has been a call for an official report of the facts from her Majesty's minister at Teheran. The planting of a mission has also been considered. The American Presbyterians are now conducting missions among the Nestorians of the plain with great success. They have, however, found it hitherto impracticable to occupy the mountain region of Koordistan, which the English are invited to take.

Jesus and the Intermediate State.

When I saw the length of Bro. J. P. Weethee's paper in the RESTITUTION of June 7th, I anticipated a degree of attention to the points which seem to me always over-looked in the brethren's discussions of this question of the intermediate state. Is it a state, or is it a blank where nothing remains of that which was, to be again manifested in bodily form?

Bro. Weethee has endeavored to explain the peculiarity of the action of Jesus in using or framing such a parable as that of the rich man and Lazarus, but all he advances is really contained in this sentence: "It may appear so (inconsistent) to some; certainly not to every reader." All the Scripture he quotes in proof of their being no device nor knowledge in the grave is beside the question. The one attempt made to meet the difficulty, for evidently it is so regarded, is towards the conclusion of the paper where it remarked that if the spirit can in a figure animate trees and stones, etc., there is nothing extraordinary in giving a similar action and life to the dead Dives and Lazarus. That is very good so far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. We may in this way animate all inanimate nature and nobody will be misled by our doing so, but will any of the brethren who preach the Gospel as Bro. Weethee understands it, risk such a parable as Jesus used and leave his audience—who are all unbelievers in the conscious state of the dead—without any explanation whatever regarding what he actually believes concerning the dead. I repeat that he could never dream of it. There is no significant silence upon this, and also the fact that it was the popular idea of the day in which Jesus taught, that the dead were conscious in spirit. Bro. Weethee says that if we believed the dead to be conscious we should never apply the term sleep to their condition. I cannot say what he could or could not do, but this is patent to all that multitudes of sane and educated people speak of the dead just in such a way—as asleep—and yet those people believe them to be conscious and very much awake indeed. He must surely see that such arguments based upon the mere meanings of words rather than upon their use, are futile and valueless. In all times the popular expression has been "sleep" to indicate death. It is common for example in the catacombs where very early tombs exist, bearing inscriptions, and yet all these sleepers and they who are for the time survived them, believed in a conscious spiritual existence. We should therefore distinguish between things that differ. But to show how absurd it is to push word meanings, independent of usage. I might insist that since the New Testament phrase for death, in many instances, is sleep, therefore the dead person is alive. Otherwise sleep would be a word totally inapplicable to his condition, but Bro. Weethee will doubtless report that I am too nice on my literality, if not positively non-sensical. But were I to do this it would not differ a particle from Bro. Weethee's proceeding in regard to the word "sleep." I hope this is all plain enough, for time and printer's space are valuable and should not be occupied with what has no bearing upon the question in hand. The course which Jesus adopted in using this parable of Dives and Lazarus has yet to be justified if the dead are utterly unconscious. He did what no preacher in connection with the RESTITUTION ever has done, or ever would think of doing. Can no one explain how this came about?

I will suggest another phrase of this topic for reflection which I have never seen even remotely alluded to in these pages.

If it was the popular conception of the state of the dead in apostolic times, that their spirits survived the dissolution of the body, why is this popular error, if it be one—not exposed, exploded, denounced and condemned, and if not with the same force of language as is employed now by writers in the RESTITUTION, at least as thoroughly and pointedly by the apostolic writers? Did they not estimate the evil—if it be an evil—to be of so disastrous a character as the brethren do now. One would actually conclude that the very same evil would attach to the belief then as is affirmed of it now. But the apostles are silent. They say not a word in condemnation of the idea. Is this silence significant of anything or is it purely accidental and unintentional? I think myself it is highly significant and cannot partly be left out of any honest consideration of the question. Well, here are two points—the silence of Scripture in reference to the condemnation of the doctrine, and the fact, which no one can dispute, that it was the popular idea of the time, to be looked fairly in the face in to what we have already advanced touching the positive countenance given to the popular idea of Jesus, and which, did space allow me, could show was not confined to him. We before mentioned the case of Stephen committing his spirit to Christ. The apostle's idea of a spirit, etc., we rather lament the disposition to ignore these and similar points while profusely repeating that which does not stand in need, particularly of multifarious reproduction or advancing something as an argument which is apparently expected to do duty for another thing not mentioned.

But I must conclude and simply send this to our good editor without any request for its publication. We have asked so much of him already, but as we consider ourselves a little out of the beaten track, and feeling it somewhat of a duty to suggest these things, we do so when he cries: "Hold enough!" We still subside into the golden atmosphere of silence, so far as the channel is concerned.

One word more. Will any reader give us the result of his thought—upon what is left of man after death which will continue in existence of any kind and be raised again in the form of the personality that died. If nothig positive were affirmed of the death state nothing positive could reasonably be expected in reply, but it is otherwise, and I should like to see this also get some attention.

Interesting Paragraphs.

A society has been formed in London for the colonization of Syria and Palestine with Christian settlers from England. At a recent meeting one of the speakers was the Rev. Dr. Bliss, of the American Presbyterian College at Beirut, who strongly advocated the scheme. There is already a German settlement on Mount Carmel, which is represented as being very prosperous.

We have already referred to the various projects for flooding portions of the Sahara Desert, the French proposing to introduce the waters of the Mediterranean, and the British those of the Atlantic. We now learn that Mr. M'Kenzie, the originator of the latter project, is about to leave London for Western Africa to make the necessary preliminary surveys for turning the waters of the Atlantic into the great sink basin which extends from the valley of the Delta to Timbuctoo: He is confident that a canal eight or nine miles in length will accomplish his object, and bring the mysterious capital of equatorial Africa within six or seven days' sail of the Thames.

The Positivists have organized a church in the city of New York. The "First Congregation of the Religion of Humanity" filed their certificate of incorporation with the County Clerk on Saturday, June 10. The objects of the incorporation are thus stated: (1) to develop and extend the knowledge of the synthetic or religious value of Science and Humanity; (2) to present them, instead of theology, as the basis and substance of religion; (3) to practice and promote this religion as the foundation of religious and social duty. Religion was not included in Comte's first exposition of his system. Conceiving all separate personal existences to be represented by a unit which he termed Humanity, he in his later years presented this as the object of our homage. Thus the philosophy which at first denied the possibility of religion, created as its last work a religion of its own.

We commend to the notice of the New York Tablet the following outrages upon Protestants by the priest party in Mexico, for the sole offense of loving God's Word: The Rev. Maxwell Phillips was assaulted at Queretaro on the 23d of April, and nearly murdered. The Rev. M. N. Hutchinson writes from the city of Mexico, under date of May 13, "We have just buried two brethren from San Lorenzo who were murdered last Thursday night. One of them, a judge" (whose murder has been described in this intelligence), "and the most influential member of our church in that place, died exhorting the few brethren who were near not to fear to confess or die for Jesus." Will the Tablet insist that they were all served right?

A correspondent of the Examiner and Chronicle sends a condensed summary of the religious statistics of Canada, which, though not new, are worth repeating. The Roman Catholics in the Dominion are in numbers about 1,500,000; the Episcopalians, 500,000; the Presbyterians, a little over 500,000; the Methodists show an excess of a few thousands over the Presbyterians; and the Baptists count 200,000. These figures represent populations. From 1861 to 1871, according to this writer the Roman Catholics in Canada increased eight per cent., the Episcopalians a trifle over six per cent., the Presbyterians fifteen per cent., the Methodists twenty-seven per cent., and the Baptists thirteen per cent. During the decade the entire population of the Dominion increased twelve and a quarter per cent.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Indulgence.

What great evils we see around us continually by indulgence. The first, and most apparent evil, is that of indulging in the use of ardent spirits. We see the gallant youth starting out in life, full of expectation and manly pride, and promising to prove a blessing to his fellowmen; but he is drawn by evil associates into the glittering saloon, he drinks, it is but moderately at first, and he, and his associates are delighted; he, that he can bear them company; they, that one more is added to their number. No evil is yet felt; none is apprehended; he would be frightened, and chagrined, if he was told that he would fill a drunkard's grave. But he indulges. The cup that was once pressed to his lips for the sake of admiration, is now drained of its fiery contents for the purpose of quenching the fire that burns within; and the draught only adds to the flame. All persons of honor shun him; he becomes dejected, abased; looses all self-respect; and his ruin is complete. So much for indulging in fiery drink. But this is by no means the only form of indulgence which ruins. Indulgence in the use of tobacco is almost as deleterious, and is indulged in, even by children of very tender years. The person who uses tobacco, lays the foundation for numerous diseases, creates a desire for something more stimulating, and, not unfrequently, fills a drunkard's grave. Although these two evils attract the most attention, yet we find another evil as soul-killing in its effects as they; it is the use of light and trifling conversation. This is an evil indulged in by both sexes. How often we meet with persons who can use but little else than idle and silly talk. Let us see what Christ said concerning this, Matt. xii. 36-37, I say unto you; that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment. For by thy words shalt thou be justified, and by thy words shalt thou be condemned. In view of these facts, how very careful we should be not to use ourselves, or encourage in others, the use of idle talk; but, strange to say, this evil is rather encouraged than suppressed. The mother will laugh at the silly remarks of her daughter, and place in her hands the sensational novel, filled with everything light and idle, for the purpose of aiding to her store. Can they, do they, ever think that for these they shall be brought into judgment? Many a young lady, who would be horrified at the approach of an intoxicated person, is damning her own soul by idle talk, which is as expressly forbidden in the Scriptures as drunkenness. And, again, there is the indulging in evil thoughts. This is an evil in which all take a part. None can say, I am exempt; many, perhaps, do not think of the conspicuous place which this occupies. There is no evil that has not first had its origin in thought. Then to avoid sin we must continually pray, and let none think he stands lest he fall. And there is another fault which professed Christians almost exclusively indulge in. It is indulging preachers. In this they mean no evil; their fault arises from too great a fondness for manworship—from looking upon their preachers as demi-gods—in bowing to them as low as the Catholic bows to the Pope; in looking upon them as being above fault, and as being, seemingly, a race distinct from, and superior to the race to which they belong, seeming to forget that they are men of passion like themselves. How often we see the minister exalted by a fond congregation, especially if he be one gifted by many talents. Many a bright light owes its wane to too much admiration, just as the plant reared in the hot-bed, and unused to the winds and storms, is unable to resist them. Nor are the congregations alone to be blamed. We see the clergy taking a promiscuous part in the popular sins of the age; church theaters are fashionable; festivals and concerts are given for the purpose of filling the church coffers; and let us notice a few of the evils of festivals, such as church lotteries. It is all right as long as the church is connected with them. The minister takes an active part and puts his name in the hat with the professional gamester, whom he refuses to recognize or notice as he meets him on the street, previous to, or after the festival; he minules with the drunken and is merry, while the house, which should be a house of prayer, is being, for a while, made a den of thieves. O, ye who claim to be watchman on the walls of Zion, why do ye give an uncertain sound? Proclaiming peace when there is no peace? Lulling your charge into a morbid repose with your deceptions. How can you rebuke the riotous gambler from the very pulpit in which you yourself riot and gamble? How can you condemn the sins of which you yourself are guilty? and why beholdest the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye? Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, "Let me pull out the mote out of thine eye, and behold, a beam is in thine own eye. Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye." Matt. vii. 2-4.

And the most ruinous sins which are indulged in to-day, are the popular sins. They are ruinous, because they are not held in check by the disapproval of men. And, although we blush to say it, yet we must acknowledge that there are but very few of us that do not court the favor of man more than the favor of God.

We see dancing indulged in by young professors without the disapprobation of the older, although they cannot but know that God is not glorified there; but that he is shut out, and the young disciple bows reverentially before the shrine of folly; and the downward course of many can be traced to such amusements. And, again, there is the novel reader. This sin is indulged in quite freely by young professors, and not unfrequently by the old; forgetting that whosoever loveth and maketh a lie, can have no admittance to the tree of life. Rev. xxii. 15. And now, dear young brethren, and all who are indulging in that in which your conscience tells you God can take no pleasure. Let me say to you desist, and, O, heed the voice of warning. Hear the watchman when he urges you to vigilance; remember the Divine injunction is, "Watch and pray;" then let not the seductions of the enchanted ground, on which you walk, lull you into the sleep from which you will awake only to hear pronounced the sentence which damns you to an eternity of darkness. Can you, young miss, or you, young man, meet the Lord holding in your hand the latest novel or the card deck? Could you say, "Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him?" Is there any watching and praying in your conduct? Is it not simply a headlong rushing into the things which displease Jehovah? Have you considered well the end of your course? Are you sure you can say at the end, "I have fought the good fight, I have kept the faith?" Are your garments washed and made clean in the blood of the Lamb, when you are pouring over some love story which you firmly believe never was a reality? Are you pointing sinners to the Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world? Do you in the many dances tell those around you of the goodness of God? You answer no; does your conscience give you no trouble in passing from the ball room, the festal board, or the reading room, where you have been pouring over the latest sensational novel, to the prayer meeting where you feign to give to God your whole heart? Where you feign to give to him your whole life and labor? Where you declare boldly your intention of living distinct from the world, and to wallow no more in the mires of sin? Remember, you may deceive man, but God knoweth the heart; and likewise remember that God is as far from mammon as the east is from the west, and that you cannot serve two masters. You can not expect to enjoy the vanities of this world, and enter upon the enjoyment of the world to come. Dear brethren and friends, we live in an age of delusion, in an age the darkest since the existence of the church; because many are putting new things for old, and old things for new; the darkest, because Satan strikes secretly, and not openly, as he formerly did, but draws us away by black guides dressed in white, and binds us with the fetters of sin, without lacerating us, as we can perceive; or causing us to groan sadly because, through the wiles of a cunning foe, the church is being drawn away after the vanities of this world. Rarely do we meet with a person with the firm heart of Paul. Very few indeed, would now brave death, or the contempt of the world, in planting upon the enemies works the banner of holiness. Oh, brethren, let us be at work. Let us put on the whole armor of faith. A patient and holy Savior calls us. Do you not hear his voice? Do you not realize that the harvest is truly plentiful, and that the laborers are few? We see around grand preparations being made to please the eye of finite man. Do we see any such preparations being made to please the eye of infinite Jehovah? No, O no; We see people crossing the continent for the purpose of witnessing a grand entertainment. Do we see so many going half so far for the purpose of gaining the erring? No. Then again, brethren, let us shake off the lethargy which is creeping over so many of us, and plead with the sinner to no longer indulge in displeasing God; but to forsake evil. Do we not look for the Savior from heaven, and expect his soon coming? Then do not give an uncertain sound, do not say peace, peace, when there is no peace.

Thoughts For Bible-Doubters.

Has God the right to stop any part of the machinery of the Universe that he has put in motion? Can he do it? Has he less of power, fewer of rights than the builders of threshing machines, and steam engines? Must these wonderful works of human ingenuity be kept in motion forever because forsooth, some crazy lunatic says, "the owner has no right to stop them?" What would the owners of the great cylinder press think of such logic?

"But the laws of nature are immutable," says the infidel, "and if the sun, or the moon, or the earth were to stand still, even for a single hour, every orbit of every body in the solar system would be thrown out of place, and dire confusion would be the result." But how does the infidel know, what God can, and what he cannot do? Was he in existence during the cycled ages in which God built up the universe? Does he know the ordinances of heaven? Can he set the dominion thereof in the earth? Can he guide the countless systems on systems of worlds that move in perfect harmony through the far-away depths of space? Where was he when the foundations of the earth were laid.

Poor fool! "Only a few years ago he was a little, squalling baby," now, he presumes to dictate to God! Only a few years ago he took his first lessons in literature from a little red-backed primer, now his wisdom is so profound that it reaches above and beyond that of the infinite Creator. He is so wise, that he can tell just how the world ought to have been made, and what ought to have been done. He believes, or disbelieves God, according to his notion of the fitness of things.

God has no right to violate a fixed law of nature, yet he himself, violates such laws every day. He is constantly fighting against the laws of friction and gravitation. He cannot do so simple a thing, as throwing a stone into the air, without violating law.

The sun has its circuit through the heavens, God might have stopped it if he chose, even at the bidding of Joshua. Or the earth might have stood still and the effect have been the same. But God does no more in the performance of miracles than is absolutely necessary to effect his purpose. Here it was only essential to lengthen the day. That could have been done by the refraction of light, after the sun had really gone down. The figure used in describing the miracle in human language, would have been the same in each case. The sun and moon appeared to stand still, and so were said to stand still, just as we say "the sun rises and sets," when in reality it does no such thing. That the day was lengthened, and lengthened too, "for purposes of slaughter" is a matter of record, and we believe it without any question, because God says, it was so.

But the infidel "does not believe God would have made the sun stand still, for mere purposes of slaughter." Does he know all that God had in view, when he drove out those wicked Canaanites from "the pleasant land," and set his chosen people in their place? Was it not that his name, and his law might have a place in the earth? "that Israel might observe his statues and keep his laws?" See Psa. cv. 44, 45. And constantly hold up in types and shadows the great sacrificial offering that would some day be made for the race?

God has the right to destroy that nation, or nations, whose "cup of iniquity is full" and we may not question that right. We accord the same right to man, when he wants to get rid of the being whose hideous, nameless crimes have made him abhorrent to community. Man destroys the individual that he may purify society; God, the nations that he may reach an ultimate purpose. All the steps that God has taken in the past, have been so many steps in the realization of a plan looking toward the redemption of man, the taking away of the curse and the establishment of a righteous government upon the earth. The infidel would tie God's hands, so he could never do anything: could never rid the universe of evil, make no changes for the better in the laws and government of the world. Yet God works through cycles of change up to perfection.

There are grand changes in prospect for this earth of ours. The time is soon coming when it can literally be said, "thy sun shall no more go down neither shall thy moon withdraw herself" Other suns and other moons are to add their resplendence to the dazzling glories of the new earth. The new heavens are to be literally hers.

Does the infidel grumble when for the safety of society, the human fiend is put to death? Does he complain, as a good citizen, loving his country, when it becomes necessary for the safety of his government, to shoot or hang incorrigible rebels?

And has not God the right to take the same steps towards the establishment of his future government upon a sure basis, that men take in the establishment of their government?

Of what use in the economy of God were those wicked rebellious Canaanites. We kill without compunction a vicious dog, or a dangerous ox, and there is no fault found. Neither does the infidel cry out at our wanton cruelty, when bears, panthers, and wolves are exterminated. Yet wicked men, who refuse to hear and to obey the statutes of the Lord, are accounted of no more worth, than these wild beasts. In the making up of God's plan, "when the workers of iniquity flourish, it is that they shall be destroyed forever.

The infidel does not complain when you reject the worthless stick of timber, in putting up your house. But he does grumble because God will not use whole forests of worthless trees, in his building, trees too that had the power to grow straight, and to make themselves' comely and beautiful. Men put those whom they esteem best fitted for the trust, in places of honor and power. God's election is an election of grace. He does not purpose using any worthless timber in his building. He tries men here, tests their strength, their worthiness, for places of future honor and glory. Only such as according to the prescribed plan, fit themselves for those places in God's school, will be used in that building.

But the infidel says that many of God's chosen ones are faulty, and he cites Lot and David in proof of his assertion. God never justifies an unrepenting sinner. That he calls Lot "righteous," is proof enough of his repentance and forgiveness.

David sinned, but he left the confession of his iniquity on record, that men of all after time, might read and take warning. See Psa. li. The Lord put away his sin, because of his repentance. Yet the very fact that infidels blaspheme because of David's conduct, is proof of the truth and divine authority of the Bible. They are but fulfilling the prophecy that Nathan made to David.

Infidels throw the Bible overboard because they do not believe God has the power of working miracles. Yet their own existence is one of the most stupendous of miracles, and a proof of that power, which they deny. They deny that dead men have ever been, or ever will be, raised from the dust. Yet, cannot the same God who put man together in the first place, put him together again? Is the re-standing of man from the dead, any more of a miracle, than the creation of man?

Infidels throw away the Bible, and yet profess to know God! Yet God has revealed himself in his attributes and purposes only through his word. He has given it to us as a revelation of his will concerning us, as a race, and if it be but a mere fabrication of crafty men, then are we indeed, without God and without hope in the world.

The infidel throws away the Bible and gives us nothing in its place. All experience tells us that we are a mortal dying race. We feel the burden of sin and of guilt, we would fain know how to escape from the burden, we want to live forever but the infidel cannot tell us how. All is dark, dark, dark, when the light of life is taken away.

I Peter i. 5, to find who has given us his most precious word, and who has not left us to "trust in ourselves, but in God which raiseth the dead," that not with fleshy wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have our conversation in the world, that as we are partakers of the sufferings of Jesus, we shall also be of the consolation,—that God has shined in our hearts to give the light of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ, knowing that he which raised up the Lord Jesus, shall raise us up also, and present us with the saints of all past ages, as a fitting bride for him who has become the conqueror over death.

S. ROXANA WINCE.

The Second Coming of Christ.

"Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers walking after their own lusts and saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation."

But we shall try to show that their scoffing will not prevent the return of the Lord. Acts i. 10, we read: "And while they looked steadfastly toward heaven, as he went up, behold two men stood by them in white apparel, which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye here gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven."

Again in Acts iii. 20, 21: "And he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you; whom the heavens must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began."

Now we see that he has ascended to heaven, where he will remain until the times of restitution, when he will return to restore all things. Again we read: "For yet a little while and he that shall come will come and will not tarry." Heb. x. 37.

Again: "Behold he cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him, and all kindred of the earth shall wail because of him; even so. Amen." Rev. i. 7.

Again, Jude i. 14, 15: "And Enoch also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of these saying, Behold the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds, which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him."

Matt. xxiv. 27: "For as the lightning cometh out of the East, and shineth even unto the West, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be."

1 Thess. v. 23: "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly, and I pray God, your whole spirit, and soul, and body, be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."

2 Thess. i. 7, 8: "And to you who are troubled rest with us when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels. In flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Psa. lxxvii. 8: "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth."

1 Cor. iv. 5: "Therefore judge nothing before the time until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts, and then shall every man have praise of God."

2 Cor. v. 10: "For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad."

Phil. iv. 5. "Let your moderation be known unto all men; the Lord is at hand."

Rev. xxii. 12: "Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me to give to every man according as his work shall be."

AMELIA RUSSELL.

Ten Excellent Rules.

1. Never put off till to-morrow what you can do to-day.

2. Never trouble others for what you can do yourself.

3. Never spend your money before you have it.

4. Never buy what you don't want because it is cheap.

5. Pride costs more than hunger, thirst, and cold.

6. Never have to regret of having eaten too much.

7. Nothing is troublesome that we do willingly.

8. How much pain have those evils cost us which never happened. Wait, then, till trials come.

9. Take things always by their smooth handle. Make the most of mercies and do not exaggerate trials.

10. When angry, count ten before you speak; if very angry, a hundred. He that does this will save himself from much sin and many sorrows.

The extremes of the struggle between the state and church have been reached in the two South American republics, Ecuador and Venezuela. The former has recently placed its civil government under papal authority, and the latter has adopted a law of religious liberty which is almost tantamount to the suppression of the Roman Catholic worship. The president of Venezuela, Guzman Olanco, who was elected in 1873, has recently issued a decree which not only declares the complete divorce of church and state, but hampers the church with the severest restrictions, bishops and other dignitaries higher than the ordinary priesthood being prohibited.

In addition to these summary acts, it provides the severest penalties for any criticism of the civil power by the clergy. The primary intention of the Venezuelan government, so far as the separation of the church from state is concerned, was a good one, but it is a question whether the extreme position which has been taken is not an offensive persecution, full of mischief and trouble for the future. As compared even with Germany, it is in the highest degree despotic.—Chicago Tribune.

The majority of scholars are agreed that the Burning Bush was the Senah, or dwarf acacia, a species of wild thorn or bramble bush which, in ancient times, spread its gray foliage and yellow blossoms over the sands and mountains of the Arabian desert. It is also thought that this Senah gave the name to Mount Sinai, which signifies literally, Mountain of the Thorn, while Horeb means Mountain of the Dried-up-Ground. Of recent years the acacia trees have been almost exterminated by the Arabs for the sake of obtaining charcoal from them by burning. This consecrated wood, which was not only that of the Burning Bush, but also employed under the name of shittim wood, for the construction of the Ark of the Covenant and all the utensils of the Tabernacle, is now extinct in that locality, for we are told that now there is not a single acacia to be seen in the vicinity of Mount Sinai.—Les Israelite.

THE RESTITUTION

PLYMOUTH, IND.,.....JULY 26, 1876.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

☞Bro. Barnhill returned from North township, on Monday. He reports excellent meetings One more was added to the congregation, by baptism.

☞We spent last Sunday with the congregation in Plymouth. The congregation was large and seemed to feel a deep interest in the Word of life In the afternoon we baptized an intelligent sister into Christ. We have labored under difficulties during the past few months, but we hope to be stronger and better for the great campaign now so near us in the harvest fields of truth.

☞In this number the reader will find a catalogue of books published by Bro. W. Fallaway, of England. Bro. K. is the editor of the Bible Echo, and has been doing a noble work for the truth in England. He is to visit America soon, and we hope he may find it in his heart to make us a visit. Should any of our Brethren desire any of the works advertised in Bro. K's. catalogue they can order of us.

☞Would it not be a capital thing to do, on the part of Infidel papers, to occasionally pitch into scoundrelism generally. Thieves, pickpockets and the like go unnoticed. If a house is broken into, they blame religion. If a man becomes a downright knave, religion must take the blow. In short, from the Infidel's standpoint, religion does everything that is bad and nothing that is good. Shame upon such unfairness.

☞We have received a communication from Brother Samuel Wilson stating that the Brethren in Philadelphia have abandoned the idea of a general centennial meeting. They are not strong enough to meet the demands of the occasion, and have authorized Bro. Wilson to give notice to that effect. The brethren have acted wisely in this matter. That there should be a general meeting for the mutual edification of the brotherhood, there can be no doubt; but it seems to be impracticable at present. In the meantime let each one work with heart and brain, hand and purse, for the furtherance of the truth.

☞In justice to Brother Stephenson we give place to his article upon the resurrection question. It seems only fair to allow this rejoinder to those who have assailed his views. We did not think it wise to prolong the controversy upon the subject, and still think so; and we heartily commend Brother Stephenson's suggestion that each writer give such evidence as he may think proves his point, and let the views of others alone. If brethren would follow this course, it would abridge many things, and treat all fairly. We do not think that any personal feeling has been created by the discussion, but it would be better for each one to confine his arguments to the subject, and let the personal criticism part alone. Undoubtedly all will approve of this.

I Was Sick and Ye Visited Me.

Just as we go to press we learn that Bro. Amos Sanford is very sick and that but little hope is entertained of his recovery. Bro. S. has been a brave and earnest worker for the cause of truth. His family is in a position to need help. Our brethren now have an opportunity to extend that relief which comes from a true Christian sympathy. All remittances sent to this office will be at once forwarded. Remember the judgment words of the Master: "I was sick and ye visited me." His physician writes:

BRIGHTON WATER CURE,
July 23, 1876.

H. V. Reed:

Elder Amos Sanford requests me to write you, so that you may, through the columns of the RESTITUTION, inform his brethren of his whereabouts, and condition. He came here a little more than a week ago for medical treatment. Believing it to be his last and only hope for relief and recovery from a severe illness since the 31st of last May, as his physician at home had told him he could do nothing for him. But alas! I fear too late; his disease has so firm a hold that it seems little more can be done than to smooth his path-way to the grave.

He is suffering with acute tuberculosis; his right lung is filled up with tuburcular deposit, left one involved. He bears his suffering with patient, calm, and Christian resignation; but grieves for the condition of his family.

I hope his brethren and friends will not forget to help them in this, their time of need and sorrow. We are doing all we can for him. S. BLACK.

What is Sin?

One of the many catch phrases of Sabbatarians is, What is sin? Their uniform answer is, "Sin is the transgression of the law, and it there be no law in this age then there can be no sin," etc. This kind of reasoning is most fallacious. It will not bear a moment's examination. The world is to be judged of sin "because it believes not on me," says Jesus. See John xvi. Again, says Paul, "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin." Rom. xiv. 23. Another has said that "all unrighteousness is sin." But is there no law? Sabbatarians say that there can be but one law in this age, and that is the law of the ten commandments. Paul says, "Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? of works? Nay: BUT THE LAW OF FAITH." "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ." Rom. iii. 27; Gal. vi. 2. We have a law of faith then. Sin means more that Sabbatarians would have us believe. "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin."

Not Peter nor Paul, but Christ.

It is claimed by many that all authority to establish churches in apostolic times was conferred by our Lord upon Peter, and that all churches not having his apostolic seal are spurious. It is further claimed that the Catholic church is the true and only church which possesses the apostolic seal or blessing. Volumes have been written to sustain this view, and as many more to disprove it. It has been stoutly affirmed that Christ transferred his power to Peter, and that he was the constituted vicar of Christ after our Lord ascended. This point rests chiefly upon that celebrated text in Matt xvi., where our Lord gives Peter the keys of the kingdom, etc. Another important point has been raised with regard to Peter's visit to Rome.

It is not our intention to argue the above points in this article. We have another question of graver import for the Romanist to consider, and one, too, which will require some careful reasoning to evade. Our argument will not trench upon the old issues, but upon another phase of the question entirely separate, and to some extent, new field of inquiry. Whatever view Romanists take of Peter's keys or his visits to Rome, we shall not stop to investigate at present. It matters little whether Peter possessed the requisite power or whether he was ever in Rome. Our question lies beyond this and requires another answer.

The question relates more closely to the mission of the apostle Paul. If all authority to establish churches, ordain elders and deacons, was in the hands of Peter, then indeed the argument of the Romanist is admissible. But of course even this admission would not prove the Roman church to be the one ordained by Peter.

Now if it can be shown that Peter did not always superintend the establishing of churches either personally or by his divinely commissioned agents, then indeed, the boasted argument of Romanism falls without hope. Let us examine the point under consideration carefully.

We propose showing that the gospel was preached, men converted, and churches established, entirely outside of the personal authority or apostolic agency of Peter. If this point can be sustained fairly it forever settles the question as to the Roman claim. To us the argument is overwhelming and at once puts an end to the pretensions of the Catholic church, and brings all true believers into fellowship with the Father and the Son.

That the apostle Paul was set apart as the Lord's ambassador to the Gentiles, there can be no question. In Romans the apostle says: "That I should be the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, ministering the gospel of God, that the offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost. Rom. xv. 16. In this text the whole mission of Paul is plainly expressed.

1. He presents the great truth that he was constituted an ambassador.

2. That his message was the gospel of God.

3. That the Gentiles were the special objects of his mission.

4. That those Gentiles who accepted his message would be blessed of heaven, seeing that they were sanctified by the Holy Spirit.

The Gentiles then were co-heirs to the blessings and immunities of Christ our Lord. This being true we would ask:

DID PAUL GET HIS AUTHORITY FROM PETER?

If the theory set up by Romanists is true, that Peter was Christ's vicar, and that he alone held the keys, then Paul must have derived his power from him. But is there any proof to sustain this view? We answer there is none. On the contrary the evidence is very pointedly against it. Paul in addressing the Galatians says: "But I certify you brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me was not after man. For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ." Gal. i. 11-12.

This testimony is very explicit and settles the point so far as the apostle is concerned. The gospel and the power to preach it did not come from man. The commission to preach was direct from Christ. This can be proven from the commission itself: "Delivering thee from the people, and from the Gentiles unto whom now I send thee, to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and an inheritance among them which are sanctified by faith that is in me." Acts xxvi. 17-18.

There can be but one more point needed to clinch the argument, and place it beyond the possibility of doubt. Did Paul in any way get his authority from Peter or the apostles? Paul is very explicit on this point. He says: "Neither went I up to Jerusalem to them which were apostles before me; but I went into Arabia and returned again to Damascus." Gal. i. 17.

To sum up the evidence as given above we have the following plain facts:

1. Christ and not Peter appointed Paul to the work of the ministry.

2. The power to preach, the gospel to be preached, were derived from Christ and not Peter.

3. The Gentile churches established by Paul were recognized by the Jerusalem brethren as belonging to the body of Christ, and in all respects worthy of fellowship. The question of Peter's keys was never raised. Certain Pharisees objected to the Gentile converts on the ground that they were not circumcised, and did not observe the law. But the Peter part of the objection is not recorded.

In general, therefore, we may conclude that there is no evidence to sustain the monstrous assertions of the Romanist. Men who accept Christ and obey his word are not to recognize the Roman church as the body of Christ. The true foundation is Christ and not Peter. The gospel is God's power unto salvation. Let all receive this gospel, obey its commands, and share its blessings.

Are the Ten Commandments a Perfect Law?

It is often said by Sabbatarians that the ten commandments are God's perfect moral law, which cannot be added to or taken from. Much is said about the moral law and the law of God. Those who use the expressions are very free to assume that the ten commandments are always meant. Much eloquence and oratorical display have been wasted upon the thunders of Sinai and the terrific grandeur of the awful scenes surrounding the base of that mountain which glowed with fire, and "the blackness and darkness," etc.

Let us examine this point and see if it will bear a fair criticism. We are bold to say that the ten commandments are not God's holy, perfect and complete law. The whole Bible is against such a diminutive view of the divine administration. When a certain lawyer asked Christ about the way to eternal life, he was referred to an existing law, of which he was the exponent. "What is written in the law? how readest thou?" Now if the ten commandments are God's perfect law, then indeed the answer will refer to this holy code; but strange it is that no reference is made to the ten commandments. Two great precepts are quoted but neither one is among the ten. Hear, oh ye who would lead the people away from the fountains of love back to the barren wastes of Sinai. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself." Luke x. 26-27. If the reader will take his Bible, he will find these two precepts recorded in what Sabbatarians call the law of Moses. See Lev. xix. 18; Deut. vi. 4.

Here, then, are the greatest precepts to be found in the whole Bible, and yet neither of them are on the tables of stone. This point is of itself sufficient to dispel the wild assertions of those who are desirous of being "teachers of the law, understanding neither what they say nor whereof they affirm." 1 Tim. i. 7.

But there is another point of vital interest bearing upon this question. We often hear Psa. xix. 7 quoted to prove the idea that God's law is not only perfect, but that it is composed of just ten commandments. The text reads: "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul; the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple." The reader will notice that not one word is said about the ten commandments. The Hebrew word, Torah, here rendered law, more properly means doctrine, and is so rendered in the margin. This text, therefore, cannot be used and applied separately to the commands. Indeed there is not one text in the Bible which even calls the ten commandments the law of God. Men talk so wisely about the moral law, and try all the time to impress the mind with the idea of the ten commandments, but there is no such phrase in the Bible as the moral law.

The great doctrine of holiness unto the Lord, is not mentioned on the tables of stone, but it is written in the book of the law: "Be ye holy, for I am holy."

But it seems needless to pursue this point farther. There is no evidence in the Bible—or out of it—that the ten commandments are God's complete law; the assertion is a wild, extravagant and wicked assumption. Our brethren have to some extent become aware of this mode of special pleading, and unscriptural way of teaching. All of God's precepts are adapted to the end for which they were given, but to assert that the ten precepts contain God's perfect law betrays ignorance and a want of Bible instruction.

The Resurrection Again.

It seems to have been my misfortune to have had the discussion stopped without a note of warning just at the time when my position was the culmination of attacks and misrepresentations from five quarters without the possibility of correction or reply. Had they been distributed more I might have noticed some of them, especially reasonings and conclusions for me which I cannot endorse. But I will submit the texts and arguments already adduced with the best grace possible, believing that truth needs not constant repetition to be appreciated; especially as the leading scriptural arguments remain unanswered, while we have several times answered all the leading texts and arguments on the opposite side. Judging from the past, the two parties, though differing widely among themselves, will not abide by the decision of our worthy editors. They have disregarded such decisions in the past. I had been silent on this subject for nearly three years, when forced from my retreat to defend my faith, which during that entire period was subjected to unremitting attacks and misrepresentations. I wrote a series of articles showing the difference between our views and universalism. But one thing during this entire investigation should be deprecated that is the personalities which have been indulged in to an unwarrantable degree. It has been my custom for years not to engage in personal controversies relying upon the merits of my arguments, except as has been in every instance during the past discussion, I have been named and my views attacked, or criticised, or questions asked. In ever, single occurrence in which I have mentioned the names of those from whom I may have differed, it has been called out by personal criticisms, reviews, or questions. To avoid temptations to acrimony in the future, which wounds the feelings of beloved brethren, I would suggest that each correspondent give the best evidence at his command in support of what he may believe, without reference to the opposing arguments of others, and let the readers of our excellent journal be the jury who shall decide on the merits of the arguments. Or if we must have a discussion let two of our ablest brethren who may differ on the position it may seem advisable to discuss; and let each have the same space and number of articles. Let these chosen representatives be rigidly held to parliamentary rules which forbids personalities, impugning motives, discourtesy, etc. A word to the wise should be sufficient. The position of an editor is a critical one. Decide which way he may, one party will generally be displeased. If to avoid giving offence to any, he does not decide in favor of either party, it will be said by some, either that he has no mind of his own, or that he is vacillating. We certainly have the best natural editors in the world or they would not have stood half as much contention and fault finding as they have. Though perhaps having as much cause of complaint as any. I cheerfully acquiesce in their decision to investigate "another phase of the gospel of Christ." From the following challenge which I clip from the article of a very able brother in the last number of the RESTITUTION, I would suggest the subject of probation in the future as an appropriate theme. Refering to the writer and others he says, "now where do they find the authority for the statement that the millennial age is to be an age of probation? Is this not a mere assumption? If not let them adduce the proof." For one, I boldly take the affirmative of this question and will in a few articles proceed to give the proof. And I can assure my brother that he will find himself in a much smaller minority than "J. M. S. Sweet & Co." As far as my acquaintance goes, as many agree with me on the subject whose discussion we have just closed, as either of the opposing parties; whereas I doubt whether the author of the foregoing extract will have enough with him to have a Co. I have not for many years before, heard of a single brother who called in question the doctrine of probation in the future age. If I cannot by clear and unquestionable evidence, from the Sacred Oracles prove that there will be probation in the millennial age, I will abandon forever the idea of probation in the ages beyond; I say the ages beyond, because I do not believe that a single person of all the dead will live during the thousand years except those who shall reign with Christ as kings and priests; and therefore have mortal sinners for whom to intercede and for whose sins to offer sacrifice;—and mortal nations upon probation to subjugate and bless on conditions of obedience and destroy in case of disobedience. Ps. 2 ch. The rest of the dead will not live again till the thousand years are ended. The thousand years will be a sample of all the times of restitution. No class of men ever have had or ever will have probation except such as can legitimately grow up or be educated into responsibility. Even then there will be no more exceptions than all the righteous when Christ comes, and during the thousand years who will not die. No one can preach the gospel of Christ without preaching his associate rulers, his kingdom—all of which relate to the future age, and the probation of all nations preparatory to becoming loyal subjects; (Rev. xiv. 6-7; xv. 3-4; Ps. lxx. 11,) and therefore will be on probation. J. M. S.

Brother Jones' Catechism.

"WHAT DO MEN NEED?"—A SAVIOR.

Is it not too often the case that the mind is carried with so much rapidity from one truth to another, that the idea advanced is not duly received and digested, and the words have been to the hearer no more than empty sounds? Excellent as Brother Jones' catechism seems to be, it would not be possible in so small a compass entirely, to have elaborated each idea, and it offers very good headings for maturer reflection, which are presented in dwelling on his summary.

"Our great want, we are taught, is a Savior. Why? Because we are in a state of sin. What is sin? It is a departure from, or transgression of God's law. Where can that be found? It is exhibited in perfect manifestation in the character of Christ, and presented in precept in God's Holy Law. Does our faith, repentance and baptism, cleanse us from this sin? They cause all past sin to be forgiven, and the individual (if these three conditions have been complied with) should go forward on a new career. In receiving the Gospel, he is no longer in darkness, for he has seen holiness exhibited in the Son; he must hence forward live in the constant effort to attain it. Will he probably perfectly succeed at once? No. For provision has been made for his frequent failure and forgiveness promised through Christ. To what is this offer, to men, of salvation through Christ; and this system which has been put in operation for the elaboration of Christian character sometimes compared in the Scriptures? To "a grain of mustard seed," to "leaven which a woman hid in three measures of meal;" to "the sower that went forth to sow, and the seed fell in various places," it is said to be "like unto a man which sowed good seed in his field."

Our brethren have been so indignant that the reign of our Lord Jesus Christ should have been so entirely ignored, that they fail to regard with sufficient importance the kingdom in its mustard seed state. "The kingdom of heaven," said our Lord (Matt. xiii.), "is like unto a grain of mustard seed," They can fully take in his kingdom when in all his glory "he shall come to sit on the throne of his father David;" but let us not lose sight of the fact, that the very existence of that future glorious kingdom depends on the mustard seed state. If men do not have impressed on them the awful sinfulness of sin, the price paid for redemption from sin, which is the Savior's blood, the terrible fight which must be waged without cessation with "the world, the flesh and the devil" before they can "overcome" and enter "through the gates into the City," then there can be no future kingdom. As drop by drop, the great ocean exists, as moment by moment, time and eternity are made up, so by this single-handed fight of each man with sin, is the glorious kingdom formed and gained. The great question with each of us is, am I preparing to make one item in this glorious whole, by the only one way? Is Christ's mission of saving his people from their sins fulfilled in me? If not, what matters it that I know of this great glory? When our brethren go preaching, are they faithful to preach as our Lord did, in this thirteenth chapter of Matthew? Do they preach that the kingdom of heaven is like unto the leaven which must work in the subject, making him every day more and more like his Lord until all his nature is leavened? Do they stimulate men in this work of laying aside each day the old Adam, and being "renewed in righteousness after the image of Christ in true holiness?" Only such stones as are thus finished, can enter into the great building of which Christ is to be "the chief corner-stone." Don't skip things, brethren. Don't go preaching to men victory, before combat; reward, before probation. Show them as well the sword and the shield which they must use in the fight, as the wreaths of victory, with which the saints are to be crowned. The crown of life is then to be given. The sword and the shield they can take now; of the crown they can only make sure by the right and most faithful use of the former. Show men the utter sinfulness in which they are, that made it necessary they should have a Savior that would "save his people from their sins." That is the great work to go on now. Be diligent in it. The crowning is for the future. Make sure of the present, and thus make sure also of the future.

AN OLD SISTER, S. M.

California Items.

The little church near Healdsburg meets twice a month, when the weather is suitable. Some of the brethren and sisters have removed so that we now only number fourteen members. We confidently expect some additions soon.

I am trying to present the word as I find opportunity to do so, and I am glad to know, that there are some who are willing to hear and investigate the word of God. While this is true, it is also true that a large majority take no interest whatever in Christianity, or are so bound up to sectarian chains, that they do not care to hear anything, except it comes from their preacher.

In some localities, prejudice is so subtile that a hearing cannot be obtained, in some others however, the people are willing and anxious to hear and some I trust, will obey the Gospel as they learn their duties. Take it altogether, California is a good place for a preacher to practice patience.

Some time ago I received an invitation from brother P. A. Strong, who lives near Woodland in Yolo Co. Cal. to come and hold a meeting. I commenced a meeting at a school house, near his residence on Tuesday night March, 28th, preaching each evening through the week and on Sunday and Sunday night—seven discourses. I found less prejudice here than at any place I have preached at in the State.

Brother and sister Strong are fully alive in the great work, and have been at work, talking with their neighbors, scattering tracts, and lending the RESTITUTION. Sister Tunnell of Humbolt Co. Cal. was also at the meeting.

She says at some points in that county, where she has been distributing tracts, there is a desire to hear the works preached.

At the meeting above named was the first any of the audience had ever heard preaching on most of the subjects presented. I think I never addressed a more attentive audience.

Very many questions were asked publicly, and so far as I could learn the answers gave general satisfaction The congregations were made up partly by persons who have been members of churches elsewhere but who are now out of church. Some Catholics, and some who never were church members.

It has never before fallen to my lot to witness so great harmony all through a meeting, and such willingness to accept Bible truth, and let go of or tear down old division fences. Nearly all manifested an anxiety to not only hear, but to know the truth and some appeared to be almost ready to go forward in obedience.

I have promised to return there, perhaps in a few weeks. The kindness and christain courtesy extended to me I cannot forget while I live. May they put their faith (those who have not) into practice and secure the right to the great inheritance.

The public mind in California seems to be directed more in the effort to solve the Chinese emigration question than in making preparation for the coming of the Lord. Let us do all we can, for that day is drawing near. When we have warned the people by faithfully presenting the word of God we will have discharged a duty. To "give meat in due season," is certainly in order now. Brethren, are we doing all we have the ability to do?

Soon the King in his beauty will appear, and who will be ready? Let us all examine ourselves and have our accounts ready for settlement. In hope.

RICHARD CORBALEY.

Gethsemane.

The day had closed,
The cold night shadow on Gethsemane
Was falling;—while the world reposed,—
What deeper shadows fell, O Lord, on thee!

Death's awful gloom
In dreadful foldings hung around thy way;
A chill came with it from the mouldering tomb
That blasts alike by midnight and by day.

A deeper pall
From "power of darkness," blacker still than death,
In frightening horrors, interfused through all;
Withered both heart and soul, and stilled breath.

Then rose that plaint
That reached to heaven,—stilling seraph's lyre,—
"O Father, pass this cup, for deathly, faint,—
How can I drink its poisons! and expire!"

An angel came
With powers celestial to renew that force
Pressed out in blood-dews from Christ's anguished frame,
And lifting earthward in their crimson course.

From prayer he rose.
The struggle in Gethsemane was o'er;
Like Lamb to slaughter led, the Savior goes
His heart-blood on the cross for sin to pour.

S. A. CHAPLIN.

PLYMOUTH, July 21, 1876.

Correspondence.

CARTER'S STORE, Ark., July 11th, 1876.

MR. EDITOR: As you have had no communication from this part of north-western Arkansas, we sincerely trust you will pardon us for trespassing upon your time and patience, to the extent of saying, that we, of the one faith, are few in number as yet. We have no regular church organization in our vicinity. But few in number as we are, we are earnestly contending for the faith once delivered to the saints. Trusting ere long, that the fables that at present so much engross the mind, and attention of the sects everywhere, will be dispelled from their vision, and that they may be enabled thereby to see and understand God's word as given to man. Our prayers are continually to this end. Most heartily do we desire that all men would concur with the Bible expression, that earth, and not Heaven, is to be the blessed abode of Christ and his saints. And that the kingdom of God is in the glorious future. And that man is beholden unto the resurrection for life and immortality, and many other kindred truths that brighten every page of the Bible of God. But alas! Sectarianism has become deeply indoctrinated into the minds of its adherents, with all its direful absurdities, the effect of which is to say the least, the most baneful, and pernicious, ultimately tending to, and approximating to that of infidelity and unbelief, such then it is as we find set forth, and enthusiastically propagated as being the true and legitimate teaching of God's word. But may the day speedily come when God's word will be read, known, and understood; that it may cause to vanish, the dark and deep delusions of modern sectarianism. And that the light of God's word, may illuminate the pathway of mortal man, and that the glorious truths given to man through the mouths of all his holy prophets, and his Son, Jesus Christ, our Savior and Redeemer, may encircle, as it were, with a belt of glory, the vast and extended domain of earth. And that it may be read, and known, of all men, that the yet future glorious reign of Prince Emanuel is indeed, and in truth, a reality. Then brethren, let us put on the whole armor of God, and go forth to meet, and to battle against the strong holds of sectarianism, and then can we exclaim with Paul, that we have fought a good fight. We have finished our course, we have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for us a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous Judge will give at that day, and to all that love his appearing. R. H. S.

BRO. REED:—I fully endorse the principles held forth by the RESTITUTION, and hope it will be made a power for good. I shall seek to extend its usefulness, as I am satisfied that this subject is too much lost sight of in the present day. In our quickly coming Lord Jesus—I am, etc.

GEORGE HIRD,
Pastor of Stephen Baptist Church, Hinsville, Ont.

BRO. REED:—There has been a man in this neighborhood professing to be a believer in the future age. He preaches:

1. That there will be no resurrection of the unjust.

2. That God foreordained that the descendants of Cain should never have a resurrection, but that they are the seed of the Old Serpent, or what he calls the "overplus seed" that the woman is compelled to bear on account of Mother Eve's transgression.

3. That Jesus the Christ was not the Son of God, but the Son of Joseph.

4. He says that all believers are bound to keep the seventh day Sabbath.

If you, Bro. Reed, will give some comments on such doctrine through the RESTITUTION, you will confer a favor on your humble servant and others. Is such doctrine the one faith and the one hope which we are commanded to preach, or is it another gospel? I remain yours—a searcher for the truth. JOHN INNIS.

WOODSTOCK, ONT.

NOTE.—The individual alluded to above is alone responsible for such views; entirely foreign as they are to the Gospel faith. S. A. C.

DEAR BROTHER:—It is a long while since I have had the pleasure of hearing from you directly. I was pained to learn of your illness and seemingly dangerous condition, but happy to learn through the last number of the RESTITUTION that your condition is much improved, and of the prospects of a speedy recovery. Do you intend going to Philadelphia? If you go, I hope you will stop off with us, either on your way down or back. Don't forget this, for we are anxious to have you visit us.

Brother Stephenson will stop with us on his way home from Canada. He expects to be here on next Friday or Saturday.

I enclose draft for $5.00 toward the issue of a Centennial number of the RESTITUTION, which project meets my hearty approval. I hope we shall have an excellent number of the paper. This plan will doubtless do much toward increasing its circulation. Would be pleased to hear from you. With Christian regard to yourself, wife, and Brothers Chaplin and Myers.

Your brother in the blessed hope.

A. D. ESHELMAN.

CANTON, O.

DEAR BROTHER:—Enclosed find $1.00 to assist in circulating tracts, or extra numbers of the RESTITUTION, whichever is deemed best. I feel solicitous for the spread of the truth. I am where I have no other preacher but the RESTITUTION. I have been here one year, and I have not heard one word of the glad tidings of good news since I have been here, preached orally. And yet we have preaching of the Gospel (so-called) every Sunday. A few days ago there came a stranger in our midst, who said he was a minister of the Gospel, not telling who he was. The thought struck me that he might be one of our brethren that had happened along. So he preached, and I went to hear him. But I was doomed to disappointment, for he was one of those among the thousands that are turned unto fables. He had a great deal to say about everlasting punishment, while at the same time he talked about harmonizing the Scriptures. I asked him what harmony there was,—taking into view the mercy of God, and eternal torment. O, said he, God has made man a free agent, and he cannot take that free agency from him by striking him out of existence, as you claim. I told him that I could see no free agency in being shut up in everlasting torment. He talked a great deal about the immortal soul and the immortal mind, and I asked him where he found that in his Bible. He said he did not know that it was in the Bible, but God was immortal, and that He made man, and breathed into him the breath of life and he became a living, immortal soul, because God being immortal he could not breathe any other kind of life. I asked him if God did not give the animals life, too. He said yes; but that He did not breathe the breath of life into them. I told this gentleman that I would like to give him some papers to read at his leisure when in the mines, (as he was going there) and I gave him several numbers of the RESTITUTION. I have distributed a great many numbers of the RESTITUTION since I have been here. But I do not know what they will accomplish. It may be as bread cast upon the water. The people here are very indifferent about the future. They have all come to this country for the purpose of procuring for themselves the gold that perisheth. But I fear they will never be awake to anything else until they have to call on the rocks and mountains to cover them, and hide them from the face of Him that sitteth upon the throne.

Your sister in hope of the soon coming of our Lord.

Scripture Localities, Extracts, Etc.

Extracts from "The Land of Sacred Mystery," or "The Bible seen in the Light of its Scenery," by W. L. Gage:

"The name of Chaldea appears to have passed like the sands which the Euphrates carries to the sea, down from the highlands of Armenia to the neighborhood of the Persian gulf. In the oldest parts of the Bible the land of the Chaldees appears to have been near the head waters of the Euphrates, while at the close of the Old Testament times it had passed to the tract around Babylon. There have been many debates respecting the situation of "Ur of the Chaldees," and those who, like Rawlinson, have decided that either Warka of Mugheir, great heaps of ruins, was the city whence Abraham migrated. The weight of evidence turns the scale, in my judgment, in favor of the city now known as Oorfa, near the head waters of the Euphrates, and some three or four hundred miles northeast of Palestine.

Among the singular retributions of history is this: that the city which stands where Ur once stood is now a station of the American Board, and the Gospel of Christ and the story of Abraham's life are now sent back by a young nation of America to that ancient spot whence Abraham journeyed so long ago, taking with him the worship of a living and spiritual God. The place has always been noted for its profuse spring, and around that spring people have always clustered, and so Ur has never been without a history. In the period of classic Rome, it was a large and well known city called Edessa, and the modern Oorfa or Oorfa is not a place without size and architectural adornment."

"But the grave has had a more splendid destiny than the shaded spot (under the oaks of Mamre) where Abraham lived. There is no doubt whatever that the place where Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebekah, Jacob and Leah, were buried, is now sacredly guarded within the mosque at Hebron. It is one of those places which are equally revered at the present time by Jew, Mahometan and Christian; and there has not been a year nor a day since the time of Abraham when that rock-tomb has been exposed to desecration, or when a guard has not been set over it. From the time when Abraham purchased it, down all the centuries of the old covenant, it remained in the hands of the Jews. The Christians then gained possession of it; then the Mahometans grasped it; but the patriarchs, and especially Abraham, were beloved in their eyes, and it suffered no detriment. The Christians held it again for the little season in which the Crusaders were victorious, and they relinquished it once more into the hands of the Moslems. These hold it to-day, as must be said to the shame of the Christian world. There is but one race which should possess and keep that hallowed tomb—the Jews themselves. It ought, indeed, to be freely opened to the Gentile world—to those who though not of Abrahamic lineage, yet revere his memory, and accept the Christian fulfilling of his faith; and yet it is owed to the Jews that it be taken from those who hold it now in their foul and unseemly clutch, and given to the descendants of the ancient patriarchs. Happily the strong arm of the British government has wrested within our days what assuredly would not have been given; and the prince of Wales, accompanied by a small and chosen party of friends and scholars, has been permitted to go as far as some might perhaps consider it seemly under any circumstances to advance. It is true, they did not enter the cave itself. The darkened shrines which bear the names of the ancient patriarchs and their wives, and which are jealously guarded by the Moslem keepers, are directly over the tomb; yet in that part of the mosque which is called the shrine of Abraham, the royal party saw a hole about eight inches across, which leads directly into the cave below. Ever night, a lamp is lowered into the vault, but it is withdrawn by day. The original entrance is closed by masonry, but was doubtless on the southern face of the hill, and so situated that Abraham as he sat under his oaks, could look fully into it. The student who may wish to trace the architectural history of the mosque will find it fully detailed in Ritter's work on the Holy Land, vol. iii. p. 305; and no one can fail to be instructed by the graphic narrative which Dean Stanley, one of the prince of Wales' party, has given of the royal visit in 1862. It is not to be forgotten, that the great earnestness to penetrate the cave of Machpelah is peculiar, it would seem, to the Christian nations of the present day. The pasha of Jerusalem, who yielded the right of entrance to the English party, expressed wonder at their curiosity, and said that he had never thought of visiting the mosque for any other purpose than sending the sacred air. Yet it may be doubted whether, in case a strong curiosity should prompt a Mahometan to descend, he would dare to; for Quaresmius tells us that early as the seventh century, it was firmly believed that, if any Mussulman entered the cavern, immediate death would be the consequence. I trust, however, that the growing weakness of the Turkish government will allow of even more perfect exploration. It is not too much to say that in a good measure of probability, the body of Jacob, embalmed as it was in Egypt, is in as perfect condition there to-day, as are the mummies which are disinterred on the Nile; and, it may be, the first layers of the masonry to be still seen at Hebron were laid by Joseph himself, on the occasion of his father's sumptuous funeral. That this is no idle fancy is shown by the wealth and power of the man, whose father had been a Hebrew shepherd, but who had wrought out his fortune with such signal success in Egypt. Here Joseph had become habituated to magnificent sepulchres, as well as to sumptuous sepultures; and after that costly pageantry of burial described so strikingly in the closing chapter of Genesis, it is hardly to be supposed that he would fail to designate, with some architectural memorial, the simple rock-grave which his great grandfather purchased, and which for three generations had lain in its original rudeness."—Herald of Life.

The Philadelphia General Meeting.

My attention has been called to a letter from my brother Thomas, in the the last number of the RESTITUTION, making inquiry concerning a proposed general meeting at Philadelphia, and I have been requested by the brethren here to reply to the same.

The notice to which reference is made, was contained in brother Gellelly's report of our last conference, stating that it was decided to hold the next annual meeting at Philadelphia; and a subsequent editorial paragraph in the RESTITUTION on the same subject.

We have felt considerable anxiety on the subject as the time appointed for the meeting drew near, and after due deliberation, and consultation with some of the brethren from Baltimore, we are compelled to confess our inability to receive and entertain the large company who would undoubtedly be present. We feel keenly the mortification of making such an announcement but our circumstances are such that we can see no other course in justice to those who would assemble, and to ourselves. Our good brethren who were present at the last meeting appreciated the situation, and a plan was started for raising a fund to meet the expenses of the next meeting, but I understand that it has been but a partial success. In case those who attend should come prepared to bear their own expenses, the constant attendance of a committee from the Philadelphia church would be required for several days to properly attend to the reception and comfort of visitors; and after canvassing our little company, we find that in this busy time we would fail in this particular.

In view of the foregoing, I trust that our brethren will understand and appreciate our position, and if is thought best to hold a general meeting this year, will appoint it at some other point than Philadelphia.

Valuable English Works.

Our readers are informed that we expect shortly to have for sale the works mentioned below. Orders and remittances for the same may be sent at once to this office.

Discussion on the State of the Dead. Between the Rev. W. G. Brailman, Congregational minister, and W. Kellaway, editor of Bible Echo, and minister of the Gospel. Both of England. The propositions discussed were: 1. That the dead exist in a living, conscious state after their decease. Affirmed by W. C. B. 2. That the Scriptures teach that men in death are wholly unconscious, insensible, and unable to perform any act whatever; and that they rest in darkness, silence and the dust. Cloth, bevelled boards, well bound, 35c; postage 10c. Paper cover, 25c; postage 6c.

Duration and Nature of Future Punishment. By Rev. R. Constable, M. A. late Prælocutor of Cork, Ireland. 276 pp. An elaborate argument touching the punishment of the unrighteous. It is particularly fine in its philological chapters respecting the meaning of the Greek words used by the inspired writers to indicate the doom of the lost. Price $1; postage 16c.

"We hail this book with hearty satisfaction. Undoubtedly the subject which it treats with such an attractive combination of forcible logic, modesty of power and reverence, has held hold of the minds of many of the most thoughtful Christian men of the age. To speak, from a parochial in the first edition to a handsome volume of three hundred and thirty pages in the fourth, is conclusive proof that this work has proved a powerful and profound importance..... We must also compliment the publishers on the tasteful and handsome dress in which they present the book to the public, and express the hope that the necessary outlay will speedily be much more than recovered by the large sale of a work which must take a standard place in this painfully interesting department of Christian theology."—The Rainbow.

Hades; or, The Intermediate State of Man. Crown 8vo, 2d edition. Price $1.50; postage 16c.

This work presents the Bible doctrine of the state of man between death and the resurrection.

"Mr. Constable has, in a series of works, devoted much labor and research to establishing from Scripture and other sources the real nature of the future state; and the present book is the result of his more exhaustive labors on one special point. His argument is supported by no little learning, a keen logic, and a fine and available style. There is a good deal to be said for the general doctrines propounded."—Nonconformist.

"It is characterized by his usual vigor of thought and clearness of expression. To all sincere lovers of truth, rather than of tradition, we cordially commend the treatise."—The Church Messenger.

Bible Echo. Volume I. May to December, edited by W. Kellaway. The only English weekly that advocates the ancient Gospel. Bound volume of numbers of the Bible Echo, containing important papers and discussion on vital matters, and the new ones concerning the spread of the scriptural doctrine of immortality. Price $4.75.

Bible Echo. Vol. II., January to June, 1875. This is a continuation of the above for the period stated. Price $2.

Bible Echo. Vol. III., July to September, 1875. This completes the Bible Echo as a weekly issue paper, and also finishes the odd volumes. Price $1.50.

Bible Echo. New Series. Monthly numbers from October, 1875. The yearly subscription for this magazine, including the 3 months of last year, is 50 cts.

New Facts Upon all Subjects. By the author of "Enquire Within Upon Everything." Useful to the physician, the artist, the chemist, the engineer, the manufacturer, the agriculturist, the tradesman and the housekeeper. 300 pp. Price 60c; postage 10c.

A New Work by Mrs. H. V. Reed.

Sermon Words for Home Reading. Nearly 200 pp. Well printed on heavy tinted paper, handsomely bound in cloth. Price 50c; postage 10c.

"This book is one of the most satisfactory of its kind that could be written; indeed we know of none that is more pleasing to those who see and feel the necessity of maintaining the Bible as a revelation from God. We would be more than content, for the present, if the Bible class books now in most footsteps of that of the estimable and talented lady, the authoress. Her "Bible Triumphant" was a good work, and it is, we know, warmly appreciated by many; but this work, so original, so forcible, so convincing, it would be hard to guess where its success will end. Everybody should possess a copy."—Ed. Bible Echo.

Bible Triumphant. A new supply is expected. Price, paper covers, 25c.; cloth 50c.

BUSINESS DEPARTMENT.

Centennial Number of the Restitution.

It has been deemed best to issue a Centennial number of the RESTITUTION, wherein is to be set forth our faith and hope upon the great questions of Bible truth. Those who have heretofore contributed to the Tract Fund, will find the amount credited under this head. It is to be hoped that every brother will give something toward this feasible effort to let the light of the glorious Gospel shine into the hearts of men. No people have so much truth and do so little. Why is it? Let every one do his duty. God will bless you.

Put Your Name on this List.

Recently quite a number of brethren have concluded that an easy and effectual way to get the truth before the minds of the people is to send them the RESTITUTION for three months. This is a good decision. It is almost impossible for the paper to be received and read by any household for three months without its making an impression upon their minds for good. So send on your names and money. We hope to have a goodly number report. The following is a list of those we already have above referred to:

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

There will be a general assembly of the Church of God at the house of the brethren in Winchester, Va., on Friday, August 4, 1876, and will continue over the following Sunday.

All of the One Faith are invited to attend, especially all who practice what they preach.

All from a distance, on getting off at the Winchester depot, will at once enquire for N. J. Morgan, who will conduct them to his house, where they will be at home during the meeting.

Brother J. M. Stephenson will preach in Brother Elliott's neighborhood on the Friday evening before the last Saturday and Sunday evening in July, and at Lanark the following Saturday evening and Saturday.

The Church of God will meet in conference at Kings Point, Dade county, Mo., on Friday before the second Sunday in August, for the purpose of devising the best means of promoting the work of our Master in this portion of the earth. It is desirable that all of like precious faith meet upon this occasion, at the time appointed, for edification, and for building each other up in our most holy faith.

Brethren from a distance will enquire for A. C. Patterson or A. J. Brown.

Come, brethren, one and all, and let us have a good time, one that for all future time will live in our remembrance, and be as an oasis in the desert of this short life, that we may know and love each other better, and see eye to eye as of yore.

A. J. BROWN,
A. C. PATTERSON,
J. F. STEPHENS,
JAMES RUTH.

PERRYS, Mo., July 17.

The undersigned would beg leave to call the attention of the brethren of the One Faith to the proposed conference at Philadelphia, to be held on the third Friday in September, 1876, and continue until the succeeding Sunday night. I would likewise call on the brethren who are leaders of the RESTITUTION to announce the same to the several churches, as was recommended at the last conference. By this means we hope that all of like precious faith that possibly can come, will come, and that we may have a happy time in greeting, and in associating with each other.

It is unnecessary for me to speak of the other unmeaning attractions in the city of Philadelphia at this time, where may be seen a sample of the "riches of the Gentiles."

In accordance with a resolution passed at our last conference, to the effect that those who could would subscribe 50 cents a month, less or more, in order to help to defray the expense of the meeting, so that we may not so much burden our hospitable brethren there, I would again beg the brethren to be mindful. All subscriptions should be sent to Brother I. Peterman, 127 Court st., Brooklyn.

Brethren who intend to come, will please send a postal card to Justice R. Dull, 6 E. Cadet st., Philadelphia, Pa.

J. H. GELLELLY,
Secretary of Conference.

The annual conference of the Church of God for the state of Indiana, will convene at Antioch church house, five miles south of Plymouth, and two miles north of Argos, on Wednesday at 2 o'clock p. m. August 16, 1876.

As there are several papers relative to church and general organization to be read for the edification and deliberation of the brotherhood, and much other business to be attended to, it is desirable that the brethren and delegates be prompt in attendance at the first of the meeting.

It is also desirable that the congregations send their delegates fully instructed as to pledges in the missionary work, that we may be able to make a forward move another year.

Brethren from other states are invited to attend our meeting.

Plymouth can be reached from the east or west by the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad, and from the south by the Indianapolis, Peru & Chicago Railroad. Those attending from the south will stop at Argos, on the L. P. & C. R. R.

Waiting for that Day.

BY DR. GILES.

Waiting we stand,
And watching till our Savior shall appear,
Joyful to cry, as the eastern skies grow clear,
"The Lord's at hand!"

But now the night
Presses around us, sullenly and chill;
Pain, doubt and sorrow seem to have their will:—
Lord, send the light!

Weary we wait,
Lifting our heavy eyes, bedimmed with tears,
To skies where yet no trace of dawn appears:—
Lord, it is late!

But yet thy word
Saith, with sweet prophecy that cannot fail,
That light o'er darkness shall at length prevail:—
We trust thee, Lord!

Oh, Morning Star
Of heavenly promise, light our darkened way
Till the first beams of the expected day
Shine from afar.

So will we take
Fresh hope and courage to our fainting hearts,
And patient wait, though every joy departs,
"Till the day break."

Science and Religion.

"O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust, avoiding profane and vain babblings, and oppositions of science falsely so-called."—1 Tim. vi. 20.

What is this great trust committed to all who preach the religion of Christ? 1 Cor. xv. 1–4. "Moreover, brethren, I declare unto you the Gospel which I preached unto you, which also ye have received, and wherein ye stand. By which also ye are saved, if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you, unless ye have believed in vain. For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures. And that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day according to the Scriptures."

Verse 3, "I delivered unto you first of all;" first, in importance of all; then goes on throughout the chapter in the most grand and sublime manner to depict the fact and importance, the necessity of the doctrine of a future resurrection.

Now, as the doctrine of the Old Testament, the foundation of everything, rested on the one great fact, that God was the Creator and upholder of both the heavens and the earth, which contravened with all false religion, and "science falsely so-called." So does the doctrine of resurrection lay as the foundation of all true religion in the New Testament, and contravenes all false teaching in both religion and science.

Nowhere in the Bible, is there, so to speak, so desperate an effort to establish a point as the great Apostle of the Gentiles, makes in this 15th chapter of 1 Corinthians, to establish the fact, that the resurrection of the body is the foundation of all the teachings of Christianity. There we see the true exhaltation of the character and office of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

Here, then, is the "trust committed" to Timothy and to all who follow the apostolic plan of preaching the Gospel as plainly pointed out in 1 Cor. xv. 1.

What then, constitutes the caution in the text above 1 Tim. vi. 20, "Avoiding profane babblings, and oppositions of science falsely so-called?"

In answering this, it might be well to premise by saying that our apostle was a prophet as well as an evangelist; his clear discription of the "Man of Sin," not even yet revealed, and the "mystery" that we "shall not all sleep," but that some shall remain over, and "in the twinkling of an eye shall be changed," establishes him as a prophet of first importance. So that if the things he feared were not fully manifest at that time, it does not militate against the necessity of the caution.

For one of the early heresies against primitive Christianity was not yet revealed, to-wit: Gnosticism; though several very grave errors had already crept into the churches.

The greatest error that ever has, or ever could get into the church, was 1 Cor. xv. 12: "How say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead." If the whole church does not deny the resurrection of the dead, or the testimony of our own memoirs, of Adam Clark, Spurgeon, and hundreds of others, the whole church, with the slightest exception, do the very next thing to it, it persistently ignores this foundation doctrine of the apostles. And why not? The churches are consistent with themselves; if the wicked go directly to hell, the righteous directly to heaven, at death, as Tindal, the first English translator of the Bible says, "What use have we for a resurrrection?" And the question is unanswerable. But according to the heading of this article, what of "Science falsely so-called?"

In all the travels of the apostle to the Gentiles, the most intensely religious city was the city of Athens. Xenophen, as quoted by Alford, says, that "the whole city is an altar, the whole city a sacrifice, and an offering to the gods."

Our version does them great injustice, for Paul does not accuse them of "superstition," but commends them, in the very outstart of his splendid speech, for being "very religious." In every considerable town to which he traveled, he found schools of philosophers, where the teachings of Socrates were held in the highest veneration; and so earnestly religious was he, that when his enemies, through jealousy, wished to get him down from the very high veneration he enjoyed, for the love that all had for him, like Daniel, the only possible chance, was to accuse him in regard to his religion. The religion and philosophy, which were interchangable terms with him, was, and is called Platonism; for Plato was both pupil and biographer of Socrates: and no more exalted, refined and highly cultured mind has ever graced the human race. Well, then, what is the matter?

The matter is that Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, and all the schools, with few exceptions, taught the same that the churches now teach, that man is immortal, ignoring, or denying the great, the glorious doctrine of resurrection of the body. So when Paul preached to the Athenians that one had been raised from the dead, "some mocked; and others said, we will hear thee again of this matter," putting the orator off with true Athenian politeness, but really dismissing the subject from their minds. And why not? We ask again, and again declare that they could do no otherwise in consistency with their established philosophy, that man is essentially immortal. Man's immortality was the chief corner-stone, as it is the chief stone in the corner of all "or so-called religious teachings of to-day.

I hope my readers will not think me dippant, for I have examined with care the teaching of the philosophy in vogue at the time our apostle wrote Col. ii. 8. He encountered certain philosophers of the Epicurians, and of the stoics (Acts xvii. 18), and made that masterly effort at the court of Areopagus.

While I do not wish to overrate, it appears that Moses could not, with all his wonderful opportunities, have had greater veneration for God than did Socrates. But see how Paul excuses the ignorance of the Athenians, and promises that God will wink or close his eyes to their errors. But what will he say to those who rob God of his re-creative power and Christ of the honor of being by right, in consequence of his obedience, "the first fruit" of all who sleep in the dust?

Oh! the error of not knowing the Scripture, or the power of God. Is that all? Is that the worst? Not all! Christian teachers, at least nearly all that the masses have, are driven, in consequence of the Pagan philosophy engrafted into their religious creeds; driven to the dire and absolute necessity of doing as did the "liar from the beginning," at the beginning, flatly deny God's most positive declarations.

I ask in good faith, not to to equivocate, what can be plainer? What philosophy more positive than this (Rom. vi. 23,) "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life (and that) through our Lord Jesus Christ." There is a Greek scholar writing to Greek scholars. What would an old Roman think the writer meant by the word "death?" The Serpent did know what it meant, and gave God the lie, liar as he was. What meaning would he, or you, my reader, put to the word "gift?" And how would he understand the declaration that "gift" obtained through, or by a certain "name?" Especially when not one of these to whom Paul wrote, nor perhaps you, my dear reader, had ever been educated, that is drawn through a Calvanistic or Armenian theological school. Poor unsophisticated Greek and Latin scholars would have to take these words in their natural meaning. Never would have come into their stupid heads that death meant eternal life in some shape or other. Never could they have thought, for want of this theological training, that God would beg of them in the most earnest terms, and that through the most stupendous sacrifice, to-wit, his only Son, to accept that, which they had always had, "eternal life."

But let us turn away, though with mournful feelings, from those aspiring and highly cultivated intellects, who without the light of the Gospel "would seek the Lord, if happily they might feel after him;" (Acts xvii. 27,) but with very different feelings from those who obstinately shut up their eyes and close their ears against the plainest teachings of God's word in their own hands, and learn what is the "power of God and the wisdom of God." 1 Cor. i. 24.

1 Pet. i. 3–5: "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which, according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you, who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed (when?) in the last time." Almost every word of this long sentence is an emphatic word.

Rom. v. 17, 21: "For if by one man's offence death reigned; by one; much more they which receive abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life by one Jesus Christ." "That as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord."

Please don't fail to notice how extremely cautious all the New Testament writers are to show, by continued repetitions, that eternal life is obtained only through the name of "Jesus Christ our Lord." And that it always represents it as not only the "gift of God," but is in consequence of "grace," that is the favor of God; and that too. "through righteousness," Christianity, as well as its founder, had always to withstand the "contradiction of sinners."

The "science falsely so-called," in, and previous to apostolic times, taught the immateriality and immortality of the soul: now this Aristotelian philosophy becomes the very ground work of all religious teaching, for, in the third and fourth centuries, it was fully incoporated into the dogmas of the church, by Origen in one form, and St. Augustine in another; the former laying the foundation of the error of Universalism, which, to say the least, is a humane doctrine, or error. The latter, by engrafting the error of an independent immortality on Christianity, laid the foundation of three of the most abominable and horrid doctrines ever taught. No Paganism has ever excelled in infamy what is taught as orthodox religion, in these so-called Christian lands, in these so-called Christian days, to-wit: Unconditional election and reprobation, called by its greatest teacher decretum horribile. Eternal existence, and continually increasing punishment and suffering of the wicked; the greatest slander against God and his revealed word ever uttered. Lastly, spiritualism, which to-day numbers millions.

And now, as regards the scientific teachings of the present exponents of philosophy, they are right as regards the mental and physical nature of man, for they teach that man has, and can have no thought or consciousness independent of a certain physical organization. Psa. cxlvi. 4. "His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish." It would be a work of supererogation to multiply such texts, which could be done by the score, but it is not out of the way to say that not one text, directly on that subject, can be found to contradict it.

While the philosophy of the present is all right on man, immortality and immateriality, tested by the whole Bible, philosophers may be very wrong in not accepting that most sublime and all important doctrine of future and eternal life by the resurrection of the body. And when we take into consideration that they are scientific and not religious men, who can blame them when the whole testimony of nature is directly against, what is taught as pure religion? In all England there is but one religious weekly paper published that teaches in accordance with the Bible on that all important subject. Thought is organic action as certainly as chopping wood. A dead man is precisely in the same condition that Adam was before "he became a living soul" or person. B fore he breathed he was a dead soul, or dead person; after man ceases to breathe, he becomes a lifeless or a dead person. With this difference, that on certain conditions of faith and obedience, he may have had "his name written in the Lamb's Book of Life" so as to have "a right to eat of the Tree of Life" after enjoying the dear bought privilege of having "a part in the first resurrection." In this, the church to-day is responsible for the infidelity of the day among the teachers of science; mournful thought. It looks as though the end was not far off, for "when the Son of Man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" Luke xviii. 8. One great difficulty in the way is the lack of meekness, you can find out that in a moment, by just touching professors of religion on this point; and leaders of scientific thought have just reason to be proud of the very high attainments obtained in their investigations; but in approaching God we must learn that "my strength is made perfect in weakness," (1 Cor. xii. 9,) it is only "when I am weak, then am I strong." Verse 10.

WM. DRESSER.

Russia has only 18,000 miles of railroad, and proposes to add thereto by constructing several long lines, among them one to span the empire from east to west, connecting European Russia with the Pacific by the way of Central Siberia. This will largely increase the demand for American locomotives.

Union.

Several articles have been published in the RESTITUTION in reference to a union of the believers of the Abrahamic faith, or the Gospel of the kingdom of God, with the Adventists, concerning which I wish to make a few brief remarks. A union without harmony would be simply jargon; oil and water will not mix; there is but one faith shall reign in life by one Jesus Christ." Eph. iv. 5. First the affirmative; we believe and advocate no doctrines or views that are not plainly taught and enjoined, both by precept and example, by Prophets, Christ and his holy apostles. We know of no doctrine taught, in either the Old or New Testament scriptures, which we do not believe, and hold to be essential to salvation. Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. Moses and Jesus. Hence the faith that pleases God must embrace the whole sum total of Divine Revelation. This is the broad, solid platform upon which we stand. No plank can be taken from it, none need nor can be added to it. It originated with, and came forth from the one Infinite and All-wise Jehovah. Man has a complete constitution and book of discipline of the Christian's manual. Well and truly does the apostle say: "It furnishes the man of God unto every good work."

We hold and teach that the Son of God, the Lord Jesus Christ, is the great head-center, and sure foundation and chief corner-stone of our most holy Christianity. We believe and teach that in the scriptures, that are essential to be believed and incorporated in our faith in order to have it perfect and well pleasing to God; prominent amongst them is the covenants and promises made of God unto the fathers of the Hebrew nation. These are of frequent occurence in the Old Testament scriptures. They are great and precious promises. They are often referred to by Christ and the New Testament writers. The reader is requested to begin with the 12th chapter of Genesis, and read carefully; If he is a hater of the much abused and down trodden Hebrew, he will find much to challege his honesty, his intelligence and his admiration. He will find that the Hebrew nation was God's selection, or election, through which God's purposes were to be accomplished in bringing forth the promised seed of the woman. God's Messiah, the Christ, through whom, and in whom, all the promises center.

To Abraham and his seed were the promises made. To leave Abraham out, and have all the promises fulfilled in the seed, is not dealing fairly with the inspired word of God. If we adopt the spiritual and apply it to Abraham, we must, to be consistent, apply the same rule to Isaac, Jacob and the sons of Israel, and the Christ and his reign on David's throne, and thus make a confused mess of spiritual nonsense. The return of Israel to their own land, under the reign of Christ, Abraham's seed, in the age to come, to the very identical plot of ground covenanted to Abraham, is most positively guaranteed in the covenants which the deity made with the father's of the Hebrew nation. Do those that are so anxious for union believe and incorporate the covenants of promise in their faith? Nay, verily God, in his mercy and wisdom, has called a class of men within the last half century to search the records and find the old paths that holy men of old, who wrote and spoke as they were moved by the holy spirit, were wont to walk in. Thanksgiving and glory be given to him, who, orders all things in wisdom, we have found the good old way, the straight and narrow way, which prophets, Christ and his apostles have so carefully and minutely laid down, and plainly written out in the unerring word of truth. We have been clearing away the rubbish that has been accumulating through the dark ages, which has culminated in the great apostacy of the last days, and now what is the outlook? Just what the prophet said: "Darkness covers the land, and gross darken the people But there is a remnant according to the election, who have not, and must not, for a moment leave their, great high and holy work, and calling of preaching, and publishing the gospel of the kingdom; the whole truth whether men will hear, or forbear. It is indeed a great work. No time for olds issues. God expects every man and woman to do their whole duty. Such and such, only, will be rewarded with a high position in the kingdom of God. In the name of the Lord of Hosts we set up our banner; and spread its ample folds to the breeze; inscribe on it, in large capitals, an open Bible the ancient gospel preached to Abraham; the gospel of the Kingdom as preached by the Son of God; One death, burial and resurrection; the kingdom, and coming of the great God, our Savior Jesus the Christ. A belief in the second coming of Christ, and the doom or destruction of the wicked are Bible truths; but they do not fill out the bill, nor fill up the sum total of the faith once delivered to the saints, which the apostles exort us to earnestly contend for. In closing this article we make an earnest appeal to believers of the Abrahamic faith, to come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty. We have greatly desired to hear from our highly esteemed Bros. B. Wilson and Mark Allen, old veterns of the cross, who battled nobly for the truth in those days when it tried men's souls. We are in the midst of the fight; it is a hand to hand conflict; we want your help; not one can be spared from our ranks; if you have been wounded in the severe fight with Apollyon and have retired to the rear, oh, that the balm of Gilliad may be applied to your wounds; mollified with ointment, and you be speedily restored to soundness, take your position in the front rank, and again, as of old, battle nobly for the truth. Oh, that Israel's God would appear for our deliverance. That he would take hold of the ends of the earth that the wicked might be shaken out of it.

NEWELL BOND.

The Great City.

And the great city was divided into three parts, and the cities of the nations fell; and great Babylon came in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath. Rev. xvi. 14.

"Who is the great city?

And the woman which thou sawest is that great city, which reigneth over the kings of the earth. Rev. xvii. 18.

What power is that?"

Without doubt, the papacy, the apostate church. No other power has reigned over the kings of the earth as she has. Is the city divided now, and if so, when did it take place?

I think it is, and took place at the Ecumenical council in 1870. Up to this time, the power was a unit.

Now it is divided by the vote, on infallibility, which made three parties. First, the majority for infallibility, second, the conservatives, third, the decided opposers to the dogma.

This is a death blow to her utter destruction, brought upon herself by her own act. "A city divided against itself cannot stand." She must fall, and the cities of the nations fall with her. Who are these? As the great city is an apostate church, symbolized by a lewd woman, the other cities are of the same order, or class, fallen churches, daughters of the mother.

This division of the great city, and fall of the smaller ones, shows that we are under the "seventh vial," the dregs of which will swallow up Babylon, represented by the "millstone cast into the sea." Have all the christians, came out of the great city, and also the smaller ones scattered among the nations? If not, there is no time to lose. The angel of destruction cannot finish his work, till the servants of God are safe, as in the flood, the cities of the plain, and Jerusalem. Judging from the state of things, where the proclamation of the ensuing kingdom, has been fully preached, this coming out, and turning away, from those that have the form of godliness, is almost finished up. The light has shone and been rejected, therefore they are left blind in the dark.

It is sad, but just.

There may be some outside of these cities, that may be reached, and saved by the "word," so let it go forth, in faithfulness till the end, for I feel that it is very near.

Whatever is done, must be done quickly, for the forbearance of a merciful God, cannot last much longer. The news of crime of every kind, that comes to us daily, from every part of the world, in this age of boasted civilization and christianity, is perfectly astounding. And yet multitudes are crying "peace and safety." Surely "sudden destruction will overtake them, and they shall not escape."

Brethren let us be ready, for the Lord is "nigh, even at the door."

I. ADAMS.

Palestine.

Travels to Palestine are annually becoming more numerous, and so are books and lectures on the Holy Land. This is well now, and argues well for the future. It springs from an enlarged desire for Biblical knowledge, and increases the amount of it. Before Dr. Farrar wrote his imitable "Life of Christ," he traversed all the acres our Lord's feet had trod, and thus was greatly aided in preparing his popular work. He calls Palestine a fifth Gospel, and pronounces it as valuable as either of the others. Unlike other countries the interesting sites in Palestine are perpetual, the inhabitants stereotyped, and their manner and customs are now exactly what they were eighteen centuries ago. The present is essentially a reproduction of the past. To borrow the language of an eloquent Oriental traveller; "The unchanged habits of the East render it a kind of a living Pompeii, the outward appearances which, in the case of the Greeks and Romans, we know only through art and writing, the marble fresco, and parchment; in the case of the Jewish history, we know through the forms of actual men living and moving before us, wearing almost the same garb and speaking in almost the same language and certainly with the same general terms of speech, tone and manners."—Messiah's Herald.

Gleanings on Prophecy.

Prophecy is history anticipated and contracted; history is prophecy accomplished and dilated. Lying oracles have been in the world; but all the wit and malice of men and devils cannot produce any such prophecies as are recorded in scripture.—Bp. T. Newton.

God doth not use teach his people to work in the dark; they are the children of light, and there are no deeds of darkness which they have to do. Yea, he always suits their light to their labor, and gives them a clear discerning of what he is about.—Dr. J. Owen.

God travels to satisfy our comfort, but not our curiosity.—Lord John Napier.

The giving ear to the Prophets is a fundamental character of the true church.—Sir I. Newton

A blessing is pronounced on those who hear and read the words of this prophecy, (Rev. 1:3,)...God commends the study of the book to us. Who, then, shall say, let it alone? .....I cannot but think it is a sin for any one to say he knows nothing about it. —B. Slight. M. A.

The prophetical portions of the sacred Scriptures....are a beacon light, in times of storm and agitation on the great ocean of human life, thrown out to guide us as we navigate, and to warn us of the breakers on dangerous coasts.—Dr. G. Duffield.

Prophecy is equivalent to any miracle, and is of itself evidently miraculous .....The voice of omnipotence alone could tell all that lay hid in dark futurity, which to man is as impenetrable as the mansions of the dead,—and both are alike the voice of God.—Dr. A. Keith.

God gave us his Word of prophecy, not to puzzle, mislead, or deceive, but to be a light to teach us his own purpose, and our duty and chief end.—James Scott.

No discussion on the fulfilment of prophecy must ever divert, but on the contrary, should draw our minds to the consideration of our personal safety in the sight of God. Are we hiding ourselves within the everlasting arms, —and when the last storm shall come, and the last storm shall come, and the last thunder shall roar, and the last fire shall shall blaze, are we conscious that we shall be found resting on the rock that shall never fail?—Dr. Cumming.

In God's time, which is the best time, and in God's way which is the best way, prophecy shall certainly be fulfilled.—Every word of Christ is very pure, and therefore very sure.—Matthew Henry.

As a band to bind these gleanings together, we may take the words of the Apostle; Despise not Prophesying.

Various Renderings of Isa. 26: 14, 19

Verse 14. "They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise; therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish."

"They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased tyrants, they shall not rise; therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them; and all memorial of them thou hast abolished."—Bishop Lowth's Translation of Isaih.

Verse 19. "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust; for the dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead."

"Thy dead shall live; my deceased, they shall rise; awake, and sing ye that dwell in the dust! for thy dew is as the dew of the dawn; but the earth shall cast forth, as an abortion, the deceased tyrants."—Lowth's Translation.

"And the earth shall cast out the dead."—As abortive birth is cast out of the womb, to which the grave is compared (Job i: 21.) But as the verb here used does not properly signify to cast out, but to cast down or cause to fall."—Benson's Commentary.

If then, the deceased tyrants are cast forth as an abortion, the text teaches most forcibly the resurrection of wicked men to a mortal life again.

V. P. SIMMONS.

In Shetland, which is the part of Scotland whence Shetland ponies originally came, some of the ministers live on $100 a year. They are expected to be as hardy as the ponies, and to live as cheaply. One minister, who has a wife and four children, gets about $125. There is no great rush of candidates for the ministry in Scotland.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God has spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates a return to this and, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the governments of the nations; the re-adoption of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and baptism as applicable to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

The Future Millennial Earth, The Inheritance of the Meek.

"But the meek shall inherit the earth, and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace." Psalms xxxvii: 11.

"Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." Matthew v: 5.

The Christian church was the consent during the first three centuries, and in every subsequent period of its greatest purity, received in a plain and literal sense those scriptures which relate to the Second Advent of Christ. The great council which condemned Arianism, proclaimed its belief in the literal meaning of the promise that the meek should inherit the earth, and all such like passages.

There are, indeed some Christians who think it derogatory to the glorious character of the promised kingdom to connect it with anything of earth. But let them remember that two of the eight beatitudes repeat the promise of inheriting the earth; and in the Lord's prayer, which is left for our use until the Lord returns in glory, we pray for this future inheritance, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth."

In regard to the time when the inheritance shall be entered on, it seems to be at the future descent of our Lord on this earth (Zech. xiv. 4.) and not at his preliminary appearing in the air, which is the first stage in his Second Advent, when he will gather up to himself into the Heavens all his saints, both quick and dead; having "changed their vile bodies, and fashioned them like unto his own glorious body." Then, as the first act of judgment, the principalities of the kingdom will be apportioned to the co-heirs, according to the diligence with which they have employed the talents entrusted to them; some being made rulers over ten, others five, or two, or one city. His coming down upon the earth is an event subsequent to his appearing above the earth. His feet shall then stand again on the mount from which he ascended (Acts i.) and it is said (Zech. xiv. 5.) "All the saints shall come with him." They must, therefore, have risen and left the earth before that time, or they could not come back with him.

During this recompensatory judgment of the saints in the aerial Heavens, the earth will be left in an awful state of anarchy; which will increase in violence till the apostate nations of the Roman earth, mustered under their papal and infidel heads, and led on by the man of sin, the Personal Antichrist, cry of the distressed children of Abraham reach the ear of their deliverer, and he will reveal himself in flaming fire to the utter destruction of their enemies and his. This is called in Joel and Malachi, "the great and terrible day of the Lord." The wicked shall burn and melt away in the presence of the Lord "like the fat of lambs," and "the transgressors shall be rooted out."

On the Jews thus delivered, "the spirit of grace and supplication shall be poured out, and they shall look on him whom they have pierced, and mourn for him as one mourneth for his only son." Zech. xii. 10. They will then be nationally converted; rebuild their city on the plain caused by the earthquake at Jesus' descent after the pattern given in Ezekiel's last eight chapters, and become missionaries to those nations who had not shared the apostacy, and had therefore escaped the first act of vengeance. "Then shall the Lord be king over all the earth." Zech. xiv. 9.

By the progress of the Heavens and the earth will emerge that great renewal of which we have spoken, and to which "all the prophets have testified since the world began." Not that the earth will be utterly destroyed by fire any more than it utterly perished by water. * * * After vengeance has been executed on the despisers of the Gospel, the earth itself will be "delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God." The removal of the curse will probably not be completed till the close of the Millennium; when after one more awful development of the odiousness of sin and rebellion, all the enemies of God shall be cast into the lake of fire. "There shall be nothing more to hurt or destroy in all this holy mountain of the Lord" forever. Perfect "righteousness shall dwell therein." This blighted planet shall again shine forth resplendent in beauty, as a trophy of the Redeemer's love; and throughout the universe but one note of praise be heard saying, "Alleuia, for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth."

If any are still disposed to call this a carnal doctrine, let them picture to themselves, if they can, any brighter joy or more intense delight, than where Jesus reigns the king of glory, there to reign with him, ever employed in his holy, happy service, "contrasting the wilderness where we toiled with the kingdom where we reign." It is indeed difficult to realize this glory now, where all betokens ruin, and defilement, and weariness; but let us remember that there is no natural connection between the earth and sin. The present affinity between materialism and corruption is an accident, not a necessity; it is the execution of a sentence, on what every one of the prophets declares to be a remedial disaster. "God hath given the earth to the sons of men:" and there can be no thwarting of his purpose. The supremacy of the Most High may at present appear to the infidel to be successfully disputed; but Satan shall at length be seen to be righteously deprived of his headship over the earth, and man, the original heir shall be reinstated in his restored inheritance. "The meek shall inherit the earth, and delight themselves in the abundance of peace."

The Millennial earth which the meek shall inherit will be brighter and purer. There will be no more oppressive labor. Thorns, and thistles, and weeds, and other marks of the curse being removed, cultivation will be toilless. Amos ix. 13. The once barren mountain shall "drop down with new wine," —wine of an incorrupt kind, which our Lord said he should drink with his disciples in that kingdom.

This inheritance will be the fifth monarchy, typified in the vision of Daniel by "the stone cut out of the mountain;" a dominion erected on the ruins of the fourth monarchy, or ten kingdoms of the Roman earth, consumed by fire. Daniel ii. 44-46. vii. 11.

—By B. Philpot, Rector of Donnington, Suffolk, England.

We are neither surprised nor sorry, says the London Freeman, to learn that the state of affairs in Spain is giving so much trouble to the pope, that he has summoned a meeting of the cardinals to consider what they will do to stay the alarming progress of principles which are truly Catholic and therefore anti-Romish. The delight with which the Cortes listened the other day to the magnificent oration of Senor Castellar in behalf of toleration was a wonderful sign of the times, and must have made the priests gnash their teeth.

A Response to Wm. Hicks.

In the conclusion of his reply to brother Weethee, the above writer says, "Will any reader give us the result of his thought upon what is left of man after death, which will continue in existance of any kind, and be raised again in the form of the personality that died." I respond from his standpoint.

It cannot be the immortal spirit, that is the subject of the resurrection; for

1st. It is not dead. 2nd. It had no form while in the body, has none now, and of course, cannot "be raised in the form of the personality that died" 3rd. If it has form, it by no means follows that it is identical with the form of the body, or that it will determine that form at the resurrection. 4th. The resurrection is the exclusive privilege of that which was "sown in corruption."

Whatever may be said about the deathless spirit, or its separate existence it cannot, even remotely, affect the question of the resurrection. The pith of the question at last, is evidently that from our standpoint, "there is nothing to raise." But let it be remembered that nothing can be raised, but what is dead. He believes that the body alone is dead: therefore the body alone can be raised. But his question evidently implies his belief that there must be a conscious entity, which has survived the stroke of death and ready to re-enter the body, upon its reconstruction. The question is pertinent, therefore, does he believe the body to be the same? if so his question is answered: it is the body that has continued in existence of some kind, to be raised in the form of the personality that died, and his theory of a deathless spirit is a useless one. But if it is not the same body that died, then a new one has to be prepared some time. Why not at the moment of death? So Beecher's theory of the resurrection is the correct one, and we can say with him "good by, old body, good by." The moment then in which Jesus expired on the cross, he was raised from the dead; will he explain what became of the useless lumber with which his disciples dealt so gently and so affectionately: and how the marks of his crucifixion came in the new body? Indeed will the enquirer show us the necessity or possibility of a resurrection from that standpoint.

But some of us can see, what perhaps brother Hicks sees, that science teaches that at death the body utterly perishes, and is absorbed by the surrounding elements, so that entering into ten thousand new combinations, its individuality is lost or involved in that of others, who are likewise looking for their share in the resurrection. In such a case his question is a very pertinent one. The attempt to avoid the difficulty by the supposition of a deathless spirit is as we have seen, futile and rather overthrows the doctrine of the resurrection altogether. The supposition of some part of the body remaining unchanged, and undestroyed, while mingling with the earth, a part in which memory, consciousness and responsibility reposed, has been resorted to by some to clear up the difficulty, but it only increases it, by supposing the real man to escape death altogether; while it is manifest that the dead alone can be raised. We have then this blank, hopeless (to the world) fact, staring us in the face and we are called on to account for the resurrection, with it full in view; viz, the dead are utterly, absolutely blotted, temporarily, from actual being, how then can they be raised? I answer, "they live unto God." But what do these words mean. Simply that in the mind, memory and purpose of God alone they live, or exist. Actually, they have no existence. Personally, intelligently, really, they are as though they never had been: but God preserves the pattern of the man in his memory; they live in his memory. He has resolved to reproduce them, or resurrect them: they live in his purpose. As to whether a resurrection is possible under such a state of facts, it is simply a question of God's power. Can God exactly reproduce a being who has vanished from actual existance? For the Christian there is but one answer: He can. Very well that is the resurrection. If any object that it would be a new creation: the answer is very true, such is the resurrection. It is not the creation of a new being; it is the new creation: the recreation, of an old one; and in the words of Dr. Thomas any other dust will do as well.

Very respectfully,

J. F. WILCOX.

A Mistake Corrected.

In an article written by J. W. Wilson, published in the RESTITUTION for the 14th of June, I find the following paragraph, to which I will venture to offer an objection:

"On the night of Rs (the breaking of bread) ordination no one partook of it but Jesus and the eleven disciples; Judas, the traitor, did not partake with them, but immediately left when he had received the sop from Jesus, at the Passover supper, eaten just previous."

Against this proposition I enter my protest, because the premise being untrue, the conclusion must necessarily also be untrue.

First, then we notice the premise of the above proposition. Viz: "That Judas received the sop from Jesus at the passover supper." Upon this proposition the writer bases his conclusion that Judas did not participate with the rest of the disciples in the eating of the loaf as an emblem of Christ's broken body. Now, the premise being untrue, it follows that the conclusion also must be wrong. And that this major proposition is untrue, is evident from the testimony of the evangelical writers. For, according to their united testimony, Jesus gave the sop to Judas, two days before the feast of the passover, at a common supper in the town of Bethany, about two miles distant from Jerusalem: while the passover was celebrated in Jerusalem: therefore it could not have been at the passover supper that the sop was given to Judas, the traitor. But now for the proof. Now, John does not expressly tell us how long before the feast of the passover it was that Jesus gave the sop to Judas, but he does say, in the first of the 13th chapter of his narrative, that it was before, and not at the feast, that these things occurred, of which he is about to speak. He then enumerates several things, and then in the 26th and 27th verses says, that when Jesus had dipped the sop he gave it to Judas Iscariot, and th n after he had received the sop Satan entered into him. Then in the 30th verse, he says that when he (Judas) had received the sop he immediately went out. Now, John does not tell us what Judas went out for, but the other evangelists are all agreed in saying that he went out to make a contract with the chief priests to betray Jesus unto them: and two of them, viz: Matthew and Mark, tell us that this occurred two days before the passover; hence, not at that supper. And Luke says that the passover drew nigh. Hence, not yet present. From the foregoing we learn that Jesus ate a supper in the town of Bethany two days before the passover feast, that at the close of said supper Jesus said that one of his disciples should betray him; and on being enquired of by John, which one of them was to be traitor, Jesus told him that he would dip, and give a sop to him who was to be the traitor, by which John might know who the traitor was: that the sop was given to Judas; that then Satan entered into him, and then he went unto the chief priests to make the said contract. All this occurred two days before the feast of the passover: therefore not at the feast. And hence, Bro. W. has no authority for saying that Judas did not participate, with the rest of the disciples in celebrating the communion, than that Peter or John did not partake of it. For Judas was one of the twelve present with Jesus at the passover supper: and no one can show that he left the room until the singing of the hymn, after which all went out, unto the Mount of Olives. Consult Matt. xxvi. 2-30. Mark, xiv. 1-26. Luke xxii. 1-21. John xiii. 1-27.

How Bro. W. or any one else can connect the supper referred to by John in the 13th chapter of his narrative, with the introduction of the communion, when he never refers to this institution at all, is a profound mystery to me. And how Bro. W. can assert that Judas was not present at the introduction of the said ordinance is more than a mystery to me; when Luke expressly states in his narrative, (Luke xxii. 21.) that after the completion of this ordinance, Jesus said: "Behold, the hand of him that betrayeth me is with me on the table."

Bro. W's. mistake simply originated in identifying with the passover supper, the supper eaten in Bethany, two days before the celebration of the latter in the city. This error leads to other, and more serious ones, as, for instance, the connecting of feet washing with the communion, thus making the former a church ordinance in connection with the latter: causing much disturbance, contention and dissatisfaction among brethren, at times.

This is the reason why I have written the foregoing strictures: which I now submit to the candid consideration of the brotherhood, for the truth's sake. JOSEPH MESMORE.

Demonology.

There is published in the current number of the Contemporary Review, an account by Mr. Robert C. Caldwell of the state of belief on the subject of the devil among the untutored tribes of India. If Mr. Cook would like to have his orthodox heart refreshed by acquaintance with undoubting faith, in the personality and power of the devil, let him read Mr. Caldwell's article. The poor creatures, whose lives are a perpetual struggle with plague, fever, starvation, tigers, wolves, and other terribly concrete ills, afflict themselves still more deplorably by implicitly believing in the supernatural power of devils, which enter into and possess human beings. In the power of goodness—in the power of God—these wretched mortals have small faith; but the wildest heretic of the waste, the most advanced and dangerous liberal of the forest, does not question the might of the devil. Cholera suddenly attacks a village. Not to God, but to the local devil, do the stricken villagers have recourse. The spectre haunts a huge solitary banyan tree which rises amid the sand, and the priest, distinguished by being occasionally possessed by this devil, inhabits a lonely hut in its shadow. The plague having come a wild crowd of men, women, and children rush towards the tree and the hut. A circle is formed; goats and fowls are got ready for sacrifice; tom-toms are frantically beaten. The ricketr door of the hut opens, and the demon-possessed emerges. "He is a tall, haggard, pensive man, with deep-sunken eyes and matted hair. His forehead is smeared with ashes, and there are streaks of vermillion and saffron over his face. He wears a high conical cap, white, with a red tassel. A long white robe shrouds him from neck to ankle. On it are worked, in red silk, representations of the goddess of small-pox, murder, and cholera." In one hand he holds a sacrificial knife, shaped like a sickle. He begins crooning as Indian lay in a low voice, with head drooping on his breast. He swings slowly to and fro, from side to side. "Look! you can see his fingers twitch nervously. His head begins to wag in a strange, uncanny fashion. His sides heave and quiver, and huge drops of prespiration exude from his skin. The tom-toms are beaten faster, the pipes and reeds wail out more loudly. There is a sudden yell, a singing, stunning cry, an ear-piercing shriek, a hideous, abominable gobble-gobble of hellish laughter, and the devil-dancer has sprung to his feet with eyes protruding, mouth foaming, chest heaving, muscles quivering, and outstretched arms swollen and straining as if they were crucified! Now, ever and anon, the quick, sharp words are jerked out of the saliva-choked mouth—'I am God! I am the true God!' Then all around him, since he and no idol is regarded as the present deity, reeks the blood of sacrifice. Such is the devil-worship that exists at this moment in India. Such has been the devil-worship of all very degraded and intellectually feeble tribes. The man of science now-a-days pronounces the possession of the priest a horrible form of brain-disease; and a vast portion of the best theologians in Europe are of opinion that the language applied in Scripture to the devil and to demons, adapted as Scripture language always is to the state of belief at the time when it was spoken or written, may be understood to have reference to some similar form of disease. On this point we do not speak, but it assuredly is because the Christian nations are now, what ever may be their sins or sorrows, both happier and better than history proves nations ever to have been in this world, that the existence of an intelligent spirit disputing with God the sovereignty of the universe has been extensively doubted.

Rome and the Bible.

Is it not clear to the plainest understanding, that the church of Rome must feel herself to be in antagonism with the word of God, and condemned by the word of God, when she fears to give that word to the people, and, with the most persistent determination, seeks to exclude our glorious old common version, from the common schools of the country; nay, to exclude any and every version of it, even from her own children? If she is not afraid of the light, why does she strive to keep the popular mind in darkness? If she is not afraid that the "sincere milk of the word" will nourish her children and ours, to thoughts of religious liberty incompatible with her claims, why does she withhold that milk from the lambs of the flock? If she feels confident of her infallibility and power, and in that consciousness has so little to fear from Protestantism, why is she in such dread of a free and open Bible? Why not let the Bible take its way, as hitherto, in this free land? If she is right, will not a free and open Bible advance her claims the more the people understand it? If she is wrong, had she not better let the Bible put her right? If she is afraid that the people will find Protestantism in our good old English Bible, or even in her Douay Bible, can't she make a Bible, or at least a translation of it, which she is not afraid to give to the people and to her own children? Half a loaf is better than no bread. The most imperfect translation is better than no Bible.

If we could get the church of Rome circulating any sort of a Bible among the masses of the people, we should hail it as the dawn of a better day. But does not the church of Rome hold the Bible to be the revealed word of God? She does: and claims to be the very channel through which it has come down to us. Why then should a revelation from God be locked up from the people, imbedded forever like a fossil in the rocks? Admit that the Bible was early given to the church of Rome as she claims, is it her grand mission to fossilize it under the mountains of her traditions on the plea of safe-keeping? The pyramids of Egypt might have kept it in a mummy case just as well. She might as well contend that God has authorized her to bury the sun, as to hide his word in the way she has done it. Her steadfast unwillingness to let the people have the Bible in their schools, is a demonstration strong as Holy Writ, that she is in direct antagonism to the will of God, and to the whole letter and spirit of his word.—Selected.

The Stone Which the Builders Refused.

I have heard a story by some one of the Jewish Rabbis; it is a tale concerning the text: "The stone which the builders refused, the same is become the headstone of the corner."

It is said when Solomon's temple was building all the stones were brought from the quarry ready cut and fashioned, and each block marked for the place it was to occupy. Among the stones was a very curious one; it seemed of no describable shape, and appeared unfit for any portion of the building. They tried it in this wall, then in another, but it could not be accommodated; so, vexed and angry, they threw it away. The temple was so many years building, that the stone became covered with moss, and grass grew around it.

Everybody passing by laughed at the stone; they said Solomon was wise, and doubtless all the other stones were right, but as for that block they might as well send it back to the quarry, for they were quite sure it was meant for nothing. The years rolled on, and the poor stone was despised; the builders constantly refused it. The eventful day came when the temple was to be finished and opened, and the multitude was to see the grand sight. The builders said: 'Where is the top stone? where is the pinnacle?' They little thought where the crowning marble was until one said: "Perhaps that stone which the builders refused is meant to be the top stone." They hoisted it to the top, and found it exactly adapted to the place. Loud hosannas made the welkin ring as the stone which the builders refused became the headstone of the corner.

THE RESTITUTION

PLYMOUTH, IND., ... AUGUST 2 1876

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

☞Sunshine for August is out. It is to be hoped that our friends will take hold of this juvenile paper in earnest. Bro. Willcox writes us that he must have more subscribers. There are many who do not realize the great importance of sustaining a paper for the young, and there are those who have never yet seen a copy of this excellent paper. Specimen copies can be had at any time addressing the editor at Goodland, Ind. We truly hope our friends will give Bro. W. substantial help. Let every reader take at least one copy. Sunshine is one of the best and most readable papers published, and should be liberally patronized.

A Crusty Answer.

"J. N. B," Plainfield, (Conn.)—We do not receive the paper named THE RESTITUTION, and if as you say, it calls us to an account for our defence of Thomas Paine, it is hardly worth noticing unless the lady editor (Mrs. H. V. F.) should send us her paper containing the attack. We understand that she is a very fervent Christian, but the religion which abuses such a benefactor of his race as Thomas Paine, is a very poor affair, and to attack us without sending her paper containing her remarks, shows that she is about as deficient in courtesy as in liberality of religion."

We clip the above from the last number of the Boston Investigator, an infidel sheet. The RESTITUTION has been mailed regularly to said paper for the last six months. It is strange that the Investigator has never received a copy. Wonder if all "exchanges" which advocate Christianity, never meet the eye of the editor?

Fashionable Religion.

There is much truth in the following description of modern preaching and religion:

"A fashionable London chapel is the worst possible school of divinity. Fine ladies flock thither for a little religious excitement. The Sunday sermon is their Sunday dram. An impassioned manner, real or assumed—a flow of high-sounding words strong appeals to the imagination; sweeping assertions, with as little argument as need be, and nothing of grave simplicity or solemn thoughtfulness about the whole—are pretty sure to fill a metropolitan chapel, especially when the preacher is neither old nor ill-favored, and has a liberal supply of portraits in the print shops! But we shall deceive ourselves greatly if we encourage the conviction that the cause of true religion is promoted by this crushing of carriages, and this storming of pews. The atmosphere is altogether an unwholesome atmosphere. There is a smell of the foot lamps. The whole thing is a show—a spectacle—men flock to it as they do to a theatre—and women as they swarm to an execution."

Must Have a Hero.

It is one of the leading ideas of scepticism, that all high minded men, men of true independence, have no heroes. They do not subscribe to any religious dogmas—nothing but nature will do for them. They believe in no God, but themselves. They glory in their egotism and self-respect. But is it not for them to have a God, a Christ, or a Spirit? No, no; they call all forms of religious worship fanaticism or hero-worship. Without stopping to account for this universal desire of man to worship a being greater than himself, they create heroes of their own. If the Boston Investigator is a fair sample of other infidel sheets, heroes are quite numerous. Thomas Paine is exalted to the stars; he is now having a monument erected to his memory in the form of the Memorial Hall. The sceptics have a Paine Fund to which infidels contribute. We do not object to this; but it looks a little odd for these sceptics to be constantly berating Christians for bowing before the Majesty of heaven, and hoping for a future life, and they at the same time are glorifying a man like Paine. They show more zeal for Paine than many Christians do for Christ. Even poor scepticism must have a hero.

Editorial Brevities.

The leading Catholic's dignitary of France receives an annual salary, from the state, of $12,000. While the leading Archbishop of the church of England gets $15,000. No wonder the English church wants to continue to be married to the state.

According to Masonic authority, there have been 24,000 additions to Masonry, in the United States, during the last year. Would that Christianity, pure and simple, could grow as fast.

There is a National Holiness Association in America. The members claim to be a Simon-pure sinless class, but strange to say there is enough of the old Adam in the organization to make a number of its leading members resign their positions. That men should labor to live as near the altar as possible, there can be no question, but when they proclaim to the world that they are holier than other men, the pretension savors too much of egotism and self-righteousness. The National Holiness Association is a fanatical body of zealots and will crumble under its own weight.

The Peace Society met last week, in Philadelphia. It implores the President to be mild with the Indians. While they are thus asking forbearance, the wild savages are taking copious drinks of fire water and scalping the whites.

The American Palestine Society is prosecuting its work with commendable zeal. Facts are being brought to light almost daily, which are tending, in a great degree, to remove all doubts about certain localities which have been in dispute. We hope soon to give our readers some of the results of recent discoveries.

The news from the seat of war, in Turkey, is highly favorable to Servia. Turkey has been thus far worsted in every engagement. The Turks are very hostile towards Christians. The latest advices give the following account of horror:

PARIS, July 31.—The Courier's special telegrams give details of massacres by the Turks in Bosnia. Three hundred Christians were tortured and drowned in the villages of Pervan and Femar. Twelve women were cut to pieces at Pavics. Sixty children were stoned to death at Rathlovo. One hundred and eighty girls were violated and murdered at Sokolovo. Three thousand Christians were massacred at Prvelor.

Some of our readers are not aware of the fact that Sabbatarians loose annually a respectable number of their followers. Many honest hearted people get addled with the sophisms of their books and preachers, and for a while try to keep Saturday. After the fog blows away they come back to the Gospel of Christ wherein the "righteousness of God is revealed" in contrast with the "righteousness of the law." See Rom. i. 15. 16; Rom. ix. 30 33, and x. 1-15.

Preparation.

Be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh. Matt. xxiv. 44.

Man unhappily, never properly estimates the value of probationary time, nor rightly realizes the vanity of human pursuits, till, at the termination of life's journey, he stands with one foot on the last shore, and with the other in the cough of the cold river. The pictured canvas of the past then comes into the view without any concealment. And a dreadful picture it generally is, smirched over with the dark stains of sin. When man's life comes under review just as he has made it, and he realizes that his individual character is to pass the scrutiny of impartial, unbribable justice, with eternal profit or loss staked on its decisions, how real everything becomes. It was so with the merchant, that had amassed the hundred thousands of wealth, when death confronted him to berea e him of all but personal, moral worth of character;—extorting the exclamation, "My life has been a failure!" It was so with England's proud and honored queen, when the skeleton form entered her gilded apartments, and, with slim, bony index finger, pointed her to the tomb as her next bed chamber; wringing from her agonized heart the expression, "Millions for a moment of time!"

However unconcerned we may pass our lives, we tremble, shudder, and sink in despair as we come to that crisis where we must meet the doom for eternity, without the possibility of change in either life or character. Such feelings and such despair are soon to seize, not upon an individual alone, but upon the millions of the unsaved. Some solemn day in the comparatively near future brings all at once to the decisive test of their moral worth. A compliance with the Gospel requirements alone can save. Our commission is to preach the Gospel,—to publish the glad tidings of salvation; but, alas! we are not doing it. We are mostly wasting our time and energies in discussing destinies that we can never affect or change, and abandoning the living men and women of our own age to go to destruction unwarned. To writers, preachers, and editors, a soon-coming judgment is fraught with fearful responsibilities. If we could only see things as they really are, our writing would be in another style, our preaching different in both matter and manner, and our paper would become an entirely new sheet. A lost world is on the eve of the judgment, and sickening tepid water is expressive of the church's condition. The midnight cry may peal out at any moment, only to reveal the lethargy that locks the professedly expectant virgins in deep slumber till the Bridegroom himself is just present. We are busying ourselves about almost everything with which we have little or no concern, and giving to matters of infinite importance, both to ourselves and others, the most heedless indifference. Salvation from the condemnation and guilt of sin in this world, and from its awful effects and consequences in the future, is the imperatively important subject. Watchfulness and prayer are the solemn duties of the present hour. Sacrifice of ourselves and our means, and individual consecration of heart and life, are the demands of the Judge whom we must soon meet. May we be found of him in peace without spot and blameless.

The New Heavens and Earth.

It is generally believed that the three heavens, referred to in the Bible, are similar to a three-storied house, each rising above the other.

Peter in his third Epistle presents three successive heavens and earths to represent two dispensations of ungodly men, and one dispensation of godly men. Probation has, and will be extended through all three of these dispensations. And though ungodliness has prevailed to an overwhelming extent during both these dispensations, yet godliness has also run like an antithetical line through them both as the result of trial; and notwithstanding, righteousness shall greatly predominate in the third dispensation, or the age to come, yet there will be sinners, who will be just as liable to sin as Adam was before the fall. A restoration will only replace man in the same position he occupied before he sinned. Anything more would not be a restoration, but a reward for personal fidelity the same as would have been bestowed upon Adam had he proved loyal. God's original plan is as immutable as God himself, and therefore, can no more change than God himself can change. The same plan, therefore, will be carried out in every respect, through Christ, that would have been carried out through Adam had he obeyed his Creator. A plan which would place Adam's posterity beyond temptation would not be a restoration, but an entirely new plan. Christ is not an example for such men, because he "was tempted in all points like as we are yet without sin." Shall it be affirmed that God's dealings with neither the first or second Adam, nor any to whom he has made known his revealed will, has established a precedent or example of what the restitution, or the carrying out his original purpose concerning man and earth shall be? Or must we understand the writer referred to as teaching, that if Adam had obeyed God, all temptation would have been removed from his posterity? If so, why was not all temptation to sin removed from the race in anticipation of the certain obedience of the second Adam; and thus have prevented the everlasting destruction of unnumbered millions? Will not a restitution carry out the original plan? If trial is not necessary to salvation billions might have been saved who will be forever destroyed.

The idea of probation presupposes trial, and trial, jeopardy. If no law or trial is necessary, then the race might have been saved in perfect harmony with the same principle which will save billions in the age to come without temptation, and consequently without law, trial or development of character. But I will proceed to investigate the new heaven and earth dispensation, and we will see whether there shall be no test or trial in that age.

Webster's first definitions of probation are, "to try, examine, prove." 2. "To determine character, examination, trial." Are we to understand that there shall be no trial, test, or examination during millennial era; and consequently no merit, demerit, saints or sinners, rewards or no punishment? We shall see. The Apostle Peter having presented two worlds of ungodly men, represented by two successive heavens and earths, says, "Nevertheless we according to his promise look for new heavens and new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." 2 Pet. iii. 13. At the time Peter used this language there was but one promise in which God had declared his purpose to create a new heaven and a new earth. This promise may be found recorded in Isaiah sixty-fifth chapter.

Let it be remembered that the language I am about to quote is the language of the great God himself. He says: "For behold I create new heavens and new earth; and the former shall not be remembered or come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I create; for behold I create Jerusalem a rejoicing and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people; and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying."

1. According to the foregoing, God commences the grand work of creating a new heavens and earth by restoring Jerusalem and her people—the Jews—the metropolitan city and the kingdom proper.

2. There will be no more weeping or crying in her—Jerusalem.

According to the Revelator's description of the same new heaven and earth he presents the holy city New Jerusalem as the metropolitan city of the world. Rev. xxi. 24. Also in Rev. v. 9, 10; xx. 1, 2, 6; xxi. 24; xxii. 1-5, 12-14, we learn that the thrones of Christ and his associate rulers are within that metropolitan city; and they are reigning over mortal nations who are diseased and therefore mortal subjects of judgment and mercy; and individually required to keep the commandments of God as Adam was that they may have access to the tree of life to eat and live forever as Adam might have done had he obeyed God's law. By reference to Rev. xix. 6, 7, we may learn that these nations will be required to believe the glad tidings of the millennial age and worship the Creator of heaven and earth or suffer his judgments; and according to the song of the redeemed this obedience will be produced by the judgments of God. Rev. xv. 1-4. Thus, clearly teaching that all these nations will be placed upon trial or probation.

According to the second Psalm, when the Son of God shall be enthroned in Zion the great God will call upon the kings of earth and the judges of the world to submit to his royal Son or be destroyed; and he closes with a blessing pronounced upon all who shall put their trust in him. In Psalms lxxii., It is declared that all kings shall fall down before David's royal Son, and all nations shall serve him; and that his enemies or those who refuse obedience, shall lick the dust, or be destroyed.

Referring to the Jerusalem of the millennial era, the Prophet Isaiah says, that "the nations and kingdoms that will not serve thee shall perish; yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted." Isa. lx. 12.

According to Zechariah 14th, after Christ shall overthrow the assembled kings and armies of earth, the remnant of all nations will be required to come up and worship the King of the whole earth or be destroyed with famine and pestilence. These will be the judgments with which he will smite all the nations that refuse obedience to this standing statute of the world. Thus clearly teaching that, notwithstanding, the last phase of the kingdom of men, (Dan iv.) (great Gog and his leagued hosts represented by the Apocalyptic Dragon with his seven heads and ten horns, and a tail reaching the stars) shall be held in check, the nations will not be free from trial and fearful jeopardy. The will of God will be the supreme law of the world. Matt. vi. 10. All nations will be rebuked, judged, or tested by the law of God which shall go forth from Zion. Isa. ii. 1-4; Micah iv. 1-3.

The kingdom of Israel when restored will be upon probation just as much as when God required them to keep his commandments or be destroyed. Ex. xix. 5, 6. When united as one kingdom in the land they will be commanded to keep the statutes of God or be destroyed as individuals the same as when dwelling in their own land.

In my next article I will prove that all men who shall be living during the millennial age will be upon probation as individuals for life.

The two most important results of the work of the British Palestine exploring party have been the fixing of the site of the Cave of Adullam, and the site of our Lord's baptism. The Cave of Adullam is one of a series of caves which would accommodate 300 men. There are two kinds of caves: those of water-worn origin, damp, the abode of bats, and unhealthy, and small, dry caves, still inhabited and showing traces of inhabitation at different periods. Among the Adullam caves is one larger than the others, probably used by David himself. The site of our Lord's baptism is recorded as being at a ford near Bethabara. The party determined to trace all the fords of the Jordan, and on an average they found three fords to a mile. Nothing was found at all answering to their search, when near the end of their survey of the Jordan they struck a ford called Abara without the "Beth," which means a house. The position with regard to the villages where our Lord is recorded to have been just previously suits admirably, and this is supposed to be the original spot of the baptism. Severe fever and the cholera have compelled the party to stop work for the present, and it will return to England to recruit.—Christian Union.

To Brother Stephenson.

In the RESTITUTION of June 28th, in a letter you address to Bro. Allerton, you speak of me in a way that I know you misapprehend me, and I wish to disabuse your mind of that misapprehension. I did not "covertly" nor openly attack you. You are not named at all. I did not call you a Universalist, nor anything else. I had seen before your position that you now enunciate: That not "a single son or daughter of Adam will be made immortal without having complied with the conditions prescribed in the Word of God."

Yes, I am willing "to give all as fair a chance" as the Book of God gives—no more, no less. It is none of my business, nor is it yours, nor that of any one else, what kind of chance God gives. Happily for us and for all, this whole thing is in the hands of the All-wise, the All-merciful One.

Bro. Stephenson, you misapprehend me in reference to yourself. I love you; I know you, and especially for your great work for the Master. I know you have labored in the cause much more extensively than I, and no one would greet you with kindlier feeling. True, I have mourned that your large heart has led your great brain into the fair chance, and especially to unite upon it. You must admit, everybody must admit, that, if even true, it cannot benefit us here where the Gospel is. You cannot teach it to the heathen dead, whom alone it could benefit. There is enough in the Gospel of the kingdom in all its phases, in faith, repentance, baptism, the remission of sins, prayer, the Lord's Supper, brotherly love, Christian courtesy, charity, the organization and government of the church, the great hope, the mighty subjects of life and death, to occupy your great mind during the longest period of your life without resorting to teaching doctrine that is equivocal, to say the least of it.

If the brethren would at once, now and always, agree to abandon the teaching of this doctrine, both orally and by the pen, those who believe that there are but two classes—the just and the unjust—to be raised, would, I am sure, cease speaking and writing upon the subject of a class never to be raised from the dead. I cannot see that either doctrine benefits us here where the Gospel is. As a matter of compromise, in order to heal divisions, restore confidence and Christian love, will not the brethren do this? If these must be held, let them be held in abeyance, and let that Gospel alone be preached, which Paul affirms is "a savor of life unto life, or of death unto death."

If the fair chance friends, for the good of the cause, will agree to do this, if those on our side will not do so, I will agree to do all I can to shunne them into it. Is not this fair? Let us abandon the agitation of these subjects, especially as they cannot do us any good, in order to accomplish a greater work.

As this is my proposal, and in earnest, and as I shall never allude to either doctrine again unless compelled to in self-defense, I ask my readers to re-read my article on "Fair Chance and Bible Chance," in RESTITUTION of June 14th. I would also say for Bro. Stephenson's enlightenment concerning myself, that my profession and many other pressing engagements, render it impossible for me to teach extensively; but I do all that I can, have done all that I could, in that line for more than thirty years, gratuitously. I did so when I belonged to the so-called Christian church, and have done so ever since I have belonged to the church of God. Never have I charged a cent for laboring in the Word. When I have gone far from home and expended money of my own in the tripe, I have asked that these expenses only be paid. Nor have I done this always. And so far as in me lies, I shall so continue to do.

My faith in the doctrine advocated in the article alluded to, is unshaken. I only ask that if my language anywhere seems harsh, has wounded, the brethren forgive me this seeming harshness. I have nothing to call back in my arguments upon the Scriptures quoted; indeed I could add to them largely, even in reference to the little word "all." I cannot now call to mind one single Scripture in which it is used where it means the entire race. The nearest to it is where Eve is called the mother of all living. It is not even universal here; for she was not the mother of Adam.

But it is not arguments for, nor against the fair chance, that I now wish. I wish peace. I wish love in the brotherhood. I wish a greater consecration of the whole brotherhood in spirit and in work to the cause of God, that cause which cost the life and blood of the redeemer! I wish a long effort, a strong effort, a united effort of all the brethren and sisters for the cause of the bible, the cause of God, and the cause of man's redemption and glorification. Brethren and sisters, we extend to you, one and all, our heart and hand in Christian greeting and fellowship.

Affairs in Roumania are rapidly approaching a crisis, with every indication that this power of province will soon cast its strength on the side of the Russian guns. The cable announces that 25,000 Roumanian troops are massed on the Danube frontier in an attitude so threatening as to have drawn a large force of Turks to guard the opposite bank. The impossibility of preventing a conflict between these opposing armies, is too evident to admit of a doubt that before many days elapse, the eastern war will have assumed a more serious phase than heretofore. Already the integrity of Roumanian territory has been violated by small parties of Turkish pillagers from the main army, and a general engagement is apprehended.

The Times' special says the Turks at Widdin, after two hours fighting, fled in an uncontrollable panic. The greater part of the army was lost. Belek is surrounded. There is a panic at Trebinje. This disaster leaves Herzegovina practically defenseless.

RAGUSA, July 30.—Advices from Sclavonic sources confirm the intelligence of the complete defeat of the Turks on the 18th inst. near Vrbiza. The Montenegrins captured 300 Nizams besides Osman Pacha, five guns, and several flags. The Turks attacked the Montenegrins at Hutschi, but were repulsed. Selim Pasha was wounded.

A Ragusa dispatch says Mouktar Pasha admits losing 1,000 men in the fight with the Montenegrins.

The Standard's special from Kalafat says the Turkish army crossed the Servian frontier at Nissa, Saturday. A great battle is expected. There is great excitement at the seat of war among Christians on account of a proclamation by Dervish Pasha, Turkish commander in Bosnia, prohibiting quarter to Christians.

VIENNA, July 30.—Advices from Belgrade state that Muktar Pasha, with sixteen battalions of Turkish troops, attacked the Montenegrin army numbering 10,000 men, near Bilek, on Friday last, and after a severe battle lasting several hours, the Turks were routed. Only four of the battalions succeeded in reaching shelter. At Bilek the Montenegrins captured five Krupp guns and many prisoners. Including the Turkish commander, Osman Pasha. Sultan Murad Effendis, has signed his abdication. The Turkish and Austrian governments support the project of Karageorgevich to dethrone Prince Milanda.

It is reported here that England has begun negotiations for peace between Turkey and Servia.

The Turkish army yesterday crossed the Servian frontier at Nissa.

NEW YORK, July 30.—A Herald's cable from Vienna says the rear guard of Prince Nikita's army, which was defeated a few days ago by the Turks, and was reported in full retreat toward Montenegro, has had an engagement with the pursuing Turkish army and defeated it. They laid in ambush for the Turks, who fell into it, and after a sharp encounter the Turks were completely routed, and their commander, Osman Pasha, taken prisoner. Sultan Murad Effendis has resigned. He has been in bad health ever since his accession to the throne, and has utterly failed to satisfy the Ulemas and the Softas. Ahmed, his younger brother who was appointed regent, will now become Sultan Murad. Effendis seems to be haunted by the ghost of his uncle, the late Sultan Abdul Aziz, and has given himself up completely to a life of seclusion and dissipation, leaving the ministers to their own shifts.

News of great importance may be looked for from Constantinople at any moment.

ATHENS, July 30.—A large public demonstration took place here in favor of Servia. Strong speeches were made in support of the cause of Servian independence.

An official report states that during the Servian attack on Nova Verosch, the Turks placed Christian women and children in the intrenchments. Many were killed by the Servian fire. The sentences upon persons tried in connection with the outrage at Salonica have been increased. The chief of police is condemned to degradation from rank and fifteen years' penal servitude, the commander of the Turkish frigate to degradation from rank and ten years' imprisonment, and the commander of the citadel to three years' confinement in a fortress.

A Beautiful Thought.

Childhood is like a mirror, catching and reflecting images all around it. Remember that an impious or profane thought uttered by a parent's lip, may operate upon a young heart like the careless spray of water thrown upon the polished steel—staining it with rust, which no after effort can remove.

Charity.

If we knew the cares and crosses
Crowding 'round our neighbor's way;
If we knew the little losses,
Sorely grievous day by day;
Would we then as often chide him
For his lack of thrift and gain,
Leaving on his heart a shadow,
Casting on our mind a stain?

If we knew the clouds above us
Held but gentle blessings there,
Would we turn us away, all fearful-eyed,
In our blind and weak despair?
Would we shrink from little shadows
Flitting o'er the dewy grass,
If we knew the lids of Eden
Were in mercy flying past?

If we knew the silent story
Quivering through the heart of pain,
Would we drive it with our coldness
Back to haunts of vice again?
Life hath many tangled questings;
Joy hath many a break of woe;
But the checks, tear-washed, are whitest,
Kept in life are flowers of snow.

Let us teach into our lessons
For the key to other lives,
And with love toward erring nature
Cherish good that still survives;
So that when our master cometh,
He our loving toil shall see,
And shall say, "Come home, ye blessed,
Ye have done it unto me."

The Life of Christ.

Speaking of the boyhood of Christ, as passed among the scenery of Nazareth, Dr. Farrar, says "It has been implied, that there are but two spots in Palestine where we may feel an absolute mor l certainty that the feet of Christ have trod, namely—the well-side at Shechem, and the turning of that road from Bethany over the Mount of Olives, from which Jerusalem first bursts upon the view. But to these I would add at least another: the summit of the hill upon which Nazareth is built. The summit is now unhappily marked, not by any Christian monument, but by the wretched, ruinous crumbling wely of some obscure Mohammedan saint. Certainly there is no child of ten years old in Nazareth now, however dull and unimpressionable he may be, who has not often wandered up to it; and certainly there could have been no boy at Nazareth in olden days who had not followed the common instinct of humanity by climbing up these thymy hill-slopes to the lovely and easily accessible spot which gives a view of the world beyond. The hill rises six hundred ect above the level of the sea. Four or five hundred feet below lies the happy valley. The view from this spot would in any country be regarded as extraordinarily rich and lovely: but it receives a yet more indescribable charm from our belief that here, with his feet among the mountain flowers, and the soft breeze lifting the hair from his temples, Jesus must often have watched the eagles poised in the cl udless blue, and gazed upward as he overheard the rushing plumes of the long lines of pelicans, as they winged their way from the streams of Kishon to the Lake of Galilee. And what a vision would be outspread before him, as he sat at spring-time on the green and thyme-besprinkled turf! To him every field and fig-tree, every palm and garden, every house and synagogue, would have been a familiar object; and most fondly of all amongst the square flat roofed houses would his eye singl out the little dwelling-place of the village carpenter. To the north, just beneath them, lay the narrow and fertile plain of Asochis, from which rose the wood-crowned hills of Naphtali, and conspicuous on one of them was Safed, the city set upon a hill; beyond these, on the far horizon, Hermon upheaved into the blue the huge splendid mass of his colossal shoulder, white with eternal snows. Eastward, at a few miles distance, rose the green and rounded summit of Tabor, clothed with terebinth and oak. To the west he would gaze through that diaphanous air on the purple ridge of Carmel, among whose forests Elijah had found a home; and on Calfa and Accho, and the dazzling line of white sand which fringes the waves of the Mediterranean, dotted here and there with white sails of the 'ships of Chittim.' Southward, broken only by the graceful outlines of Little Hermon and Gilboa, lay the entire plain of Esdraelon, so memorable in the history of Palestine and of the world, across which lay the southward path to that city which had ever been the murderess of the prophets, and where it may be that even now, in the dim foreshadowing of prophetic vision, he foresaw the agony in the garden, the mockings and scourgings, the cross and the crown of thorns.

"The scene which lay there outspread before the eyes of the youthful Jesus was indeed a central spot in the world which he came to save. It was in the heart of the land of Israel, and yet—separated from it only by a narrow boundary of hills and streams—Phœnicia, Syria, Arabia, Babylonia, and Egypt lay close at hand. The isles of the Gentiles, and all the glorious regions of Europe, were almost visible over the shining waters of the western sea. The standards of Rome were planted on the plain before him; the language of Greece was spoken in the towns below. And, however prejudiced it then might look, green as a pavement of emeralds, rich with its gleams of vivid sunlight, and the purpling shadows which floated over it from the clouds of the latter rain, it had been for years a battle field of nations. Pharaohs and Ptolemies, Emirs and Arsacides, Judges and Consuls, had all contended for the mastery of that smiling tract. It had glittered with the lances of the Amalekites; it had trembled under the chariot wheels of Sesostris; it had echoed the twanging bowstrings of Sennacherib; it had been trodden by the phalanxes of Macedonia; it had been clashed with the broadswords of Rome; it was destined hereafter to ring with the battle cry of the Crusaders, and thunder with the artillery of England and France. In that plain of Jezreel, Europe and Asia, Judaism and Heathenism, barbarism and civilization, the Old and the New Covenant, the history of the past, and the hopes of the present, seemed all to meet. No scene of deeper significance for the destinies of humanity could possibly have arrested the youthful Savior's gaze." Vol. I, p. 100.

We have given our readers a long extract from Dr. Farrar's work, but not, we feel, too long. It will enable them to imagine the rich treat that awaits them from a perusal of the whole. It touches upon a period of the life of Christ of which all but nothing is told us in the gospels, and brings before us with a master's power what must have been the thoughts of Jesus at this time of his life, and the scenery upon which he must have gazed. We see brought before us in this beautiful word painting of Farrar the school in which Jesus nourished "a youth sublime" beyond that of any other child of man. How far the future was opened out to his mind in this its dawn we cannot certainly say. From Luke ii. 52, we have reason to suppose that it was a gradually growing process like that of his bodily stature. But we may well suppose that bright glimpses were vouchsafed even at this period to him who was to be the great prophet of the world, glimpses going on beyond the "wars and rumours of wars" which were to characterize this age to its close, and entering upon that golden age, when he should break the sword into the ploughshare, and the spear into the pruning-hook.

Were we to speak of an idea which, more than many others, was presented to our minds as we read Dr. Farrar's work, we shou'd mention that union of the lowly and the grand which appears in the life of Christ in a way in which it appears in no other life whatsoever. From the cradle to the grave it is thus with Christ.

A poor mother lays her new-born child in a manger because there was no room for them in the inn. Here is a poor estate indeed! And yet the angels came down from heaven to fill the night air with their hymns of rejoicing at this child's birth, as that which was to bring "glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men;" while wise men have traveled from a far-off eastern land to lay at his feet their gold, and frankincense, and myrrh, emblems of that universal homage which should one day be paid by all the earth to the child of Bethlehem.

Such as was the infancy of Jesus was his life when he stood forth before the world. He accepts baptism from John, and is hailed by the Baptist as his Lord, whose shoe's latchet he was not worthy to loose; while the heavens over his head were opened, and the spirit of God descended upon him, and a voice from heaven proclaimed him the Father's beloved Son. He sits a jaded, travel worn, thirsty man on a well under the burning sun of Syria, and asks for water to quench his thirst, and bestows on her of whom he asked it the living water of immortality. He accepts food and shelter from the rich and the humble, and bestows on waiting multitudes that health and life for which all this earth's treasure could not purchase. He lies asleep, worn out with the toil of the day, in the stern of a little vessel, and the winds howl, and the waves beat into the ship, and it is full and ready to sink; and, lo, he rises up, and rebukes the wind, and says to the sea, Peace, be still; and there is a great calm. Such was throughout the life of Christ. In it the lowly and the great were ever mingled.

But let us, while on this phase of the life of Christ, dwell for a few moments on it, as we see it brought before us in the closing hours of his existence.

Jesus Christ hangs upon his cross. In the following thrilling language Dr. Farrar describes the manner of his death:—"A death by crucifixion seems to include all that pain and death can have of horrible and ghastly—dizziness, cramp, starvation, sleeplessness, fever, publicity of shame, long continuance of torment, horror of anticipation, mortification of untended wounds—all intensified just up to that point at which they can be endured at all, stopping just short of the point which would give to the sufferer the relief of unconsciousness. The unnatural position made every movement painful; the lacerated veins and crushed tendons throbbed with incessant anguish; the wounds, inflamed by exposure, gradually gangrened; the arteries became swollen and oppressed with surcharged blood; and while each variety of misery went on gradually increasing, there was added to them the intolerable pang of a burning and raging thirst; and all these physical complications roused an internal excitement and anxiety, which made the prospect of death itself—of death, the awful unknown enemy, at whose approach man usually shudders most—bear the aspect of a delicious and exquisite release." ii. 403.

Such was the position of Jesus Christ—shame, and pain, and utter weariness he hung upon that accursed tree. But on that cross he reigned. On that cross he administered an act of royal bounty which only he who was King of kings, and Lord of lords, could display.

By his side hung two malefactors. At the first, both of these join in the taunts against Christ, and call upon him, if he was indeed the Son of God, to show his power by descending from the cross. But on one of these two wretched men the conduct of Jesus tells with an overwhelming power. In a moment, we know, grace can soften the hardest heart, and save a soul from death; and here for the long weary ours of that Syrian day was Jesus, speaking from time to time some words of love and pity, as the pains of death were coming strongly upon himself. What were the antecedents of this man's life we cannot tell. He may have had pious parents, who had instilled lessons of piety and truth heretofore disregarded. He may have been among the listeners to Christ as he taught in Galilee, though when he listened he may have heard that teaching with careless ear. Into this we can but dimly conjecture; but there is much that we do know. He witnessed the conduct of Christ as he hung for no fault of his upon the cross. He heard words that came from his lips as the hours wore on. He looks up to the inscription which hangs over the head of Christ: "This is Jesus the King of the Jews." He feels in his inmost heart that this is true. In a moment he takes in what apostles had been slowly learning for over three years, and had not comprehended yet. The kingdom was not of this age. The sufferer by his side would never leave his cross till he was taken down from it cold and lifeless. The old instruction, disregarded or uncomprehended, is unfolded before him in its wonderful reality and truth. His mind passes over the waste of years; the changes of earthly dynasties. Rome, the object of his hate hitherto, fades from view; the empire of the Cæsars vanishes into air: another kingdom comes into view—a new, and a glorious, and an everlasting kingdom, of which Daniel had spoken: the worn-out, dying man by his side was the king of that dominion which was to be everlasting, and whom all dominions should serve and obey!

Such was now the faith of this poor sinful man. "Save thyself and us," as this taunting request was understood by his companion, was now in his mind but a trifling thing. He was in his spirit upon the Lord's day, the day of resurrection, the day of life eternal given by the King to those who believed in him. And so he will not ask for a few more years of this life, but for the endless years of the coming age:—"Lord, remember me, when thou comest in thy kingdom.

The prayer of faith is heard. Christ shows himself the king. Remembered! Yes, remembered forever. On that very day of which this poor man spoke and to which he looked on, he would be in the thoughts of him who came surrounded with all the majesty of heaven. He would be near Christ, by his side, in the Paradise of the new age, whose faith had penetrated the disguise of mortal weakness, and man's scorn, and recognized in a dying Christ the king of an eternal kingdom.

There is one observation made by Dr. Farrar in the preface to his work, to which we would draw the attention of our readers. If it is well-founded, as we have no doubt is the case, it appears to us a very important sign of the latter times. It refers to the altered feeling which the Jews now bear to Christ. "I have reason," Dr. Farrar says, "to believe that the Jewish race have long since learned to look with love and reverence on him whom their fathers rejected; nay more, that many of them, convinced by the irrefragable logic of history, have openly acknowledged indeed that he was their promised Messiah, although they still reject the belief in his divinity. I see, in the writings of many Jews, a clear conviction that Jesus, to whom they have quite ceased to apply the terms of hatred found in the Talmud, was at any rate the greatest religious teacher, the highest and noblest prophet whom their race produced."—Henry Constable in Rainbow.

Correspondence.

Dear Brethren of Restitution:

I thought it would be proper to send for publication the following notes by the way, and also the report of meetings.

July 7th, in company with Bro. Dr. John F. White, of story county, Iowa, we took the 4:50 a. m. train from Farmville, Marshall county, Iowa, for Tama City, Tama county, Iowa, and was met at the depot by Bro. M. J. Cross, who took us to his house, where we found a pleasant home during meeting. Bro. White preached the evening of July 7th. Good attention paid him. On the evening of July 8th I spoke, from text Job xiv. 14, on the resurrection of the dead. I used quite a number of texts in proof of the hope we have of the resurrection, during the meeting.

A Baptist minister from Toledo, Iowa, took notes, and was to preach at 10 o'clock the next day. After meeting I stepped up to him and asked him what time his meeting would be next day, as I had understood he was going to preach at the Boyse school house. He replied at ten o'clock; but, said he, I dont think I will fill the appointment. He did not come near the school house the next day. One Clark, the local preacher, filled his appointment. He took his text from Psalms, the balance of his sermon was Dr. Watts or Clark, Bible left out. A very little Bible goes a great ways with them. The Toledo preacher has not been heard from since.

July 9th, Bro. White gave out his appointment at 4 o'clock afternoon. Rained, no meeting. On the 9th of July Bro. Farley hitched up his team to take me to Bro. Adams, crossing Otter Creek in a wagon, which came apart—the water being much deeper than expected. The horses had to swim, and the wagon box went over the stakes. Bro. Farley held to the lines and the horses pulled him out. I had my coat off, under one arm, and one book in one hand, and one in my coat, as I was going down the river in the wagon box. I thought I had better pull for shore. I jumped overboard and made for shore, which I reached in due time. We got our wagon box and wagon out of the water in the course of an hour, with some help, and finally reached Bro. Adams, at which place I stayed one night. Bro. Adams provided me with a change of clothing, which was very acceptable.

July 10th, took train for home. In the meantime Bro. White continued the meeting. On July 13th, I received word from Bro. White to return to the place of meeting, which I did, on July 16th, and on the evening of the 15th, I preached at Pleasant Valley school house, to a large audience. This school house is three miles from the Hoyse school house. I preached from Genesis xvi, lxxxvi.; Rom. iv. 1-22; Gal. iii. 7; iv. 22; James ii. 21.

Let us not forget Abraham, the father of nations, and the father of the faithful. A good interest. Followed by Bro. White. July 16th, Bro. White preached; we then repaired to the water, where Bro. Farley was baptized by Bro. White. I think more would have been baptized if the water had not been so low. Nearly all went to the baptizing that were at church. Bro. White was called to see Bro. J. T. Prime, of West Irving, who was very low, not expected to live. Hope he is better at this time. The doctor says there is very little hopes for him, if any.

In the evening I preached on the destiny of the wicked, and organized a church.

At the Hoyze school house, Pleasant Valley township, Tama county, Iowa, there are quite a number belonging to the Baptist church, who have applied for letters to unite with us. Let the good work go on. I left the church in charge of Bros. Cross and Adams. I stayed over night with Bro. Adams and on the 17th of July returned home.

DIED.

The following notice of the sad death of Brother Robert McDonald, we clip from the Plymouth Democrat of last week. Brother McDonald united with our people last winter, and has walked in the way leading to the rest beyond. The family and friends have our sympathy in this sad bereavement.

"One of the most terrible, fatal accidents which ever speedy check communities whose lots are cast in these parts, occurred at the freight house in this city yesterday morning, in which Robert McDonald lost his life. He was employed on the road as night watchman, and on the night above he was engaged with others at work on the track south of the Nickel Plate depot, when he proceeded to start, at 7 o'clock the men, except Robert, stepped aside to let the train pass, and he, thinking probably, that there was not enough between the platform and the car as they would pass, made no attempt to get out of the way, but leaned up against the platform. The engine and car passed by him, but when the passage car came, he was caught between the platform and car, and carried, or rolled some distance, until the car had passed, when he fell to the ground. When picked up it was found that there were several severe contusions on the head and various parts of the body; that his right arm was broken at the wrist, and that he was severely injured internally. He was placed upon a lounge, and carried to his home, a short distance away, where, after consulting untold agonies for an hour and a half, death relieved him of his sufferings. Dr. Sherman was called as soon as the accident occurred, but could do nothing more than administer an anodyne to relieve the pain. He died at his home today at 10 o'clock. He leaves a wife and seven small children to mourn their untimely loss. Robert was a strong, stalwart man, and was the main support of his family. He was born and raised in this county, was a son of Danny McDonald, of this city. He was a member of the Methodist church, and a kind husband and father, whose loss is irreparable. The sympathy of the entire community is extended to the bereaved family in their hour of affliction. The funeral will take place from the house on Sunday afternoon at 2 o'clock."

Centennial Number of the Restitution.

It has been determined best to have Centennial number of the Restitution, which it is to be as forth our faith and hope upon the great questions of the day, and especially those which have a special relation to the Time Point, will need the amount specified under this head. It is to be hoped that every brother will give something toward this fund, as collection for the Echo of the glad tidings of salvation into the hearts of men. No people have so much truth and so little. Why is it? Let every one do his duty. God will bless you.

Put Your Name on this List.

Recently quite a number of brethren have conducted that an easy and effectual way to get the truth before the minds of the people is to send them the RESTITUTION for three months. This is a good decision. It is also an impossibility for the paper to be received and read by any one school for three months without its making an impression upon the mind to send for it. Send us your names and money. We hope to have a really number report. The following is a list of those we already have shown referred to:

Valuable English Works.

Our readers may note that we expect shortly to have for sale the works mentioned below. Orders and remittances for the same may be sent to us to this office.

Discussion on the Nature of the Dead, between the Rev. W. F. Hardman, Congregational minister, and W. Kelloway, editor of Bible Echo, and minister of the Gospel, both of England. The proposition was discussed twice: 1. That the soul exists in a living, conscious state after the decease. Affirmed by W. F. H. 2. That the Scriptures teach that men in death are wholly unconscious, insensible, and unable to perform any act whatever, and that they rest in darkness, silence and the dust. Cloth, muffled heads, well bound, 250 pages, 8vo. 1 per copy, net postage 25c.

Brention and Future Punishment. By Rev. D. Cook, M. A. late rector of Gate, Ireland. 320 pp. An elaborate or exact treatise on the punishment of the unjust. It is principally due in its philological chapters, respecting the meaning of the Greek words used by the inspired writers to describe the doom of the lost. Price $1; postage 10c.

We both look with lively satisfaction. Undoubtedly the subject which it treats with such an attractive combination of learning and modesty, of power and reverence, has held hold of the minds of many of the most thoughtful Christian men of our day. Its growth, from a pamphlet in the first edition to a handsome volume of three hundred and thirty pages in the fourth, is conclusive proof that the question discussed is one of profound interest.—We must also commend the publishers on the tasteful and handsome dress in which they have put it before the public, and express the hope that the remote will speedily be much more than removed by the large sale of a work which must take a standard place in the public literature and department of Christian theology.—The Review.

History, or, The Intermediate State of Man. Cream cloth, 250 pp. Price $1.25; postage 15c.

This work presents the Bible doctrine of the state of man between death and the resurrection.

"Mr. Constable has, in a series of works, devoted much labor and research to establishing from Scripture and other sources the real nature of the future state; and the present book is the result of his more exhaustive labors on one special point. His argument is supported by no little learning, is well done, and is clear and available style. There is a good deal to be said for the general doctrines propounded.—Manchester.

"It is characterized by his usual vigor of thought and clearness of expression. To all sincere lovers of truth, rather than of traditions, especially commend the treatise."—The Church Messenger.

Bible Echo. Volume I. May to December, edited by W. Kellaway. The only English weekly that advocates the literal gospel. Bound volume of current year of the Bible Echo, containing important papers and discussions on vital matters, and the best concerning the spread of the scriptural doctrine of immortality. Price $4.25.

Bible Echo. Vol. II, January to June, 1876. This is a continuation of the above for the period stated. Price $2.

Bible Echo. Vol III, July to September, 1876. This runs with the Bible Echo as a weekly newspaper, and also finishes the third series. Price $1.50

Bible Echo. New Series. Monthly numbers from October, 1875. The year's subscription for this magazine, including the numbers of last year, is $1 00.

New Tests Upon all Subjects. By the author of "Enquire Within Upon Everything." Useful to the physician, the artist, the clergyman, the engineer, the mechanic, the lawyer, the philanthropist, the author and the housekeeper. 320 pp. Price 50c; postage 10c.

A New Work by Mrs. H. V. Reed.

Harvest Words for Heard Reapers. Nearly 200 pp. Well printed on heavy toned paper, neatly bound in cloth. Price 80c; postage 10c.

"This book is one of the most satisfactory of its kind that could be written; indeed we know of none either in every way so pleasing to them or so acceptable to those who are desirous of maintaining the Bible as a revelation from God. We would be more than content, we would be proud, if we could see every family in the land of that of the editor and talented lady the authoress. Her "Bible Triumphant" was a good work, and in it we know many were established by many; but this work is excellent, so faithful, so convincing, it would be hard to point where its equal can still exist. Every only should possess a copy."—Bible Echo. 12 5s.

The Coming King.

BY WILLIAM COLLEN BRYANT.

Oh North, with all thy vales of green!
O South, with all thy palms!
From peopled towns and fields between
Uplift the voice of psalms.
Raise, ancient East, the anthem high
And let the youthful West reply.

Lo! in the clouds of heaven appears
God's well-beloved Son.
He brings a train of brighter years.
His kingdom is begun.
He comes, a guilty world to bless
With mercy, peace, and righteousness.

Oh, Father, haste the promised hour
When at his feet shall lie
All rule, authority and power
Beneath the ample sky.
When He shall reign from pole to pole
The Lord of every human soul.

When all shall heed the words he said
Amid their daily cares,
And, by the loving life He led,
Shall strive to pattern theirs;
And he who conquered death shall win
The mightier conquest over sin.

Resurrection.

NEW YORK, Nov. 18th, 1875.

DEAR BROTHER REED: I herewith send you a communication sent to me. My brother R. T. Young long promised me his views on resurrection, etc. I have read them, and while the question is not cleared to me, I yet thought there was enough in the communication that was sufficiently suggestive to have a wider ventilation. If you think well of it you may publish it in the RESTITUTION, it may bring out criticisms developing truth in all its parts. I am happy in the belief, strange as some may think it, that our future does not depend on an exact balancing of the book of the Apocalypse. I am hopeful some day of having a better understanding of this book. I am not ready to run before I am sent in the interpreting of it. How many have done havoc to this book by handling it after their own notions, and not after a harmonious comparing Scripture with Scripture, the only infallible rule whereby we can know the truth. This is our professed method, but how many have erred in this?

I take great pleasure in reading the RESTITUTION, and in calling others attention to things therein. Hoping with you, my brother, to overcome and inherit, I remain yours fraternally.

GEO. W. YOUNG.

DEAR GEORGE: I think the view of Scripture truth runs in the following course—but of course, I only think.

I cannot imagine, but what the twenty-four elders and four living creatures, are symbols of the called out and chosen in Christ Jesus, in other words, the members of his body. That class who reign with him because they are in sympathy with him in suffering. Because they are certainly and really a symbol of life as is the Lamb—as it had been slain. They honor and glorify him as their Redeemer; they are crowned as victors, for the crown is a coronal wreath, (so Dr. T. translated it.) This is more probable, as they do not yet reign, but confidently sing we shall reign." On this admission hangs much, for they are witnesses of the opening of the seven seals, under the fifth of which men will die for their refusal to worship the beast; and we learn in Rev. xx.14 will also reign with him a thousand years. They must then be part of the members of Christ, for if I understand the truth in its first principles, all who reign with him are one body. There remains a conclusion that the body cannot be complete, or reign, or "be glorified together," until after the 5th seal. This implies hands or orders, in the first resurrection, and proves that the first resurrection is not the work of an instant; but a state of things, otherwise, would it not be absurd to say, "in the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage?"

Now if the later band reign the thousand years, those years cannot commence at the opening of the seals, when the elders first appear. Thus all are made perfect together. See Heb. xi. 40.

Another conclusion is, that if the resurrection occupies time, it is therefore not the "change in a moment," but introductory only, to it.

Looking at the matter thus, will not the language of Paul, 1 Thess. 4. bear a construction correspondent thus: We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed; but first all the dead in Christ must rise; now resurrection is one glory change another; "glory to glory as by the spirit of our God." Thus the living have no precedence of the dead.

Now this is quite correspondent with a natural birth; first the head is born, then, by successive throes, the rest of the body, then inherent life by breath.

Moreover the last trumpet of 1 Cor. 15. is the seventh trumpet of Revelation, but the seventh trumpet is not blown until the seventh seal, third woe, and six other trumpets are exhibited; during which display, or development, the 24 elders and four beasts are intelligently and actively engaged therewith. Therefore the last trumpet cannot be signified as past by elders existing. Chap. vi. 1, 3, 5, 6, 7. Chap. vii. 11-13. Evidently there is a work of time before reigning commences.

The 7th trumpet seems to signalize the great change which completes the first resurrection, for then the mystery of God shall be finished. Rev. x. 7.

Some will deny that there can be presence with the Lord without perfection of existence: but Enoch and Elijah are not yet made perfect; neither are the bodies of the saints which slept and arose; for "they without us shall not be made perfect." Thousands of years have they enjoyed continued life: why should we think it impossible that others yet may be, after the symbol of the elders, accepted as conquerors, justified to eternal life, yet not perfected in the spiritual body? (If that is the change. We are too apt to imagine that God's short work is as brief as our short work; and to neglect the distinctions and divisions defined in prophecy.

The language of Paul, "the Lord himself shall descend from Heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God," seems to me to imply order and consecutiveness, for we read of the archangel Michael in Dan. xii. 1. In relation to events under the sixth seal, perhaps, and certain passages in the epistles of Paul have always appeared to be written after the Apocalypse, such as the "new Jerusalem," and the above passage about the last trumpet particularly. The worst of the Christadelphian view of mortal resurrection is, that it leaves the saints in painful uncertainty before the bar of an awful judge; but admitting a resurrection of progressive development, just for argument, why suppose dreadful suspense? Yet it is a necessity that "we all must stand before the judgment seat of Christ to give account; but he who gave strength to Daniel and others, will not leave those who love the appearing, to darkness and doubt; and if their course of life does pass in review, it will only be for the more joyful recognition of the fact that our salvation is "all of grace;" and thus, with more humility, will we cast the victor's crown at the feet of the Lamb, saying, "thou only art worthy. Thou has bought us with thy blood."

Relative to the time of tribulation introductory to the reign of Christ, how seasonable! Now, we hear only form the uninspired, unproven, unseeing condition. Blessed are they that have seen; more blessed they who have walked by faith; therefore Justic always warns plainly before judgment sets. I do not hesitate to say that the sudden closing up of this dispensation with universal wrath would be unlike the God of the Bible.

So it seems conclusive to my present view that as Noah was seven days in the ark before the flood, so will it be in the time of the end, in the days of the Son of Man, preceding the great day.

The coming and appearing of Christ are signified by two words in the Greek: they are not synonymous.

The sign of the Son of Man in heaven is a sign that the redemption of the twelve tribes is near; (Judah at least, for to them he addressed the words.) I mean the elect or righteous who constitute the people represented by 12,000 out of every tribe; (for be it remembered, that Christ always addressed his disciples as Israelites, the mystery of Gentile calling was not made manifest.) If a sign only it implies delay.

Now, it seems that as he comes, his prepared ones meet him; do they return immediately, or remain for organizing, completion, perfection? For when his feet touch the Mount of Olives "all his saints are with him," prepared for the judgment of nations. What, meantime, has tested the nations by hunger and thirst and imprisonment of his least of brethren. (Israel the sheep of his pasture,) if not the great events detailed in Rev. 13th and 14th, in which God demands the worship and allegiance of men by signs and wonders, and the beast power also by false miracles, demands the same. Is not the test of worthiness for the inheritance of the kingdom, as the sheep of Christ's pasture, (not of Israel's fold) here very plain?

It is generally believed by us that the descent of Christ is as a flash, accomplishing the resurrection and in a moment introducing the day of the Lord.

The Thessalonian church must have had a different idea from this, for they had been erroneously led to believe that the day of Christ was "present" (translated here and here only "at hand.") How could they think that possible, if it came subsequently to the overwhelming brightness of Christ's appearing? They were taught that there must be a power individualized and developed, called the man of sin, who would exalt himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped. Whatsoever elements their may be in the Papal superstition tending that way, it certainly does not characterize the Papacy: they worship too much: voluntary humility, worshiping men and angels. It is true the Pope exalts himself much, but the true figure for their imposture, combined with Protestant humbug of a like kind, is a whore. One claiming the bride's (Israel's) place, in forms, ceremonies, and worldly show, which were but figures for an ancient time.

This power seems to me to be the one characterel in David's image of embodying the world's hostility to God, described as beast and false prophet in Revelation; a champion of Philistine raised up to defy the armies of the living God; smitten upon the feet and swept away like dust before the whirlwind. This will be a great crisis in the eyes of the world—deciding their fates.

As regards the times of prophecy there should always be harmony of interpretation: thus, if a thousand years is the literal term, 1260 days, or 42 months, or time, times, and dividing of time, should be also literal; as the events pictured, as limited by these times, for instance the fleeing from persecution of the dragon for 1,260 days to a place prepared; and the woman who bore the child being nourished for time, times and a half a time; both in the wilderness seems to mark the same event, and mutually interprets the time as 3½ years; 1,260 days being 42 months of 30 days, (ancient calculation.) A blaspheming power, succeeding the dragon, seems to mark a similar period for his blasphemous dominion, together making 7 years, antitypical of Noah's time before the flood. Seven days in the ark before the door was shut, and the flood began. To avoid the literal interpretation of these times, some say the Millennium will be 360,000 years. I say, God forbid that death should be here so long.

This view, that the sounding of the seventh trumpet completes the mystery of prophecy seems to close up the extent of God's revelation. The 12th chapter succeeding seems to open a new scene in the act, so to speak, detailing what had been before stated in general.

Another principle of interpretation seems reasonable. That which makes the Old and New Testaments mutual interpreters. This being so how shall we understand the 12th chapter? A woman clothed with the sun and the moon under her feet in travail with a son.

This figure is often applied to Jerusalem in the Old Testament. Travail is trouble. There is to be a time of trouble for Israel and Judah. As soon as Zion travailed she brought forth her children. Are the 12,000 of each tribe not symbolized by the man child; 5th seal trouble; 6th seal deliverance?

There seems to be two classes,—a man child caught up,—is this not the martyrs of the 5th seal? And the rest of the woman's seed, in pursuit of whom the serpent or dragons (casts a flood at the mother and) goes to make war with the seed. Rev. xii. 17. which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ. If these figures do not represent things in the human flesh, how can there be any danger from the "great red dragon" standing ready to devour? From this fact alone, it seems conclusive, that the man child is not the class before represented by elders, or of Christ; yet they are to be of the ruling class, with a rod of iron over all nations. Another interesting inference may be noted from the discourse of our Lord on Mount Olives, the correspondence with the seals of Revelation. Under the 5th, the souls of the martyrs are inspired to patience until their fellow-servants should be killed as they were.

Matthew says immediately after the tribulation of those days, the sun shall be darkened, etc. Under the sixth seal these phenomena also are revealed.

Then, says Matthew, shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven, and then shall all the tribes of the earth (land) mourn.

In the Apocalypse the wicked cry to rocks and mountains to hide them from the wrath of the Lamb.

Matthew says, "then shall he send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet to gather his elect.

Revelation brings to view the sealing of the twelve tribes. Is not the correspondence very harmonious? And yet the mystery of God is not now finished. Seven angels are yet to sound! How naturally also, the parable of the virgins fits in this interval of time just preceding the brightness of Christ's appearing to judge the nations.

Dear George, sometimes I think it may be unwise to give so much thought to the detail of prophecy unfulfilled; then I think of the words "blessed is he that reads, and they that hear and keep the words of this prophecy." Can this be so if they are incomprehensible? And the evangelists have said let the reader attend, understand, when speaking of the abomination which makes desolate.

It is wonderful that Miller's followers have not seen this one fact. The Book of Daniel was open to the Apostles. Had they held to the idea that the times of Daniel's vision were a day for a year from a certain historical date, well known, they could have easily corrected the gracious teacher when he said "no man knows." They could never have believed in keeping watch in their generation; they could have said 1335 years brings the blessing to the waiting ones. Between five and six hundred only are passed, about eight hundred years hence believers must begin to watch for the coming again of our Lord. How differently their language,—"looking for"—waiting. We who are alive and remain. Not a kind of procrastination, not a thought of an interval before being caught up in clouds to meet the coming One. What can we think of such ignorance in inspired apostles, if modern Adventists are "the wise who understand?" Yours in love of truth,

R. T. YOUNG.

Question Answered.

Brother Reed:

Finding among my papers the accompanying article on Rev. xx., and my letter to Brother Phelps, and his reply, I thought I would forward them to you, to publish, if you thought good.

Brother Phelps need not call me sensitive. I do not deny that the most of the article in the Banner advocates the futurity of the 1,000 years; but they did not set forth the reign. And as the Banner has its little class department, I offered my answer, but I could not get it in. While I respect Brother Phelps, I should have respected him more if he had boldly faced the "Age to Come."

The article I send you in answer to the questions in the Banner was written by me and published about 24 years since.

QUESTIONS IN BANNER.

A clear and satisfactory explanation of Rev. xx. 10 is humbly and earnestly requested by

S. H. L.

Light on the 20th chapter of Revelation is needed. Especially the first nine verses.

E. W. POTTER.

ANSWER.

The thousand years of Revelation 20th are:

1. Future; for such a reign of any class of persons from Adam to the present time, has never been. Some persons, seeing insuperable difficulties in the way of applying the reign to the saints, have said that it belongs to the nations!—that is, the nations sit on thrones, and reign! To such absurdities are men driven who cling to a foundationless theory.

That this glorious period is the antitypical Sabbatism, there ought not to exist a doubt. They who live and reign with Christ are the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, which had not worshiped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. Reigning with Christ is a reward, promised upon condition of suffering with him here. 2 Tim. ii. 12. The reward of the saints being yet future. Again: observe in the sixteenth chapter, at the season of the sixth plague, the dragon, beast, and false prophet, are all in action; no binding is even hinted at up to this time. In the following chapters we have the description of Baby on the great, her fall and judgment; the exultation of much people in heaven at her overthrow, etc.; the destruction of the beast and false prophet, but not of the dragon; what is done with him is particularly described in the twentieth chapter. He is bound, not destroyed.

The beast and false prophet being destroyed, we hear no more of their operations; but the dragon being bound only, deceives when loosed at the end of the thousand year; and mark: the whole work of deception is by the devil (or dragon) at this season. The beast and false prophet being both destroyed a thousand years before, can not operate.

Here, reader, are a few of the many reasons we could present, of the positive futurity of the thousand years of Rev. xx.

2. These years of reigning with Christ are after the second advent. Vs. 5, 6: "But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death has no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years." The persons here spoken of are immortal. They reign with Christ. This period, then, is subsequent to the advent and resurrection of the saints.

3. During this glorious time there will be nations living in the flesh on the earth. Why is satan bound? That he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled; see ver. 3. The saints who reign with Christ, free from the power of the second death, are not the nations whom the devil might deceive were he loose. See verse 8. Neither are they the wicked dead, as some contend. How can dead men be deceived by a bound devil, or a loose devil? What an absurd idea! And to such a strait are those driven who obstinately deny the existence of the nations during the reign of Messiah and the saints. "Surely your turning of things upside down shall be esteemed as the potter's clay." Isa. xxix. 16.

Though the preceding is but a little or what we could say in proof of the three positions we have taken, we feel confident in saying they are irrefutable. Here they are:

1. The thousand years of Rev. xx. are future.

2. They are subsequent to the second advent.

3. During this period nations of men in the flesh will exist, over whom Christ and the saints will reign.

Denial of these positions involves inextricable confusion. We dare not, we will not, God being our help, violate or nullify any portion of Divine Testimony; nor yet will we add aught thereunto. May writer and reader ever duly consider these solemn words: "If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book; and if any man shall take away, from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book." Rev. xxii. 18, 19.

H. HEVES.

A Letter from Bismarck to His Wife, in 1851.

The day before yesterday I went to Wiesbaden, and looked with a mixture of sadness and premature wisdom on the scenes of my former follies. If only it would please God to fill up with clear strong wine the vessel in which at 21 the muddy champagne of youth frothed to so little purpose. . . . How many of those with whom I have flirted and drank and gambled are now under ground! What changes my views of life have undergone in the 14 years that have elapsed since that time, each in its turn seeming to me the correct one; how much that I then thought great now appears small; how much now seems honorable which I then despised! How much fresh foliage may still grow out of our inner man, giving shade, rustling in the wind, becoming worthless and faded, before another 14 years are passed, before 1865, if only we live so long! I cannot imagine how a man who thinks at all about himself, and yet refuses to hear anything about God, can endure life without weariness and self abhorrence. I can't think how I endured it formerly. If I had to live now as then—without God, without you, without children—I don't know why I should not throw off this life like a dirty shirt; and yet most of my acquaintances are so, and live their life.

Holy Spirit.

I am very much obliged to Brethren Cook and Weethee, for their kind and careful answers, in the RESTITUTION for July 19th, to my questions in the number for June 28th, and to the editor for putting them both in the same number. They should be studied together, and constitute a valuable contribution of knowledge to our brethren. The rich and ripe thought that prevades them, will amply reward the most careful attention.

They substantially agree. They gather from different parts of the same field of truth, send in the results without comparison, and they are almost precisely alike. The only seeming difference is one of judgment in the application. While Brother W. says "Ghost should be discarded," Brother C. appears to regard Holy Ghost and Holy Spirit as interchangeable terms, and equally proper; yet he says "writers, preachers and translators are bound to employ such words as will express the truth most distinctly to hearers or readers." The word "ghost" being used, modernly at least, in so low a sense, Brother C's rule would justify a preference for spirit when joined to "body." So both agree with current authorities.

Dr. Adam Clarke, in his comments on those passages in the New Testament, in which Holy Ghost occurs, in almost all instances uses Holy Spirit instead of Holy Ghost.

A. Campbell's New Testament, published in 1832, has Holy Spirit instead of Holy Ghost.

Prof. N. N. Whitney's translator, published in 1840, by J. V. Himc, from the Critical Greek Text of J. A. H. Tittman, also has Holy Spirit instead of Holy Ghost.

The Diaglott, translated and published in 1864 by Benjamin Wilson, likewise has Holy Spirit instead of Holy Ghost.

We are, therefore, in good company in discarding "Ghost."

Now, as we are so well prepared for it, if it will not be asking too much of Brother's Cook and Weethee, will they, at their leisure, answer the following questions, or give a clear and brief expose of the subject to which they relate as may suit their best?

1st. Is the Holy Spirit simply and only the Spirit, substance, sense or force of the word, the truth?

2nd. Is the Holy Spirit a special agency sent from God, in addition to the word, an ego, or other agencies?

3rd. Is a recognition of the Holy Spirit's offices, essential to the proper growth of Christian character and the efficiency of the church?

Editing.

An editor has great responsibility, wielding, as he does, a mighty influence for good or evil. A religious editor is responsible to God for the sentiments he advances, and will certainly have to give account for the influence he exerts. Therefore he should be,

1. A man of cultured mind and heart, well read, and possess a thorough knowledge of the Scriptures, and especially of the Gospel. A man may be a good and useful preacher, and yet a poor and inefficient editor. Some men can speak well and yet are poor writers. Others are good writers, but poor speakers; while others excel both as writers and speakers. Some men mistake their calling when they attempt to preach, others when they attempt to conduct a paper or periodical. No one should undertake a work for which he neither natural nor educational qualifications.

2. He should be a man of sound, discriminating mind; a warm and sympathetic heart, and yet a man of great firmness and decision of character.

3. He should possess much patience, knowing that some of his readers will complain, find fault, and perhaps think, if not say, that if they edited the paper they could do it much better than he.

4. He should be a good reader, especially of manuscript, knowing he will often be puzzled to decipher the chirography, syntax, or prosody, and who generally add a P. S. in which they say: "Please correct all mistakes, punctuate, and publish soon."

5. He should remember that short, spicy articles are more generally read than long, prosy ones, and therefore "boil down" his editorials from gallons to quarts, and from quarts to pints, making them as strong as possible.—J. T. Walsh, Editor of the Watchtower.

The Book of Job.

I call that apart from all theories about it, one of the grandest things ever written with pen. One feels indeed as if it were not Hebrew; such a noble universality, different from noble patriotism or sectarianism, reigns in it. A noble book; all men's book. It is our first, oldest statement of the never-ending problem—man's destiny and God's ways with him here in this earth. And all in such free, flaming outlines. Grand in its sincerity, in its simplicity; in its epic melody and repose of reconcilement. There is the seeing eye, the mildly understanding heart; true eyesight and vision for all things; natural things not less than spiritual. Sublime sorrow; sublime reconciliation; oldest choral melody as of the heart of mankind; so soft and great; as the summer midnight, as the world with its seas and stars. There is nothing written, I think, in the Bible or out of it, of equal literary merit. —Carlisle's Heroes.

Answer Them.

Parents run the risk of losing the love of their children who put aside their trivial questions as of no consequence. An interrogation point symbolizes the life of childhood. "Why" and "what" are the keys with which it unlocks the treasury of the world. The boy's numberless questions often seem trivial, but the wise parent will never turn them off unanswered, if he can help it. It is his rich opportunity of teaching. He is met half way, and there is all the difference between impressing truth on an eager mind and an uninterested one. The little fellow helping you at your work and pelting you with endless questions, may learn as much in a half hour there as in a week when his body is a prisoner in the school room, and his thoughts are out of doors.

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Indiana.

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Coming of the Son of Man.

"And then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven: and then shall all of the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of Man coming with power and great glory."

What a shame, that learned men should spend their pains and talents in attempts to tie down this language to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Roman armies!

I take it as an axiom,—a settled verity which demonstrates itself,—that two events which are specifically described as successive,—the one as coming after the other—cannot be the same. But if this axiom had always been observed in the interpretation of this twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew, the students of the scriptures might have saved themselves much inconsistency and confusion, and many a misapprehension of God's word. If we ask most of our popular commentators what is meant by "the tribulation of those days," described in the twenty-ninth and preceding verses, the answer given is, that it means the calamities and sufferings of the Jews, induced by seige and overthrow of their city and state. And if we ask them, again, what is meant by the mourning of the tribes of the earth "after the tribulation of those days," the answer is about the same,—the calamities and sufferings of the tribes of Israel in connection with the fall of their city and state! If we inquire of them what is meant by the coming of the Son of Man as the lightning in the clouds of heaven, with some twinges of uncertainty they nearly all finally agree upon the reply that it means the dashing judgments which were brought upon the rebellious people of Israel by the coming of the Roman armies against Jerusalem! The coming of which the Savior speaks was to be "out of the east" towards the west, and the coming of the Roman armies was out of the west and north and towards the east and south; but the reply is, No matter for that; we are not to expect all the particular circumstances to hold! The coming of which the Savior speaks is specifically said to be "after" the tribulation induced by the invasion of Palestine by the Romans, as well as "after" that great unparalleled tribulation of which the Jewish troubles were the commencement and first-fruits: but no matter for that, we are told; as though effect could go before its cause, and as if priority or succession were nothing in the interpretation of a book such as the word of God! I question, indeed, whether the annals of learning can furnish a parallel to the absurdities which characterize the great mass of our popular disquisitions upon this portion of the inspired record. No wonder that the doctrine of Christ's personal return to our world has lost so much of its weight, certainty, and rightful importance in the minds and hearts of the church, when its great foundation-text is thus sacrificed to a false and supercilious erudition!

One of the strangest things in the world is the manner in which some people read the Bible. It would almost seem as if they turned it upside-down, and read it backwards. "Eyes have they but they see not." They praise it, and hold it in holy regard, and insist that everybody ought to have it; yet they look into it only as some recondite volume, which is a good text-book for preachers, but which is quite beyond the reach of their understanding. They adore it more for the unknown mysteries which they attribute to it, than from their personal appreciation of what their own eyes have beheld upon its pages. Many seem to view it as a sublime riddle book, full of mystic poetry and unsearchable wisdom, rather than as a plain piece of information and advice given by a Father to his inexperienced and exposed children. And many who sit down to write commentaries upon it seem to be continually haunted with the idea that there is something recondite in every word, or that the real mind of the Spirit is not to be found in the plain import of the letter, but in some abstruse or mystic analogy which it is their business to dig after. I hold that the Bible is a book for everybody, in which God speaks for the purpose of being understood by everybody; that its language is conformed to the ordinary uses of speech; and that it is to be interpreted in the same common-sense way in which we would interpret the will of a deceased parent, or ascertain the meaning of a letter of business. It was not written to tax our ingenuity, or to test man's skill at learned exposition. Its design is to instruct, and in the most familiar way to express to men the mind and will of God. When Christ speaks of "the Son of Man," he means the Son of Man and not the Roman armies. When he speaks of his "coming in the clouds of heaven," he means his coming in the clouds of heaven, and not the sailing of war ships on the Mediterranean, or the march of soldiers over the fields of earth. When he says after the Jewish tribulations are ended, he means after those tribulations, and not before they began, or while they were yet in their incipiency. And when he says that all the tribes of the earth "shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory," expositors might as well attempt to demonstrate to me that day is night, or that white is black, as to attempt to make me believe that he means the march of an army of boorish heathen soldiers. Christ knew what he wished to say, and how to say what he meant; and I feel bound to understand him to mean just what he says. And what he here predicts respecting his coming in the clouds at the close of the tribulation no more refers to the coming of the Roman armies into Palestine than to the flight of Mahomet, or the next eclipse of the moon. He is describing the scenes of the judgment period, and nothing else.—Last Times.

Earnest Expectations.

Nature, uncorrupted nature, through all her regions, cries aloud for Him who is to rectify her unwilling disorders, to repair her shattered structures, to restore her oppressed energies, to vindicate her voice of conscience, long despised,—her sublime testimony to the Creator, so long questioned or overlooked. But what is this to the demand of grace for the coming of Him who is our Savior? If the whole creation groaneth and travaileth together in pain for the manifestation of the sons of God what shall be the desires of the sons of God themselves! What shall be their ardor to realize that liberty of the children of God, of which such great things are spoken! to behold their own lowliness glorified in the glory of the man of Nazareth, their humble labors recognized by the approval of a God once more manifest in the flesh, their persevering faith vindicated, their hope consummated, their charity brightening into a reward eternal and infinite! They know well the value of that union which indentifies the triumph of the Savior and the saved. They rejoice to think that, as a humiliated Redeemer came first to point us the path of humiliation, so must a glorified Redeemer point us the path of glory; that the Captain of salvation, who bore the cross in front of the army of believers, must come to teach them also how to wear the crown. Yes: all proclaims and demands the return of Christ to the world,—all, but the unsanctified heart of man! There alone no voice is heard to welcome the mighty stranger. There alone the dawn of it is eternal night. There alone the sun of righteousness is contemplated with hatred, horror, and dismay. Hearts that are inured to the world's corruptions, how shall they lend an immortality of meekness, simplicity, and love? spirits habituated to seek unholy ends by means yet more unholy, how shall they endure the bringing in of everlasting righteousness? Those whose whole hopes, prospects, and calculations are bound up with the world as it is, how shall they regard otherwise than with terror this awful revolution in the administration of the universe, when He who now rules behind a mass of permitted evil shall himself personally and visibly assume the reigns of universal empire?—Selected.

The God of the Bible.

We are all so familiar, from our childhood, with the Scriptural idea of God, it has become so incorporated with the literature of the civilized world that we often fail to appreciate its grandeur as an original conception, and its value as the highest of all scientific truths. But suppose, that while dealt with the knowledge of all other things, we could grow up to full maturity of intellect in utter ignorance of the Scriptural idea of God—suppose, that with the mental vigor of Socrates, the learning of Cicero, the taste of Addison, the moral tone and enthusiasm of Burke, we should recieve, for the first time and all at once, the full conception of the person and character of Jehovah as revealed in the Bible—suppose, that thus endowed and prepared, we could stand where Moses stood, in the clefts of Sinais rocks, whilst the visions of uncreated glory passed by, and a voice was heard proclaiming, "The Lord God, merciful and gracious, long suffering and abundant in goodness and truth"—suppose we could stand where Isaiah stood, see and hear what Isaiah saw and heard, when the Lord sat upon his burning throne, and the Seraph in cried one to another: "Holy! Holy! Holy! is the Lord of hosts: the whole earth is full of his glory!" Suppose we could stand with the Seer of Patmos, amid the visions and trumpets and thunders of the Apocalypse, and gaze upon the choirs of angels and redeemed ones, who cease not day nor night to cast their glittering crowns before the throne, and cry: "Great and marvelous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints!"—how would all the images of earthly grandeur dwindle into insignificance, how would all our loftiest conceptions of Divinity, derived from Greek and Roman classes, sink into annihilation before such a vision and such a manifestation of the one living and true God of the Bible, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders, who spake and it was done, who commanded and it stood fast, at whose presence the perpetual hills did bow, before whose gleam the everlasting mountains were scattered, who said, "Let there be light: and there was light." The Bible is not only the revealer of the unknown God of nature. In revealing God, it has given us the key that unlocks the profoundest mysteries of creation—the clue by which to thread the labyrinth of the universe—the glass through which to look from nature up to nature's author. It is only when we stand and gaze upon nature with the Bible in our hands and its Maker in our understandings, that nature is capable of rising to her highest majesty as the oracle and mouth-piece of God, kindling in our souls their highest emotions of moral beauty and sublimity. Without the all-preserving spiritual God of the Bible in our thoughts, nature's sweetest music would loose its charm—the universe its highest significance and glory. It is just when we stand and gaze upon the heavens and the earth, with God's word as our interpreter, that the heavens and the earth shine forth with their divinest luster—all nature vocal with God, all creatures offering praise.

Go and stand, with your open Bible, upon the areopagus of Athens, where Paul stood so long ago: in thoughtful silence, look around upon the site of ancient greatness; look upward to those still bright and glorious skies of Greece; and what conceptions of wisdom and power will all those memorable scenes of nature and art convey to your mind, now, more than they did to an ancient worshiper of Jupiter or Apollo? They will tell of Him who made the world, "by whom, and through whom, and for whom are all these things." To you that landscape of everything beauty, so rich in the monuments of departed genius with its distant classic mountains, its deep blue sea, and its bright heeding skies, will be telling a tale of glory, the Grecian never learned; for it will speak to you no more of its thirty thousand petty contending deities, but of the one living and everlasting God. Go and stand with David and Isaiah under the star-spangled canopy of the night, and, as you look away to the "range of planets, suns, and adamantine spheres, wheeling unshaken through the void immense," take up the mighty questions of inspiration: "who hath measured the water in the hollow of his hand, and meted out heaven with a span, and comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance? It is He that sitteth upon the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers; that stretcheth out the heavens as a curtain, and spreadeth them out as a tent to dwell in." "Of old hast thou laid the foundations of the earth, and the heavens are the work of his hands. They shall perish, but thou shalt endure; yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment; as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed: but thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end."

Go and stand upon the heights of Niagara: look upon that "matchless robe of terror and beauty," rolling on forever, and, as it rolls "notching the centuries" in the everlasting rocks: listen, in awe-struck silence, to that boldest, most earnest and eloquent of nature's orators. And what is Niagara with its plunging waters and its mighty roar? It is but the oracle of God. It is but the whisper of his voice, who is revealed in the Bible, as sitting above the water and the floods forever. "The voice of the Lord is upon the waters: the God of glory thundereth: the Lord is upon many waters: the voice of the Lord is full of majesty."

Go with the Bible and stand upon the crumbling verge of the volcano. Look down into its awful crater; gaze upon its fierce surging billows of liquid fire; hear its deep muttering thunders, ominous of the coming explosion; behold its red surges plunging and plowing down the mountain sides, its dense volumes of smoke and cinders rising up as if to extinguish the sun! and of whom do Ætna and Vesuvius speak? What are they but the symbols of His presence, and the heralds of His wrath, who is yet to arrive in his majesty, "whose voice shook the earth, and shall once more shake not only earth but, also heaven?" What are they but premonitors of that day wherein "the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also, and all the works that are therin shall be burned up."

Go once more and stand with Coleridge, at sunrise, in the Alpine valley at Chamouny; join with him in that magnificent invocation to the hoary mount, "sole sovereign of the vale," to rise with all its streams, and groves, and cataracts, and ice-fields—

> And tell the silent sky,
> And tell the stars, and tell yon rising sun,
> Earth, with her thousand voices, praises God.

Who can stand amid scenes like these, with the Bible in his hands, and not feel that if there is moral sublimity to be found on earth, it is in the book of God, it is in the thought of God. For what are all these outward visible forms of grandeur, but the expression and the utterance of that conception which the Bible has created in our minds, and which is now became the leading and the largest thoughts of all civilized nations? And what would these types and symbols be without the Bible as God's interpreter?

The Way to be Happy.

How little happiness resides in conditions or possessions we need not go far to see. They who approach nearest to happiness are often the least favored of Nature or fortune. To own much begets a desire for more; to be content with what one has is better than riches. The man who is poor, in feeble health, surrounded with perplexities, frequently bears a serener spirit than the man of wealth, vigor, and smooth environments. The one is patient, amiable, philosophic: he counts life at its proper worth, and, knowing it cannot be long, tones his mind to resignation. The other is ambitious, restless, grasping. Forgetful of what he has, he is intent upon what he might have, and so fills his days with wistfulness and repining.

The secret of happiness—such as is attainable—is to cultivate it from within, not to struggle for it from without. When we discover that want of money troubles us, it is better to reduce our desires than to overtask our strength in trying to increase our income. When we hunger for reputation it is well to reflect upon the price we must pay for it, and how easily it is lost after it has been acquired. When we wish for power, we should look at those who have gained it, and see how they enjoy it. In all our ambitions we should be benefitted by thinking of the reverse of what they represent, and of the fact that the reverse comes with their attainment.

Notes by the Way.

It is my privilege, after an absence of about 40 days, to be permitted to return to the quiet and pleasant town of Plymouth—the place of my residence.

While out I visited Lamark, Ill. Here we found a neat, pleasant place of about 1,000 inhabitants. We have at this place a good congregation—not large, but in good working order. They own a nice church house, and have Brother A. M. Stephenson employed to visit them monthly. During the intervals, Brother P. B. Stauffer and Brother David Gans, their elders, speak for them.

From Lamark we visited Ripley, Brown county, Ill. This is a small town of about 500 inhabitants, and should be called Potter's-town, as there are eight potter's shops located there. While there we visited a shop owned by one of our brethren, and saw him making jars, jugs, &c. We saw that, as Paul in Rom. ix. quotes from Jeremiah, he had power over the clay to make a vessel to be willed, (if only his lump of clay was large enough.) Ripley is equally distant from Rushville on the north and Mt. Sterling on the south—two railroad points,—and eight miles from each, about 40 miles east from Quincy. At Ripley are several brethren, but now without regular preaching. We recommend to them to correspond with Brother I. D. Kelley, of Columbus, Kansas, who might be induced to locate among them and speak for them and the brethren at Cooperstown. While there we made several discourses, and visited among the brethren. We visited Brother Fernando Cooper, who is a worthy brother but an invalid, suffering under a paralytic stroke. He is an object of charity, and any thing given him is bestowed on one who is worthy and one who needs.

The next point visited for meeting was Higbee, Randolph county, Mo. Here we made two discourses for Elder Jno. McCune, of the Christian church, on subjects as he requested. We found him much interested in "the things pertaining to the Kingdom of God" and the nature of man. His position now is that the church and kingdom are not one.

From Higbee we visited Myers, Howard county, Mo., where we made five discourses, filling three appointments of our own and two for Elder Wm. T. Anderson, (nephew of the late H. T. Anderson,) of the Christian church. This is the place of our nativity and boyhood days. Here we had the pleasure of speaking to those who were heads of families when we were a boy, to those who were our our school mates, and to many of those who attended school when first we taught. A few copies of the RESTITUTION have been for the last year visiting this place, and not without effect, for not a few now are reading and believing "the things pertaining to the Kingdom." After having made a discourse upon the subject of Spirit, and notwithstanding Solomon said that at death the spirit went to God who gave it, there was not a single text that taught us that it knew anything after it got there, Brother Anderson raised some objections, but finally concluded by telling the audience he did not know whether the spirit after it left the body knew anything or not. Again after we made a discourse on the organization of the Kingdom, and urged that its organization was future, Bro. Anderson raised objections, and stated that the apostles counted their work of judging the twelve tribes of Israel during their natural life time, but he was a little perplexed when we and him read Matt. xix. 27, 28, with xxv. 31 ff. Brother Anderson's peculiar business demanded his presence elsewhere, or we would have had the pleasure of dividing the time and investigating these points further. An opportunity may be afforded for this at some time in the future.

From this point we visited the country in Audrain county, Mo., north of Mexico, and made five discourses. After we had made one or two discourses, no one, that we heard of, accused us of being drunken, but some wondered, some mocked, some said one thing, and some another, but all concluded to hear more, as our audience increased. Our last discourse was on the punishment of the wicked. Many were well pleased and satisfied, but a few who were well wedded to their old theories rather than give them up, though the Bible does not teach them, would yet prefer inch by inch to burn a few thousand years. Like Ephraim, "hard to their idols they are joined." We are to send a few copies of the RESTITUTION into that locality. Little by little the truth will grow.

The next point which we visited for meeting was West Lebanon, Ind. The situation and condition of the brotherhood with which, most of the readers of this paper are acquainted.

We made no especial effort in new fields while absent to gain additions. Our mission was simply to sow the seed for a future harvest.

The crop prospects in Illinois and Missouri are now flattering. The wheat crop was comparatively a failure. The oat crop, though a sufficiency of straw, was not well filled. The corn crop in Illinois is very spotted, and in Northern Missouri, on the level land, is an entire failure on account of the excessive rains. Notwithstanding this, the price of grain in these localities will not be materially changed, as there is a large amount yet in the granaries reserved from the abundant crop of last year.

G. M. MYERS.

The Coming of the Lord.

Without this coming the promise of the restitution of all things spoken of by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began will fail.

The heavens must contain Christ till that time. Acts iii. 20-21.

The glory that is to follow the sufferings of Christ will fall without it. Though Christ himself has entered into glory, yet the whole world travails in pain for deliverance. Rom. viii. 21-22. These light afflictions, of short duration, "work for us a far more exceeding, and eternal weight of glory." 2 Cor. iv. 17.

The resurrection of those that have died in the Lord, will fall without it. The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first. 1 Thess. iv. 14. Christ's the first fruits, afterward, they that are Christ's at his coming. 1 Cor. xv. 23.

Without it, even the believer that endures to the end, is not saved; for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. Rom. xiii. 11. And unto them that look for him, shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation. Heb. ix. 28. The believer is sealed unto the day of redemption. And grieve not the spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption. Eph. iv. 30.

The first coming of Christ is acknowledged by all that believe in Christianity. But his second literal coming is rejected by multitudes. Why is this? Because there are false teachers among the people, as the apostle Peter has said here would be. "But there were false prophets also among the people, even as there shall be false teachers among you." 2 Pet. ii. 1.

Do the popular preachers of the day, make the second coming of Christ, prominent in their sermons? Nay, verily; therefore the good they do, I fear, will be like the fleeting cloud, or morning dew—soon pass away. Such is the power, and force of popular influence, the great mass are carried along not knowing where they will land.

Dear brethren, I have been preaching this blessed doctrine, mostly in a private way, for the last thirty years, or more, and now as I am getting old and feeble, I wish to make this public testimony, so far as the RESTITUTION can spread it abroad) in favor of this great saving truth of revelation.

Let us all continue to bear testimony concerning it, "in season and out of season, when we go and when we come in," still let us repeat it: "The Lord is coming. Let this be the herald note of jubilee." Amen.

THE RESTITUTION

PLYMOUTH, IND., ... AUGUST 16 1876

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

☞Mrs. Reed's new book, Earnest Words for Honest Sceptics has not yet been received from the publisher. We expect it soon and will at once fill the orders now on hand. Every Bible believer should have a copy of this earnest plea for the Word of God.

☞A good brother in Ohio has jumped upon his high horse and left us, because his particular case was not noticed. If we rejected as many manuscripts from our brethren as we do of our own they would all fire up and leave us alone. Don't fret, brethren, we all make mistakes and need a world of that charity which vaunteth not itself." We get lots of side hits and some square in the face but we propose to stand it till cool weather.

☞Next week we shall commence the publication of a series of articles upon the Sabbath question, by Bro. Stephenson. Bro. S. kept the Seventh Day for a number of years, and was a leading champion of that view, but a subsequent investigation of the whole subject led him out of the wilderness of the Mosaic age into the glorious dispensation of the Gospel of Christ. Bro. S. is fully competent to remove the last refuge of those who claim that Christians should keep a day which Jesus nor disciples ever commanded to be observed.

☞The Appeal claims that the wearing of robes by the clergy is a very dignified performance. Cardinals claim the same for their red caps. Christ made this remarkable statement about long robes in connection with other sins. "Beware of the scribes, which desire to walk in long robes, and love greetings in the markets, and the highest seats in the synagogues, and the chief rooms in the feasts; which devour widows' houses, and for a show make long prayers; the same shall receive greater damnation." Luke xx. 46-47. These words should burn the very sacrifice from those who wear long robes as a sign of dignity and reverence.

☞It will be seen by a notice elsewhere in this number of the RESTITUTION, that the brethren in Baltimore propose having a general meeting in that city, commencing Sept. 30. A cordial invitation is extended to all who desire to attend. The brethren are prepared to take care of all who may wish to be present. There are a goodly number throughout the West who would esteem it a great pleasure to meet those of like faith in Baltimore. It is to be hoped that there will be a general gathering, and that new life and zeal may be given to the cause which now seems to be rising in all directions. Let there be an extra effort to attend the Baltimore meeting.

Two Kinds of Righteousness.

According to Paul there are two kinds of righteousness; one comes from obedience to the law, the other from faith. One pertains to things temporal, the other to things eternal. There are those who claim that obedience to a certain number of precepts spoken in the Mosaic age will give us an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom, but if we read the Divine aright there is no foundation for such a view. A character made up by conformity to the law will not win the crown of righteousness in reserve for believers. It will not require much proof to set this proposition before the reader in true light. Paul says, "And be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith." Phil. iii. 9. The apostle makes this point still stronger in his letter to the Galatians: "I do not frustrate the grace of God: for if righteousness come by the law then Christ is dead in vain." Chap. ii. 21. Take another text bearing upon this same point: "But now the righteousness of God WITHOUT THE LAW is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets. Even the righteousness of God which is by faith," etc. Rom. iii. 21, 22. The law then cannot develop the righteousness of God. Its types and its shadows were to give way to that more glorious righteousness which is by faith. The apostle makes this point very clear in Romans tenth: "For Christ is the END OF THE LAW for righteousness to every one that believeth." Rom. x. 4. The only point now incumbent on us to show is, How can we become acquainted with the righteousness of God by faith and thereby be clothed with the garment of salvation. The apostle answers this point in Rom. i. 16, 17: "For I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first and also to the Greek. For therein, (the gospel) is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith: as it is written, The just shall live by faith!"

These testimonies set the question at rest and show beyond all cavil that God's righteousness is now our rule of life, that it comes through faith in the gospel of Jesus Christ. Indeed Jesus never told his apostles to preach the law but did commission them to proclaim the gospel which is God's power unto salvation to all who believe.

The World's Population.

The latest estimate of the number of people in the world, and their division into religions, may be thus tabulated:

Protestants	80,000,000
Roman Catholics	170,000,000
Greek Church	76,000,000
Jews	5,000,000
Mohammedans	160,000,000
Heathen	783,000,000
Total	1,235,000,000

This is largely an estimate only, as many of the countries are very inadequately enumerated by census. Parts of Africa and Asia must be guessed at with very few data to go upon. But if we drop the surplus above the thousand millions, supposing that the heathen nations are less correctly counted than the others, we still have the appalling fact that at least 600,000,000 of the human race are in the midst of Pagan or Mohammedan darkness, and are in the ways of sin and death.

The thought is eloquent! A matter of fact people and age ought to be moved more by its statement than by the most exciting appeals. With the powers of civilization, with wealth and means of making the money instrumental in conveying our civilization and christianity to the darkest and most distant parts of the earth, why should we not evangelize the earth with out delay? All the real power of the world is in the hands of nominal Christians. They ought to give their religion to the rest.—N. Y. Observer.

If the Observer will think a moment, it will find that multitudes of those who are called Christians are only nominally so, and few of the masses named as Christians but that need the gospel just as much as those in darkness. To endorse Christ and to live Christ are two very different things. The world's conversion is a blessed truth of revelation, but that event is one beyond the coming of our Lord and the resurrection of the holy dead. In millennial times all the nations are to remember and turn unto the Lord. See Psa. 22. When that sublime epoch comes, the arts of war will give place to the peaceful rule of the King in Zion. Then the lands now in darkness will behold the glory of the new day, and the inhabitants of the world shall learn righteousness.

Waked Up.

I have been reading your paper some time, and it is always welcome in the family circle, but I cannot endorse all that you publish, especially an article headed, "What is Sin?" The nameless writer of the article says it is one of the many catch phrases of Sabbatarians. I think it should be the question of all candid men. The writer, if not prejudiced, could see what work was appointed for him to do. Isa. xlii. 21, speaking of Jesus, says: He will magnify the law and make it honorable. I think the writer overlooked Rom. iii. 31: "Do we make void the law by faith, God forbid, may we establish the law."

This ought to settle the Sabbath question forever to any reader of the Bible, for there is no authority in all of the scripture, for keeping the First Day of the week holy, or any other day but the Seventh Day.

Yours truly, A. H. BARTH.

We give place to the above merely to show the reader how easy it is for any one to be over confident where there is no testimony. Our friend quotes Isaiah xlii. 21, and Rom. iii. 31, and applies them both to the ten commandments. Is it not strange that men will thus assume the very point to be proven? Christ made the whole law honorable by carrying out the great design for which it was given. He did not come to destroy or make void the law of Moses, but to fulfill it. Hear his own testimony: "These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you; that all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the LAW OF MOSES, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me." Luke xxiv. 44.

Our good brother will see from the above, that what Isaiah said would be carried out to the very letter in Christ. But our friend does not keep the law of Moses. Why? Simply because it was fulfilled and passed away. In the language of Paul to the Galatians: "Wherefore then serveth the law? It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made." Gal. iii. 19-21. Our friend even goes so far as to include the Sabbath in Paul's word, in Rom. iii. 31. If we could only bent it into his head and heart that Paul is talking about the WHOLE LAW, and not just the ten commandments, we should have hope. But when men will insist on calling the ten commandments God's perfect, moral law, the task seems almost hopeless. Let our brother read in the "ten commandments" in place of the word law and he may get some needed light.

The Sabbath Question.

Editor Restitution:

I would like to have you or some of the brethren give an exposition of the Sabbath question, and I submit a few thoughts on the subject for the consideration of the brotherhood. In the first place, who, or by whose authority, was the Sabbath changed from the Seventh to the First day of the week?

Evidently Christ did not do it, for we find him teaching that he was Lord even of the Sabbath day, and that he in the synagogue, as his custom was, on the Sabbath day. See Luke iv. 16, and Mark i. 21. And again, if he intended that they should keep the First Day of the week instead of the Seventh, why do we not find it recorded so?

But instead, at his crucifixion we find that that day was the day of preparation, and the Sabbath drew on. And the women also, which came with him from Galilee, followed after, and beheld the sepulchre, and how the body was laid. And they returned and prepared spices and ointments; and rested the Sabbath day according to the commandment. Luke xxiii. 54-56. Now I ask, why did not Christ tell them just to let that Sabbath day go, and wait till the First Day, and keep that? But he never intimated any such thing to them, nor do we find him teaching any such thing after his resurrection. Neither do we find that the apostles kept any other day than the Seventh, nor do we find them teaching that any other day should be observed than the Seventh. James ii. 10, says, for whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all, and then goes on to enumerate a part of the law, which is evidently the ten commandment law. If, therefore, we keep all of the commandments but the fourth one, and break that, then we are become a transgressor of the law, are we not?

I submit the foregoing to the careful consideration of the brethren, and I hope we shall have some light upon this subject, for is it not a vitally important one? If we are breaking the law of God we ought to know it.

Yours seeking for truth,
ALONZO HASSON.

REX POINT, D. T., Aug. 7, 1876.

REMARKS ON THE ABOVE.

The above is a fair specimen of the way many Bible students investigate the word of God.

In the first place there is no believer of the Gospel who maintains that the day was changed. The Seventh Day Sabbath belonged to the Mosaic age and was given to Israel for a sign. Please read Ex. xxxi. 13. Any person who did not keep it was to be put to death. Verses 14-17. No one pretends to have the power to put people to death now. We are told, however, that the penalty has been done away. Then why do men try to enforce a law whose penalty has been abolished? But where is there any account of the abolition of the penalty and the perpetuity of the command? But it is said that Christ and the disciples observed the Sabbath, and therefore we must keep it. They kept the feasts, were circumcised, and indeed, kept the whole Mosaic ritual. Must we do the same? But it is said that the Mosaic law is done away. Very well. That was God's law, and every command in it was God's command. This admission sweeps away the last hiding place of those who would try to make us keep the Seventh Day when neither Christ nor the apostles ever instructed us to observe it.

One of the chief texts of Sabbatarians is James ii. 8-10. But how strange it is that the law here referred to has one precept which is not on the tables of stone. The royal law says, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." This precept is in what Sabbatarians call the law of Moses, and yet not one of them pretend to keep that. Why will men thus evade their own reasoning? Our brother is evidently bewildered with the idea that the ten commandments are God's perfect moral law, but if he will just bear in mind that God had but one law during the Mosaic age, he will not become nobled by the trashy arguments of those who desire to be teachers of the law. That the phrases law of Moses and th. law of God refer to one and the same law, is plain from the following texts. Neh. viii. 1, 3, 8, 14, 18; Chap. ix. 3; Chap. x. 29; Luke ii. 22, 23, 24. It seems to us wicked for any man to argue that the law consists only of ten commandments, and in that way to delude the honest hearted disciple. There is not one command, not one word about Christians keeping the Seventh Day as set forth in the Old Testament. Jesus did not command it. The apostles said nothing about it, and indeed there is no reason for keeping a day which was locked up with other ordinances of the Mosaic ritual. The First Day of the week was the day upon which the disciples came together to break bread. If they were keeping the Seventh Day as a Sabbath, why did they put the holy ordinance off until the next day? There is something wonderfully strange about this matter, if the Seventh Day theory is true. But we know it is not true. It only thrives for a time in any place. It lives on catches and dies when men become acquainted with the glorious Gospel of Christ.

Bible Study.

PAUL'S DESIRE TO DEPART. PHIL. i. 23.

In the consideration of this language of Paul, we must not disregard Peter's great law of Scriptural Interpretation, in which he says: "That no prophecy of the Scripture is of any private interpretation." 2 Peter i. 20.

Then associating with the text the context, containing Paul's language, after the introductory matter of the letter, we note the following points:

1. The apostle informs his brethren that the misfortunes which had befallen him had resulted in the advancement of the cause of Christ. V. 12.

2. That his bonds had given him an opportunity of presenting the claims of Christ in the court of Cæsar, and that, too, with good effect. v. 13, with iv. 22, with Acts xxiv. 10-27; xxv. 10, 11; xxvi. 1-32; xxviii. 16-31.

3. That in his sufferings, afflictions, bonds, and imprisonment, he manifested his faith in the cause which he advocated, and thus caused his his brethren to wax more confident and bold in setting forth that cause. V. 14.

4. That (as in the case in giving forth opposition and persecution to any cause) the Jews in opposing and persecuting him thus brought the cause of Christ before the world. V. 14.

5. That his friends and brethren in meeting by argument his accusers, proclaimed Christ. V. 15-17.

6. Then, whether by pretence, envy, or in truth, Christ was preached, Paul's desire was attained, and he was caused to rejoice. V. 18.

7. Christ was to be magnified in Paul's body, whether he lived or died, v. 19-20. 1st. If he was to die a martyr to the cause of Christ he knew that it would strengthen the faith of his brethren. This is a principle ever manifest in the human family. Nothing else so much confirms the faith of the espousers of a cause as to have the faith of the leaders and principal advocates of that cause sealed by their blood. As American people we are made sensible of this when we are appealed to patriotically in the name of the fathers of 1776. The Prussians, in order to arouse that patriotic spirit, or feeling, in their army which had to meet Napoleon I., marched them first around the tomb of Peter the Great and related to them his efforts to give them nationality. When war is declared by the aboriginal tribes of the West, their camp-fires are builded, their war-dances are held and the courage of the young warrior is strengthened by hearing from the aged of the heroic deeds of their fathers. So, too, is the faith of the disciple of Christ strengthened and new courage imparted when he comes to read Heb. xi., and to be surrounded by that cloud of which Paul spoke. This Paul well understood, and therefore spoke of his death as a gain, v. 21. Not gain to himself, but to the cause of Christ. 2d. Christ was to be magnified in Paul's body if he lived in that, that he would continue to preach Christ to the world, and this was to be the fruit of his labor in case he lived. V. 22.

3. But now for the good of the cause of Christ he did not know which would prove the more beneficial, and therefore he did not know which to choose, v. 22, and notwithstanding he could not decide which (life or death) would be more beneficial to the cause of Christ when considering the interest of that cause, yet when he came to consider his own individual desires he desired to, analusai, and to be with Christ. Inasmuch as there is some difference of opinion entertained relative to the idea Paul desired to convey by the word "depart" in this 23d verse, we have dropped the word and have given it its stead the Greek word from which "depart" is derived. We will look at this word analusai and ascertain if we possibly can what it means, and then put that idea into the text that we may comprehend its meaning. Then firstly we will introduce a definition of the word.

Groves says: Analuo (the root of analusai) is from ana, again, and luo, to loose; to separate, divide, loosen, unravel, untie, to loose the cables, unmoor, to put to sea; to set out, depart; to return; to die; to dissolve, dismiss, break up; to rest, put up, stop, halt; to free, deliver, restrain from; to discharge; to recompense. As this is in substance the definition given by Pickering, Greenfield, and others, we will not lengthen this article by quoting from them, the above being sufficient.

We cannot fail to discover in the word as above defined two prominent ideas, both an anyllical and a synthetical idea. Now to which of these did the apostle have reference when he penned the letter to Philippi? That we must accept of the idea first advanced in the definition of the word we are brought under obligations by the great fundamental law in the interpretation of all language, unless the general context of the scripture forbids, and will give the word a different meaning. Then are we to understand that Paul's idea was that he at death was to make an exit out of the mortal body and to immediately bound into heaven in the presence of Christ? To this idea we except from the following considerations:

1. Jesus since his resurrection "has not entered into the tabernacle made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us," Heb. ix. 24; not without blood, but with his own blood to offer for us. Heb. ix. 6-7. And since he has entered officially as an High Priest, for us, applying the law respecting the type, (and there shall be no man in the tabernacle of the congregation when he goeth in to make an atonement for himself, and for his household, and for all the congregation of Israel." Lev. xvi. 17.) to the antetype we are taught that Paul nor no one else can possibly enter into heaven while Christ is there officiating as priest.

2. Christ said to Nicodemus, Jno. iii. 13, "that no man hath ascended up into heaven but the Son of man who came down from heaven, (was of heavenly origin), who is (when John wrote, A. D. 96,) in heaven."

That Paul expected that he would at death take an exit from the mortal body and go into the Paradisiacal side of the Greek hades, and there be in the presence of Jesus, with his desires gratified, we cannot believe from the following reasons:

1. Notwithstanding Christ went into hades with the thief who was crucified with him, yet he arose out of hades. Psa. xvi. 10; Acts ii. 27, 31. He remained on earth visiting his disciples from time to time for forty days, and then ascended to heaven. Acts i. 3, 9. Therefore, as Christ is not now, nor was not when Paul wrote to Philippi, in hades, Paul's desires could not be gratified there.

2. Paul well knew, as he was well read in the Scriptures, that when he reached hades, as all the dead do, that he would be entirely incapable of having any desires gratified. This incapability is taught by Job, David, Solomon and others. See Job xvii. 13-16; Psa. vi. 5; Eccl. ix. 10; Isa. xxxviii. 15-19. The words grave, pit, and silence, in these texts all are translated from this word hades.

That Paul expected a dissolution of body, soul and spirit, that his body would go to the grave, that his soul would go to some other locality, and that his spirit would go to some third place, and the desires of some one of these parts would be gratified by being in the presence of Christ, we cannot believe for the want of proof. That Solomon in Eccl. xii. 7, says: "Then (at death) shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it," we are fully aware, but that the spirit knows anything after it gets to God is wanting of one single text of Scripture to sustain it.

But contrary to all this, Paul expected to have his desires gratified at a very different period of time, and also taught others to the same effect, viz: the return of the Lord.

1. It was at the Lord's return that Paul expected to meet him, not to come with him. 1 Thess. iv. 14-17.

2. It was at the Lord's return that he expected that he and all his brethren would obtain their glory, honor and immortality. Rom. ii. 6, 7; 1 Cor. xv. 51-56.

3. It was at the Lord's return that Paul expected that his nature would be changed and fashioned like unto that of Christ. Phil. iii. 20, 21.

4. It was at the Lord's return that Paul expected his crown. 2 Tim. iv. 5-8, with 1 Peter v. 1-4.

From the above considerations are we not irresistibly led to the conclusion that Paul had reference to the synthetical idea in the word analusai rather than to the analytical. We will remark that as the word only occurs in two other places in the apostolical writings, that in one of these it is rendered return. See Luke xii. 36.

Further, that it may be seen that the word is frequently used in a synthetical sense, we make the following quotations from C. F. Hudson's work entitled, Debt and Grace, p. 257:

"And there are some reasons for supposing that the phrase here rendered 'to depart' (ex to analusai) may signify 'to return,' or 'the release,' with special relation to the coming back of the dead from hades, of which the early Christians made so much. The verb here used occurs in Luke xii. 36, in the sense of 'return.' In twenty-two manuscripts of the Septuagint, including the Oxford, it is used in Josh. xxii. 8, for the Hebrew word which always signifies 'to return.' And in Wisd. ii. 1, it occurs in the phrase: 'neither was there any man known to have returned from the grave' (analusas, better released). In ch. v. 13: 'An arrow . . . parteth the air, which immediately cometh together again' (analuthe, eluruthi). In ch xvi. 13, 14: 'Thou hast power of life and death; thou leadest to the gates of hades, and bringest up again. But a man killeth, . . . and can not bring back (analusei) the soul received [into hades]." In 2 Macc. viii. 25: 'Lacking time, they returned' (analusan). In in ch. ix. 1: 'Antiochus returned (anaklukos, De Wette, zurueckehrte) in a disorderly manner from Persia.' In ch xv. 28: 'Now when the battle was done, returning again with joy' (analuontes). The noun as used in 2 Tim. iv. 6, may signify 'release'; though the context here shows that the hopes of Paul were centered not on the event of death, but of the resurrection."

"From the above considerations, then, we are led to the conclusion that Paul's desire individually considered was analytically to be loosened from his perishable and corruptible nature, and synthetically to be gathered back by a resurrection to an incorruptible nature, when he would have his desires fully gratified by being in the presence of Christ for ever more.

G. M. MYERS.

The New Earth.

It appears! The happy land of promise, formed by the hand of God, large, beautiful and pleasant, a fit habitation for his favorite people, and long expected by them as their country. Here all the righteous, great and small, are assembled, making one vast blessed society, even the kingdom and city of God. Here God manifests himself in a peculiar manner to his servants, and wipes away all tears from off their faces, and adorns them with the beauties of immortality, glorious to behold. Here they drink fullness of joy, from the crystal river proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb, and eat of the tree of life. And there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain. But every one, happy in himself, imparts the blessing to his fellows; for mutual love warms every breath, love like that which exists between the Father and the Son; mutual conference on the sublimest subjects refreshes every spirit with the divine repasts of wisdom, and joys flowing from the tenderest friendships, fixed on the stable foundation of an immovable virtue gladden every heart. All the servants of God serve him in perfect holiness, see his face, feel transports of joy, and by the reflection of his glory shine as the sun in the firmament forever and ever. And there shall be no night there, and they need no candle, neither light of the sun, for the Lord God giveth them light, and they shall reign forever and ever. Happy day! happy place! and happy people! Oh, blessed hope of joining that glorious society! All the servants of God shall serve him, and see his face! What an immensity of felicity is here. Imagination faints with the fatigue of stretching itself, to comprehend the vast, the unmeasurable thought.—Macknight.

To Every Man His Work.

Our Master has taken his journey
To a country far away,
And has left us a task to finish
Against his reckoning day.
There's a work for me, and a work for you,
Something for each of his servants to do.

Your task may be great and glorious,
And mine but a simple one;
It differs little. The question is,
Will it be coming find it done?

Or, perhaps in his deeper knowledge
He has thought it was wise and best,
That, while others toil in service,
Our part be to wait and rest.

It matters not, in this little while,
Who they we work, or watch, or wait;
So we fill the place he assigns us,
Be the service small or great.

There is one thing only needful for us,
To find the task that is ours,
And then having set it by, to do it
With all our God-given powers.

Our Master is coming most surely,
To reckon with every one;
Shall we then rest at our toil or sorrow,
In his sentence be "well done?"

The Debate at Remington, Ind.—No. 2.
Beginning Monday Evening, April 30th, 1870.

Subject: The nature of man, and his condition in death.

Resolved, that there is in man a responsible rational entity, called mind, spirit or soul, which will never cease to be and which entity is capable of conscious existence separate from the body. W. B. Hendryx affirms, J. F. Wilcox denies.

Introduction No verbatim report was taken of this debate. At the close of the debate on this and the questions following I wrote Mr. Hendryx the following letter:

GOODLAND, Ind., April, 20th, 1870.

W. B. HENDRYX, Remington, Ind.

Dear Bro. I desire to issue in pamphlet form a synopsis of our late debate on the nature of man and the destiny of the wicked. As we cannot give a verbatim report, a candid presumption of all the arguments pro and con, in regular order, as presented in the contest, is the next best, indeed the only thing, we can do to meet the demand for its publication. I shall be glad if you will join me in this and furnish your part as presented. I will be at the labor of preparing the manuscript for the press, and submit it to you for publication. A fund of $50, or thereabouts, will be necessary to bear the expense, one-half of which I am all expret you to bear. The coming debate can be published separately, which I also desire to do. Please let me hear definitely from you in regard to this without delay, and oblige.

Yours Truly, J. F. WILCOX.

To this Mr. H. responded as follows:

REMINGTON, Ind. Apr. 24th, 1870.

ELDER J. F. WILCOX. Dear Bro. It will be impossible for me to comply with your request to publish my speeches of the recent debate, as it would be beyond my power to reproduce them; I have not even the notes of some of them.

Yours in Hope, Fraternally,
W. B. HENDRYX.

To this I immediately replied:

GOODLAND, Ind., Apr. 24th, 1870.

W. B. HENDRYX, Remington, Ind.

Dear Bro. Yours of this morning is before me, and I hasten to express my dissatisfaction at its contents. I know of course, that you could not "reproduce your speeches," neither can I reproduce mine; nor do I care to. Of course it is now impossible to publish a verbatim report. I desire only, to put your positions, arguments, etc., side by side with my own, before a larger public than favored us with a hearing at Remington. You have your arguments on paper, when on the affirmative, I have your arguments when on the negative. Hence it is easy to reproduce the positions of both sides, and place them before the public. You can do this, will you do it? Please answer without delay and oblige Yours for the Truth,

J. F. WILCOX.

To this Elder H. made no reply.

The following report is therefore drawn from copious notes made by myself and Elder Kendall, before mentioned, assisted by memory. The arguments are all down as presented, but it is not pretended that the language is always the same.

W. B. HENDRYX' FIRST SPEECH.

Mr. Hendryx began by defining the terms of the proposition. By the word "entity" of the proposition he meant a real being: a personality, a real intelligent, responsible person, with all the faculties, intellectual and moral of a man: not a being, however, with a physical organization, but possessing all the other characteristics and capabilities of man.

This being is endowed with rationality, that is with the power of reason and reflection, judgement and volition. Responsibility, therefore, belongs to him; for capability is the measure of responsibility. That which reasons, reflects, judges and wills must be the responsible being.

In proof that the spirit possessed the attributes the following texts were quoted and commented upon at length. Rom. viii. 16. "God is my witness whom I saw with my spirit." It is the spirit of whom service is predicted. The spirit serves. It is therefore the rational responsible entity.

Rom. vii. 25. "With the mind I myself serve God, but with the flesh the law of sin." Service is here predicted of the minds, which proves the identity of mind and spirit.

It also shows the contrast between flesh and spirit. Flesh is one thing, spirit altogether another.

Rom. viii. 16. "The spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God."

God's spirit is here referred to, and it is asserted that it testifies or bears witness with our spirit. But only an intelligent responsible entity could receive the testimony of another or understand its import.

That spirit we admit, therefore is the man, That we affirm is in man.

Acts xx. 19. "Serving the Lord with all humility of mind." Humility is here affirmed to be a quality of mind. It is not a quality of body, therefore the mind and body are not the same.

1 Cor. ii. 11. "What man knoweth the things of man save the spirit of man which is in him, even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the spirit of God."

Here knowledge is predicated of the spirit of man. It is the spirit that knows. The body is incapable of knowledge. It is the spirit of man which is in him, of which knowledge, therefore responsibility is here asserted.

Num. xvi. 22. "And they fell upon their faces and said: "O God, the God of the spirits of all flesh, shall one man sin, etc." Here God is represented as the God of the spirits of all flesh. God is an object of worship; it is the spirit, and it alone that worships. Worship, responsibility, intelligence, capability, is here by implication predicated of the spirit.

Job xiv. 21. "But his flesh upon him shall have pain and his soul within him shall mourn."

We have here the fact stated that the soul is within the man and that is is the soul that mourns. It is not the body that mourns, but the soul within the body. The soul is therefore the same as spirit and mind.

Job xxxii. 8. But there is a spirit in man and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding."

Job xxxii. 18 "For I am full of matter; the spirit within me constraineth me."

Job xv. 2. "I have heard the check of my reproach, and the spirit of my understanding causeth me to answer."

In all these cases understanding, thought, rationality, responsibility, is predicated of the spirit; and it is represented as being in man.

So also Isa. lvii. 16. "For thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabited eternity, whose name is Holy; I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones." God is here represented as dwelling with the spirit of man. "God is a spirit" and he can only dwell with the spirit. How is communion of like natures? My opponent believes that man is wholly flesh. The text should therefore have represented God as dwelling with the flesh instead of the spirit. But the Scriptures uniformly draw a contrast between flesh and spirit. See Isa. xxxi. 3. "Now the Egyptians are men and not God, and their horses flesh and not spirit." Flesh and spirit are therefore not the same. Again our Savior said to his disciples: "Handle me and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have." Luke xxiv. 39.

J. F. WILCOX'S FIRST SPEECH.

Mr. Wilcox began by calling attention to the reading of the proposition, and showing that by its terms this responsible, rational entity was a real being, and that his opponent so defined it, insisting that by this entity he meant "a personality; a real, responsible person, with all the faculties, intellectual and moral, of a man. If this is the case, then by the terms of the proposition itself we have two men in one, for this "real man is said by the proposition to reside in man. His opponent had formed the proposition to suit himself, and he hoped before the debate had gone far, he would define man clearly, so that no one could mistake his views as to what man is. The debate was really as to the true nature of man. The negative had sought to have the proposition so formed that the nature of man would be directly affirmed, as it would have greatly simplified the debate, as the correspondence would prove. As it now stands, the proposition affirms nothing concerning man's nature, only that there is in man this entity; which my opponent properly claims means a real personality. He does not affirm that it resides in a part of man, but in man. Whatever, therefore, he may affirm or deny concerning this entity, is affirming or denying nothing concerning man, unless he shall show this entity which dwells in man to be man. In that case it would be impossible to extricate himself from the dilemma that the proposition asserts that one responsible rational entity called man resides in another responsible, rational entity called man. Very serious, not to say ludicrous, results would follow such an avowal, which his opponent would not be willing to father. Yet the dual nature of man is what his opponent really holds to, and which he will defend in the debate. He would expect him, therefore, to plainly define man at the outset. What is man? Is he all body, or all spirit, or a combination of the two? He should expect him to begin at the beginning and analyze man. If he was in possession of such a spirit, or soul, or mind, as the proposition affirms, he expected his opponent to tell when he got it, where he got it, and how he got it. He was curious to know what man was composed of, and the public would not be satisfied with anything else. For himself, he proposed to do exactly on his part what he asked of his friend to do,—define man. He believes man has a spirit, but he objects to the definition of spirit as given by his opponent. It is not an entity. It is not the man nor any part of the man. Man has a spirit. That is the truth; but he challenged his opponent to produce a single text to show that man is a spirit. His opponent had produced a long array of texts to show that the word spirit is used in the sense of mind. That is correct; it is so used in numberless cases. The public must not, however, expect him to take note of every text given by his opponent, as it was unnecessary to do so. He would note some of the most important of them, and would lay down principles by which they could all be understood in harmony with the doctrine of the negative.

But granting that spirit is used in the sense of mind, does it follow that it is always so used. If the spirit is really such a personality as his friend Mr Hendryx insisted on, it ought always to be so used. If it was not always so used this was evidence that it did not signify a responsible personality. It might be new to some that the word spirit which occurs in all the passages quoted is from the Hebrew Ruach and is translated in 21 different ways besides spirit. It is translated Blast, 4 times, once in Ex. xv. 8. Quarters, once, 1 Chron. ix. 24. Anger, once, Jud. viii. 3. Mind, six times, Gen. xxvi. 35., etc. Courage, once, Josh. ii. 11. Vain, once, Job xvi. 3. Side, six times, Jer. lii. 23., etc. Breath; 28 times, Gen. vi. 17. Cool, once, Gen. iii. 8. Tempest, once, Psa. xi. 6. Spiritual, once, Hosea ix. 7. Air, once, Job. xli. 16. Windy, once, Psa. lv. 8. Whirlwind, once, Ezek. i. 4. Smell, five times, Ex. xxx. 38., etc. Smelleth, once, Job xxxix. 25. Smelled, twice, Gen. viii. 21. Wind, 95 times, Gen. viii. 1. Understanding, once, Isa. xl. 3. Accept, once, 1 Sam. xxvi. 19. Toucheth, once, Jud. xvi. 9. It occurs in all 400 times and is translated spirit 240 times.

The corresponding word in the Greek is Pneuma. It occurs 385 times and is rendered in 6 different ways, viz: Spirit and Holy Ghost or Holy Spirit with the adjective Holy, 359 times. Ghost, twice, Matt. xxvii. 50; John xix. 30. Life, once, Rev. xiii. 15. Spiritual, once, 1 Cor. xiv. 12. Spiritually, once, Rom. viii. 6. Wind, once, John iii. 8

Here is certainly a very great variety of meaning, of the word; and we do not find among them one which we would be warranted in calling man. We have seen that it is sometimes translated mind. But are we warranted in saying that the mind is a personality? Man, has mind, but is man, mind? Now we affirm that nothing is man or is ever so-called, but the physical organism. Mind is not an entity, it is a result. Without the organism there is no mind: it is to the man what music is to the instrument; destroy the instrument and the music is no more.

Intelligence, responsibility, rationality, belongs alone to man as such. This is the organic structure which the "Lord had formed out of the dust of the ground." This organism is quickened by spirit or the principle of life which resides in the atmosphere, and when so quickened, or made alive, possesses mind. Without the organism there is no life; without the life or spirit, there is no mind or thought, or responsibility. The spirit resides in every living thing as well as man, both animal and vegetable; beast, bird, insect, tree, shrub, grass; all have spirit or life as well as man. Solomon says, in Eccl. iii. 19, that man and beast all have one spirit. Yet the capabilities of the being who possesses this spirit are determined by the organism. Man, beast, tree, all have spirit; but all differ as the organism differs. What the spirit or principle of life is, the wise ones cannot tell. It is the power that puts the machinery of the organism in motion; it departs and the motion immediately ceases, and very soon the machine or organism itself is dissolved. It is like the water to the mill, like the steam to the engine. The water is not the mill, nor the steam the engine; neither is the spirit the man. Now I lay it down as an indisputable proposition that we know of no life or intelligence without organization. All Scriptural representations of God are, that he is a being in the form of man. Man was made in his form or image. Angels, too, are beings in the form of man. Time.

Burial and Planting vs. Sprinkling.

An old minister who had for many years strenuously defended sprinkling as a substitute for baptism, found on a certain day that one of his flock of geese had died. He commanded his little son to go and bury her. Finding her afterwards with but a sprinkling of dirt thrown over her carcass, he angrily demanded of the boy "why he had not obeyed him?" "I did, father," replied the boy; "just as you obey God. God tells you to bury the people who come to you for baptism; you sprinkle them: you told me to bury the goose; I sprinkled it. If a substitute does in the one case, it ought to do in the other." We hope the father saw the point.

Let us suppose a similar case. A farmer has prepared and worked out a little patch of ground for early corn. It is a nice, sunny day and he tells his eldest son, a chunk of a boy, that he must go and plant the corn. Well pleased, the little fellow marches off, with his pail full of nice, wrinkled kernels, the germs of prospective sweet ears, that are some day to be piled up nicely roasted, on the table, to the great delight of himself and younger brothers and sisters. He takes his hoe along, sets it up by the fence, and begins his work, dropping just four kernels at each crossing of the furrows. When that part of the work is finished a mischievous idea takes possession of his brain, and child-like, he thinks it will be "such fun" to put into practice.

A few days before he had heard his father and some friends debating the mode of baptism. His father's friends had taken the position that people must be planted to fill the figure,—according to Paul's reasoning. He hadn't the remotest idea what filling the figure meant, but still he listened. His father had replied to their arguments, that sprinkling was all the same and would answer the same purpose.

So, now he thinks, "If sprinkling is planting, I can do it a good deal quicker and easier. I'll sprinkle my corn!" He fills his little pail with nice soil and the hills are soon all sprinkled. Of course they are not half covered and the father is very angry with him for half doing his work.

"Why didn't you plant the corn as I bade you?" he questions of the son. "Because, father," replied the boy, "when the folks told you 'that the Bible said that baptism was a planting,' you said 'sprinkling would do just as well, and that you had much rather be sprinkled, than to be baptized,' so I thought you would rather have the corn sprinkled than to have it planted, I supposed there must be something dreadful about planting, the way you talked about it." The father had nothing more to say.

Children are quick reasoners, and frequently draw more just conclusions than their superiors, when the premises are properly laid down. We would do well to become as little children.

That Beautiful Land.

A beautiful land by faith I see,
A land of rest, from sorrow free;
The home of the ransomed, light and fair,
And beautiful angels, too, are there.

CHORUS.—Will you go? Will you go?
Go to that beautiful land with me?
Will you go? Will you go?
Go to that beautiful land.

That beautiful land the city of light,
It ne'er has known the shades of night;
The glory of God, the light of day,
Hath driven the darkness far away.

In vision I see its streets of gold,
Its beautiful gates I too behold;
The river of life, the crystal sea,
The ambrosial fruit of life's fair tree.

The heavenly throng, arrayed in white,
In rapture range the plains of light:
And in one harmonious choir they praise
Their glorious Savior's matchless grace.

THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

"Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption."—1 Cor. xv. 50.

The above language is used largely by the different sects, and even by many of the advent people to prove,—

1. That the kingdom spoken of can only be inherited (tenanted or inhabited) by immaterial, intangible ghosts, or souls disembodied and deathless.

2. That the probationary era must close at the incessation of the millennial: or, that probation must close with the present age.

3. That the nations (kingdoms) of this world, either Jew or Gentile, can never become any part of the kingdom of God.

4. That the kingdom of God must be composed of nothing save the Lord Jesus and the "overcomers" of this and past ages, ruling over each other, and being ruled over in turn.

Believing as I do that the word of God is a unit, and that the language of Paul above quoted, is in perfect harmony with God's entire gospel, including the nations and kingdoms of this world transferred into the millennial world or world to come as a part and parcel of his kingdom, and, that through that day children will be born, grow to man and womanhood, and die,—that the lustiness accations of that age will, in many respects, be the same as in this; and that sickness, sorrow, pain and suffering, will continue then as now, I will, with the permission of Brother Reed, set forth in order some of the testimonies underlying my peculiar faith.

We have long since learned that certain elements are essential in every kingdom thus far known to man, in order that it exist as a kingdom, and the Holy writings plainly show that in these, the kingdom of God,—the fifth in the series of universal monarchies on this earth,—will not be an exception to the kingdoms of the past and present. Thus a kingdom must have,

1. A chief or principal ruler.

The Lord Jesus will be that principal ruler, the King of kings and Lord of lords in that kingdom.

PROOF.—Ezekiel says: "I will overturn, overturn, overturn it; and it shall be no more until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him." Ezek. xxi. 27. Isaiah prophecies of Him thus, ix. 6, 7: "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called wonderful, counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom to order it, and to establish it with judgment and justice from henceforth even forever." And its counterpart may be found in the first chapter of Luke 32d verse: "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end." John the Revelator testifies: "And out of his mouth goeth a sharp sword, that with it he should smite the nations; and he shall rule them with a rod of iron: and he treadeth the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God, and he hath on his vesture and his thigh a name written, King of kings and Lord of lords." Rev. xix. 15, 16. "And the Lord shall be King over all the earth; in that day there shall be one Lord, and his name one." Zech. xiv. 9.

2. A royal cabinet.

(a.) The apostles will be associated with the Lord in the rulership of the twelve tribes of Israel.

PROOF.—"Behold," says Peter, "we have left all and followed thee: what shall we have therefore?" And Jesus said unto them, "Verily, I say unto you, That ye which have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye shall also sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Matt. xix. 28. And again, "Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations, and I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me, that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Luke xxii. 28-30.

(b.) The "overcomers" from among the nations will rule as kings over the nations of the earth, outside of Judea and Israel.

PROOF.—"Thou art worthy to take the book and to open the seals thereof, for thou wast slain and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred and tongue and people and nation; and hast made us unto our God kings and priests; and we shall reign on the earth." Rev. v. 9, 10. Again, "And he that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give to have power over the nations." (Rev. ii. 26,) "and I saw thrones, and they sat on them and judgment was given unto them: and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus and for the Word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads or in their hands, and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years." Rev. xx. 4.

(NOTE.—The antecedent of the pronoun "they" of Rev. xx. 4, seems to be the "great multitudes" of chapter xix. 6.)

3. A locality or territory.

The kingdom of God will be located on the earth, and ultimately absorb and subdue all other kingdoms and nations, until all rule and authority succumbs to it.

PROOF.—"Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous branch, and a King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved and Israel shall dwell safely," etc. Jer. xxiii. 5, and also xxxiii. 14, 15. "He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the rivers unto the ends of the earth." Psa. lxxii. 8. "And the kingdom and dominion and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him." Dan. vii 27. Again Christ says, Matt. v. 5: "Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth." And Solomon in Proverbs xi. 31: "Behold the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth." While John heard great voices in heaven saying, when the seventh angel sounded his trumpet, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever." Rev. xi. 15.

4. Subjects.

(a.) The nation of Israel restored to their own land in their tribal relations, will be part of the subjects in the kingdom of God.

PROOF.—"For I would not, brethren, that you should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits, that blindness (margin, hardness), in part is happened to Israel until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in," and so all Israel shall be saved; as it is written, There shall come out of Sion a Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob." Rom. xi. 25, 26. "Solomon sat on the throne of the Lord as king instead of David his father and prospered; and all Israel obeyed him." 1 Chron. xxix. 23. And David says: "And of all my sons, (for the Lord hath given me many sons,) he hath chosen Solomon my son to sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the Lord over Israel." Ibid xxviii. 5. It was prophetically overturned in Ezek. xxi. 25-27, which prophecy was fulfilled in the reign of Zedekiah, and from that time to the present, none of the royal lineage of David have occupied the throne of the kingdom of the Lord. The apostles inquired of the Lord before his ascent to heaven, "Lord wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?" (Acts i. 6,) showing that it was only a matter of time in their minds. Again the answer of the Lord to Peter's question as recorded in Matt. xix. 28, determines them to be the subjects over whom the apostles will exercise kingly rulership, and the same is true of his language in Luke xxii. 30, already referred to, to-wit: "And sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel."

(b.) The nations of the earth will constitute the remainder of the subjects.

PROOF.—"Ask of me and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of earth for a possession." Psa. ii. 8. "And there was given him," the one like the Son of Man, "dominion, and glory and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages should serve him; his dominion is an everlasting dominion which shall not pass away and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." Dan. vii. 14. "And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High," etc. Ibid 27. John saw when "the kingdoms of this world are to become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ," (Rev. xi. 15,) and when "the nations of them which are saved" (or the nations from which the saved ones had been taken) "shall walk in the light of it and the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honor into it, and the gates of it shall not be shut at all by day; for there shall be no night there. And they shall bring the glory and honor of the nations into it." Rev. xxi. 24-26.

NOTE 1. An impressive fact is worthy of a thought in this relation, to-wit: The rulers over each nationality seem to be from its own borders, at least this is true with the Israelites and Gentile nations, as such.

NOTE 2. Had Israel obeyed the Lord and kept his covenant, instead of becoming subjects to be ruled over in the kingdom of God, they would have formed the corps of "associate rulers" over the nations of the earth. Ex. xix. 5, 6; Deut. vii. 6; xxiii. 8 Paul declares Rom. ix. 7: "Israel hast not obtained that which he seeketh for." No. It lacked individual kingship for which they caught, and left them the ruled, for "God hath not cast away his people," (xi. 1,) neither have they stumbled that they should fall. Chap. xi. 11. The truth seems to be that Israel aspired to become subordinate rulers over the nations, but by rejecting the Chief Ruler, their legitimate King,—when he came, partial blindness, or (margin, hardness) in part (which must have been total had their stumbling, cutting off or fall been total and final) is happened to Israel until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in, (Rom. xi. 25,) or, as Luke expresses it until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled, (xxi. 24,) when "there shall come out of Sion a Deliverer and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob, and so all Israel shall be saved," (verse 26,) not as rulers for which they sought, but as a nation to be ruled by the apostles and subordinates from their own nationality, who like Paul, was chosen for obedience to the law of faith in this age.

NOTE 3. Another thought worthy of record here is, that the rulers are not the elect ruled over, nor is the elect ruled the rulers. The kingly and priestly class are solely and exclusively the inheritors of the kingdom of God. The nations, Jew and Gentile, do not receive it as an inheritance, but are inherited by the saints, and walk in the glorious light of the metropolitan city, and live in peace and quietness under its protective influence. The rulers have all been made like the King of kings by the crown of life eternal: they are the resurrected and changed ones; these that have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb; these are the inheritors, these the inherited. These are permitted to enter through the gates into the golden paved city; these bring their riches and honor and their kings to it. God promised Abraham all the land of Canaan for a possession. It is his inheritance. He can go into the golden adorned New Jerusalem and merge his inheritance into possession. But there is no promise that the individuals resididing there at the same time shall go into the same city and obtain a patent for any part of it. Christ says: "Many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, but the children of the kingdom" (the Jewish nation were real inheritors as children, being the natural branches,) "shall be cast into outer darkness" (or the darkness outside of their legitimate, birthright position.) Matt. viii. 11, 12.

5. Law.

The law and word of the Lord will be the universal law during that age.

PROOF.—Micah says, (iv. 1, 2,) "But in the last days it shall come to pass that the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established in the top of the mountains, and it shall be exalted above the hills; and people shall flow unto it, and many nations shall come and say: Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord and to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways and we will walk in his paths; for the law shall go forth of Zion and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem," and the same thing is spoken by Isaiah in the second chapter second verse.

6. A capital

The restored, or New Jerusalem, will be the capital or chief city of the kingdom of God.

PROOF.—It is the point from which the law emanates as just shown by Micah iv. 2, and Isa. ii. 3, and Christ calls it the city of the great king, (Matt. v. 35,) and the throne of God and the Lamb will be in it. Rev. xxii. 3.

Before concluding, let us notice a few things concerning this city and its relation to the kingdom of God. In its inception the kingdom comprises only the metropolitan city, and none are allowed to enter into it save its own inhabitants, to-wit:

1. The righteous who lived prior to the beginning of the Christian era.

2. Christ and his apostles

3. Those accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection of the dead who lived during this age of the world.

All these by a change to immortality, or a resurrection from the dead to eternal life have parted with their flesh and blood (Adamic, earthy) nature, and assimilated the Divine or spirit nature of the Lord Jesus. All these are the inhabitants of the beloved city; all these are the world inheritors. They cannot die any more being angel—equals; neither will they sorrow, cry, nor suffer pain. They are the kings and priests whom John heard singing the song recorded in Rev v. 9, 10, and the great multitude of Rev. xix. 6, whose glad Alleluia rolled like the voices of many waters and as the voices of mighty thunderings, awakening the echoes of hill, vale and mountain crest, till Judea's repeopled land catches anew the glorious theme and acknowledges her new found fealty to God's law, and themselves the inheritance of the saints. The nations, Jew and Gentile, will suffer from sickness, decay and death during the millennial age, but a panacea is provided for their ailments in the leaves of the tree of life, which are for medicine, (Ezek. xl ii. 12,) for the healing of the nations. Re . xxii. 2.

Probation, as it is called, must continue, for Isaiah says, "the child shall die a hundred years old; but the sinner being a hundred years old shall be accursed." Chap. lxv. 20. Here is a discrimination between the sinner and the righteous of that day, and if that discrimination does not constitute probation, I fail to comprehend the meaning and application of the term. These glorious things are at hand.

Yours in the faith of the Gospel.

The Approaching End of Gentile National Supremacy.

BY REV. S. BONHOMME.

Our Lord Jesus Christ says, Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. Luke xxi: 24.

The following passages refer to the same event: Rom. xi: 25-27; Isa. lix: 20 lx: 1-2; Rev. xvi: 15-21; Ezek. xxxviii; xxxix; Dan. ii: 43—44: Zeph. iii: 8; Zech. xii, xiv; Joel iii: 9-21.

Great and beneficial changes are generally introduced by great and eventful commotions. This chiefly arises from the opposition made by the old state of things about to be superceded. In every new development of the plan of God, for the accomplishment of his purposes, "mercy and judgment ever went hand in hand."

1. The calling of Abraham and the birth of Isaac was coeval with the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah.

2. The exodus from Egypt was associated with the ten plagues, and the destruction of Pharoah's army in the Red Sea.

3. The settlement of the Jews in Canaan was associated with the extirpation of its inhabitants.

4. The establishment of David and his kingdom was connected with great wars.

5. The return of the Jews from Babylon was coeval with the fall of the Assyrian Empire.

6. The gospel dispensation was associated with the destruction of Jerusalem, and the dispersion of the Jews over the whole earth.

And the approaching coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, with all his saints, to establish his kingdom on this earth, stands associated, according to the afore-mentioned Scriptures, with the most terrific judgments ever visited on mankind since the flood.

It is evident, from the unerring word of God, that Christ will come personally before the millennium with power and great glory, and thus close the Gentile dispensation with the overthrow of all Gentile governments, without exception. Rev. xvi: 15-21. "For he shall put down all rule and authority," 1 Cor. xv: 23-24; and also all ecclesiastical rule, for the law shall go forth from Mount Zion, and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem, Mic. 4: 1-2. For the end of Gentile domination and the present dispensation will be succeeded by the nation of God's own choice, pre-eminently, when Jesus shall have come to make restitution of all things. Acts iii: 21. For Jesus shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first, and the living saints shall be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, all simultaneously to meet the Lord, and come down with him on Mount Olivet, "the glorified church of all ages." 1 Thes. iv: 4-18.

There is nothing more important at this crisis, than that we should understand the times as prophetically described as divided into four periods, distinguished from each other by the supremacy of four great Gentile kingdoms, which were successively to bear rule over the earth, and it is to Rome, as the last of the four and subsisting to the second coming of Jesus, that prophecy most particularly directs attention. Dan. vii 7-14.

Jesus is to sit upon the throne of his father David in Jerusalem, and reign over the house of Jacob forever. Luke i: 32-33. His twelve apostles shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging and administering justice to the twelve tribes of Israel. Luke xxii. 30; Matt. xix: 27-28. This will be the commencement of the millennium, the reign of Christ with his saints for one thousand years upon this earth. Rev. v. 10; xx. 6. When Christ introduces this glorious era, he is to establish the earth. Zech. xiv. 9. His righteous dominion is to be from sea to sea. Psa. lxxii. 8. War shall be abolished forever. Isa. ii. 4; Mic. iv. 3. All nations shall call him blessed. Psa. lxxii. 17.

It is supposed by the ministry in general, as they teach the people, that prior to the coming of Christ, the world must be converted, but there is nothing in God's word to justify such expectation held out to the churches of our day. On the contrary, Jesus is to find the world as in the days of the flood. Matt. xxiv. 37-38. Iniquity shall abound. Matt. xxiv. 12. A period of perilous times. 2 Tim. iii. 1-3 A church of false teachers. 2 Tim. iv. 1-4; 2 Peter ii. 1-3. A world of demon worshippers. 1 Tim. iv. A world of political intrigues; of ecclesiastical usurpers; a proud, covetous and dishonest world; a world and church to be punished with God's avenging judgment.

1. Jehovah is coming from his holy place to punish the inhabitants of the world. Isa. xxxiv. 1-3.

2. Fear and the pit and the snare. Isa xxiv. 17-23.

3. Behold evil shall go forth to the ends of the earth, and a great whirlwind shall be raised from the coasts of the earth, and the slain of the Lord shall be in that day from one end of the earth to the other end of the earth. Jer. xxxv. 30-33.

4. Behold a whirlwind of the Lord shall go forth with fury, a continuing whirlwind; it shall fall with pain upon the head of the wicked. Jer. xxx. 23.

5. Therefore wait ye upon me, saith the Lord, until the day that I rise up to the prey; for my determination is to gather the nations, that I may assemble the kingdoms to pour upon them mine indignation, even all my fierce anger, for all the earth shall be devoured with the fire of my jealousy. Zeph. iii. 8.

6. The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power, when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe (because our testimony among you was believed) in that day. 2. Thess. i. 7-10.

Now, beyond a doubt, this will be the closing scene of Gentile supremacy, and the close of the present gospel dispensation.

In this connection, let us look at the occasional judgments which have fallen on this land since the year 1832.

1. The cholera.

2. The great fire of 1835 in New York City.

3. The commercial revulsion about the same time.

4. The yellow fever.

5. The two periods of commercial revulsions of 1857 and 1860, in which nearly 10,000 commercial failures occurred, and some 400 millions of capital was wiped out of existence.

6. A gigantic civil war, in which the capital invested in slaves was destroyed, and every southern bank and insurance company ruined, all southern trust funds scattered to the wind, and the whole south left helpless and desolate—leaving our national government in debt over two thousand millions.

7. The great fire in Chicago, involving a loss of 200 millions; the great fire in Boston, involving about 100 millions; and notwithstanding the derangement of currency, the fluctuations of commerce, the depreciation of stocks, the destructions of confidence and credit, the scourge of civil war, the fearful ravages of diseases, the grasshoppers, the floods, the destruction of life and property, which ought to have administered a severe but righteous punishment, yet at this very day there is not a sign nor a proof that the public mind is cured, and that the people and the rulers have began to fear God.

("It is noted, says the Macon Telegraph, that tornadoes, cyclones, hurricanes, earthquakes, waterspouts, ballstorms, tremendous rains and floods, loud thunders, fearful lightning, blighting droughts, scorching heats and bitter colds, afflict the earth to an unusual degree. Nature sympathizes with the temper of man, which is fierce, belligerent and cruel. The milk of human kindness has run dry. The world ceases to run on the principle of sunshine and attraction, and is driven onward by the fierce energy of mutually repellant and hostile forces.")

No man can furnish a correct explanation of the facts of history, isolated as they seem to be, who does not regard them as parts of a vast system under the superintendence of the "One Presiding Mind," with one great plan extending over the entire race of man, and embracing all kingdoms, empires and lands. God selects his own time and way for adjusting the wrongs of earth and vindicating his honor.

In bringing this important subject to a close, we would say, there never was a period since the flood when men's habits were more profligate, dissolution of bonds and natural affections more prevalent, insubordination of children more notable, extravagance and luxury to such an alarming increase and unparalleled in the history of nations, and while the accusation of women's waste is true, men waste still more on fast horses, wines, clubs, etc. The increase of murder, incendiarism, vice, forgery, counterfeiting, burglary, fraud, theft and covetousness, is the peculiar characteristic of the present age. While the law of honor seeks satisfaction at the sacrifice of human life, for the most trivial affront, the common companion of a man's pocket is the revolver, pistol, dagger, or bowie-knife.

The dark spots in city life are intemperance and its effects upon men, women and children; profanation of the Lord's Day, and the social evil which is gradually undermining and corrupting the whole race. The audacity of crime now prevailing, destroying all security; the almost impossibility of convicting well-known criminals, and deprecated resorting to lynch-law, show the weakness of the tribunals, and of all subordinate officers of the law, and the right can only be vindicated by him who is to be revealed in flaming fire, taking vengeance upon the ungodly and those who do not obey the Gospel.

The evil of the present age is of the most positive kind. It consists in the absolute idolatry of sensual things and of material objects,—money, pleasure, ceaseless labor, either in acquiring or spending; a love of external show, a deification of man and woman, and a complete abnegation of God.—Prophetic Times.

EDITOR RESTITUTION.—Three weeks ago last Saturday I enclosed twenty-five cents to you, and ordered the RESTITUTION sent to the following address: N. C. Clark, M.D., Atchison. We don't get the paper, what's the trouble? may be you don't care to receive contributions of so small sums; remember the old saying, "Thankful for a little, the way to get more"—and I thought if he read it, twenty-five cents worth, he would renew when that expired. Some one, I don't know, nor have any idea who, some three or four weeks ago sent me a package of back numbers of the RESTITUTION, for distribution. Will you thank the party, for me, through your paper.

It appears, as I gather from marks upon my last, that, some one,—also to me unknown,—has renewed my subscription. You see I'm nearly smothered with obligations. I confess though' in this case, I'd like it if these friends would let one hand know what the other hand done. I see you weary of the has been long debate, upon the Ressurrection question, whilst I think the all essential of the whole arguement is to make sure in each individual case, that one is counted worthy to get up at the first call—yet I've been glad at different views, and seems all the views of every side— if the idea have been presented, and again, to use a Western phrase, its "mixed me." One writer brings plenty of texts, plenty of Scripture, in proof of his belief. O, he's all right: look at the Bible he's brought, the dead are not all raised: but in the same, or next week's paper behold! equally strong and Biblical proof that the dead are all raised. I'm left in the situation of a poor limb demented boy I know of that once heard a sermon that very much frightened him, (he'd been brought up a Catholic). He ran to my mother's house, a distance of two or three miles, burst in, "Oh! Mrs. Vickery, I'll give five dollars to know which is the right religion."

Although I have been more or less of a writer for the press, till a few years, (since which I've great suffering from brain congestion), you see now I pay no attention to law-editorial regarding manuscript.

Through disease, my mental powers have became much weakened I cannot commit, retain, or collect with any clearness; also the optic nerve is dreadfully injured: but if you manage, by procuring a skilled reader of ancient languages (he will think this Greek), to find out that Dr. Clark don't get his paper, and that you will oblige me by thanking some one for sending the papers, tell them I don't suppose but what every one went on a mission in less time than three days, and if my subscription lease is renewed—think him or her—why, if your lawyer makes out together from this these above-mentioned points my object in writing will be attained.

And now Mr. Editor, Mrs. Editor, and all the little Editors, would'nt it be nice to take a jant to the mountains, the breezy rocky's—take a nice rest in Atchison. I'll give you plenty of preachers favorite dish (fried chicken, you know). Mrs. Reed, write me what you think of my proposition.

I thought to address my two or three reasons for writing concerning the Dr.'s paper, my thanks, etc, upon a card. I fear the department has'nt issued quite large enough. But let this be my excuse. Whilst you are in the world, you will continue to be somewhat of the world, and a little something beside John 2d, and Luke 3d chap. 4th verse (don't think I've any idea what those verses read).

May meet acceptance with you if 'tis a cold one. Then, again, our Doctor, preacher, and our paper man, are always persons we talk to just as we do to "Our folks." Mrs. R., don't forget to write me. FANNIE L. WRIGHT.

Brother Reed:

Enclosed please find postal order for one dollar, for my subscription for the remaining six months. I would have sent sooner, but had no opportunity to get an order. I do not want to go without the RESTITUTION, as it is a very welcome visitor to us, and in its columns we learn how the cause prospers, and the views of the brethren on different subjects.

The faith is gaining ground in this part of Texas, (Webberville, Travis Co.) We meet every other Lord's day, to break bread in memory of our beloved Master. We are but five in number. Our veteran brother, John Oatman, aged 68, is with us. He was the first to proclaim the truth in Southwestern Texas, and though his memory is failing, and his body feeble, he still earnestly contends for the faith, and desires to obtain a resurrection from the dead. We all have to bear great persecutions, and though the Orthodox will not meet us in public, they call us all manner of names, and treat our faith with scorn. We thank the Lord we are accounted worthy to suffer for the cause, and this thought strengthens and sustains us. May we have our lamps trimmed and burning, so that when the King comes we will not be found wanting. From the present signs his soon-coming seems certain. Even so come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly.

Yours, looking for the King.

A. P. TUGWELL.

The Panama Star and Herald says that the circulation of counterfeit American half eagles has been more extensive than was generally supposed. These spurious coins are said to be of such perfect workmanship as to deceive the most acute observer. On May 25 the governor of Panama, with a body of police, went on board a steamer in the harbor and succeeded in capturing three of the most expert counterfeiters on that coast.

HOW TO ADDRESS LETTERS.

All business letters, or communications must be addressed as follows:—

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Indiana.

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means by this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

The Eastern Question.

This seems to be the great question of the day, and is viewed from many standpoints. Some look at it as a mere political struggle; others, from a commercial point of view; a few, like myself, from religious sentiment built upon the sacred Scriptures. I do not exclude the political and commercial side of the question, because they compose the shifting scenery of the drama, and are subordinate to the events they portray. I shall dwell upon the prophetic story; and premise that Divine prophecy is history foretold, and history is prophecy fulfilled. I shall not go beyond what is written for our learning, nor go beyond the lines of thought laid down for our guidance. In fact we are encouraged in this from the words, "The secret things belong to the Lord our God; but those things which are revealed belong to us and to our children for ever, that we may do all the words of this law." Deut. xxix. 29. History cannot be that lifeless series of events which recent historians consider it sufficient to enumerate. All nations reveal at every step the hand of God overruling events to subserve his great end. The history of the world should be simply the annals of the government of the Supreme King. As a case in point, see the nation of Israel: "When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel. For the Lord's portion is his people; Jacob is the lot of his inheritance." Deut. xxxii. 8, 9.

History, then, when rightly written, is but a record of Providence; and he who would read history aright, must read it with his hand constantly fixed on the hand of God. Every revolution in human affairs is, in the mind of God, a movement to the consummation of his great work by Christ Jesus, and his promises through him to his people Israel,—beloved for their fathers's sake. I take it then that the Turkish power has been so placed by the hand of God in history as to subserve his purposes with respect to the Jewish people; and not only so, but that the northern powers, with Russia as their center, and England, "who sendeth ambassadors by the sea," have been so located in the earth, to take an active part in the events looming up before us in the Eastern question.

The sick man of 1804 became convalescent after the war in the Crimea, but lately the malady has returned; a relapse which makes him sick unto death. He is too infirm to help himself, and even to keep himself in order. His friends in the north combine to help him out of his troubles, but the remedy to him is worse than the disease. They would act more honorably to say their object is his destruction; "wheresoever the carcase is, there will the eagles be gathered together." When our blessed Lord said this he was looking to the events of the present age. The emblems of the three northern nations now combining against the sick man are eagles.

Austria, which, through the Holy Roman Empire, dissolved in 1804, has inherited the Roman eagle.

Prussia, which bears the black eagle, of Brandenburgh.

Russia, who displays an eagle, borrowed, like the title Czar, from the Roman empire; and the white eagle of Poland gives domination to a Russian order.

Here then are the eagles gathering together through the scent of blood, and the dying carcass of the sick man is before them. Surely there is something significant in these words of our blessed Lord to his disciples. We turn back to the Old Testament Scriptures, and find one of these eagles,—addressed as the "chief prince of Meshech and Tubal." Ezek. xxxviii. The words of our authorized version are: "Son of man, set thy face against Gog, the land of Magog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal, and say, Thus saith the Lord God; Behold, I am against thee, O Gog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal." The marginal reading is, "prince of the chief." Biblical students and critics think the reading should be, "O Gog, the prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal." The point at issue on these two verses is the meaning of the word Rosh, translated "prince" in our version. Is it a proper or a common noun? The Latin Vulgate, followed by the Douay Bible, has it: "Pone faciem tuam contra Gog terram Magog principem capitis Mosoch, et Thubal;" but the LXX (according to Tischendorff's edition of the Vatican text,) stands:—στρεψον το προσωπον σου επι Γωγ, και την γην Μαγωγ αρχοντα Ρως, Μ. και Θ.

Not ρως, but ρωσ. If ρως is not a proper name it is nonsense, and the inference is, that the LXX. treated it as a proper name, and Tischendorff has sensibly printed it so. If this be the meaning of the text, it reads in the English, "The prince of Rush, Meshech and Tubal." A northern nation, then is here spoken of, and at once suggests Russia; and an examination of the associated names, Meshech and Tubal, does but strengthen this rendering. Meshech may be recognized in Moscow or Moskwa, and Tubal in Tobolsk, a Sclavonic termination in sk being added. Undoubtedly the Russians are mentioned by writers of the tenth century, under the names of Ros, dwelling to the north of the Taurus, and are described by Ibn Fosslan an Arabian writer of the same age, as dwelling on the river Rha (Volga). Gibbon says (chap. lv.) that as early as the eleventh century, there stood in the square of the Taurus, at Constantinople, a brazen statue, with ban equestrian figure, supposed to represent Bellerophon, on which was inscribed a prophecy, foretelling that the Russians in the last days would become masters of Constantinople; and Gibbon remarks on this, that "the present generation may yet behold the accomplishment of the prediction, of which the style is unambiguous, and the date unquestionable."

Well, we are one hundred years older now than when Gibbon wrote; and without laying undue stress on this curious old prediction, it affords matter for serious consideration at this ominous period. Mr. Elliott, author of the Horæ Apocalypticæ, informs us that when in Constantinople it was a common subject of talk in the Turkish coffee houses, that the Moslem crescent would be forced back in the latter days from Constantinople, first to Bursa, and thence to Damascus, and that it would then continue waning till the end of the world." Strange to say, that the great bulk of English Christians know nothing of these wars and rumors of wars; and, indeed, look upon them as idle tales, or the visionary ideas of some mad enthusiast. The commercial phase alone swallows up all the interest. England holds back and will not join the crusade against Turkey with the three northern eagles, and is applauded for it by commercial minds; but the fact is, God is holding her back until the time arrives when he will employ her fleets for the "outcasts of Israel" from all the places whither he has driven them. England's interests are mixed up with the question; and for this special time, when God "divided to the nations their inheritance," he set the insular bounds of England, that she might be ready to assist the "lot of his inheritance." The Lord's call to England, by the mouth of his evangelical prophet Isaiah, is plain enough. Bishop Horsley has translated the eighteenth chapter of Isaiah with his usual fluency and vigor. His "Critical Disquisitions" are well worthy of perusal. Bishop Lowth, in his prefatory remarks on the eighteenth chapter of Isaiah, says: "This is one of the most obscure prophecies in the whole book of Isaiah. The subject of it, the end and design of it, the people to whom it is addressed, the history to which it belongs, the person who sends the messengers, and the nation to whom the messengers are sent—are all obscure and doubtful." With all these doubts and uncertainties the good bishop's comments are of little value. On the other hand, Bishop Horsley translates from the original text with power, and comments accordingly:

1. Hot Land spreading wide the shelter of (thy) wings, which are beyond the rivers of Cush:
2. Accustomed to send messengers by sea,
Even in bulrush vessels, upon the surface of the waters:
Go, swift messengers,
Unto a nation dragged away and plucked,
Unto a people to be feared from their beginning hitherto,
A nation expecting, expecting, and trampled under foot,
Whose land rivers have spoiled.
3. All the inhabitants of the world, and dwellers upon earth,
Shall see the lifting of a sign, as it were, of a banner upon the mountains,
And shall hear the sounding as it were of a trumpet.
4. For thus saith Jehovah unto me:
I will sit still and I will keep my eye upon my prepared habitation
As the sparkling heat just before lightning,
As the dewy cloud in the heat of harvest.
5. For after the harvest, when the bud is coming to perfection,
And the blossom is become a ripe berry,
He will cut off the useless shoots with pruning hooks
And the hill shall take away the luxuriant branches.
6. They shall be left together to the bird of prey of the mountains,
And to the beasts of the earth,
And upon it shall the birds of prey summer,
And all beasts of the earth upon it shall winter.
7. At that season a present shall be led
To Jehovah of hosts,
A people dragged away and plucked;
Even of a people wonderful from their beginning hitherto,
A nation expecting, expecting, and trampled under foot,
Whose land rivers have spoiled,
Unto the place of the name of Jehovah of hosts, Mount Zion.

I give Horsley's translation of this interesting chapter in full; so that we can trace his opinion of the prophet's meaning in a general sense. It is plain that England spreads her wings beyond the rivers of Cush in Hindostan, and the countries adjacent: Cush being, as Horsley notes, "The land of Cush in Holy Writ, (commonly, but by mistake, rendered Ethiopia) is properly that district of Arabia where the sons of Cush first settled."

Since writing the above we learn from the East that the sultan, Abdul Aziz, has been compelled by the Softas to sign his abdication, speedily followed by suicide. The Daily News says that "the overthrow of the sultan is the death knell of General Ignatieff and Russian influence at Constantinople; and it will probably break up the triple alliance into fragments."

True, but the Oriental question is not settled, and the King of the North is free to act alone when his time comes; and, meanwhile, England is gathering her fleet together, to act her part in the coming events.—George Lloyd, in Rainbow.

"It was a prevailing opinion," said Bishop Horsley, in a note on this line, "among the early fathers, that Antichrist is to possess himself of the Holy Land, and that there he is to perish.

Science and the Sages of the Bible

We hold, that in its expressions, the language of the Bible has been, in a measure, prophetical of all the wonders which modern science has achieved. And there are pages in this venerable Book, whose meaning has been developed, verified, and fulfilled, by the progress of scientific discovery, as truly and signally, as any of its special predictions, by the events of history. Prophetically, it contains the history of all science, as it does the history of all the world.

To make good this assertion, let us select a few illustrations. For example, see how the first chapter of Genesis has enlarged itself to the vast compass of the geological ages, prior to the existence of man. A chapter swells into a volume; a single verse into the cosmogony of the universe. Does geology stretch our vision backward, across the countless ages of the past, as the telescope has already stretched it over the trackless fields of immensity? Does it call for myriads of years, in which whole families and tribes of plants and animals sprung into existence for a season, and then passed away from the earth, before man appeared upon the stage? This opening chapter of inspiration admits it all, covers it all, even seems to have anticipated it all.

Geology traces man back to the age to which the Bible refers him, and not one step farther: both agree, that it was late in the era of creation, before he commenced his wonderful career. Geology and Moses, also, unite in tracing the earth itself back to the very same point—"to the beginning," and the creating hand of Omnipotence. Geology does not tell us how long ago that first beginning was; nor does Moses. But geology and Moses are agreed in this—that there was a beginning somewhere—a Divine creation. The Bible is not any more sparing of time than is geology. It will allow all the time science asks for short of eternity; and geology herself will not allow that. Against the self-existence, or eternity of the material universe, science shuts the door as effectually as the Bible has done. All the vast epochs of organic life, whose history geology has discovered in the earth's strata, graven as with a pen of iron, and chronicled in the rocks forever—all the teeming domains of vegetable and animal existence, filling up those periods, whose perished forms, so long buried, have recently been disentombed—all these geology herself has traced to the hand of a Divine Author; and they serve the double purpose of magnifying the glory of the creator, while they illustrate the beauty, wisdom, and intelligence of of this venerable book.

Thus, in the light of geology science, we behold wonderous things in God's word, which otherwise we should never have known. Thus his science become an interpreter of revelation, making its word assume a new and nobler import, its facts a larger and more profound significance. In the light of geological discovery, how do all those pages rise into beauty and grandeur, which connect the origin of the earth with water on one hand, and its destruction with fire on the other! they seem, thus interpreted, to set before us three grand geological cycles; first, the "earth standing out of the water, and in the water"—the period of the pre-Adamic world; next the "heavens and the earth, which are now kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgement"—the present order of existence; and then the last grand era of a "new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness"—the consummation of all things. In view of such revelations, might we not even appropriate the exclamation of an apostle on another subject;—"Oh the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgements, and his ways past finding out!"

But in the light of astronomical science we have a still more remarkable illustration of the manner, in which the language of the Bible seems to have comprehended and anticipated all our discoveries. For example, hear what the Bible says, as to the shape and position of the earth. It was not known to have spoken on that subject at all, until a true astronomy gave us a light, by which to read understandingly, what it had said. And doubtless, there are many other subjects on which it has given utterance, which we have not yet light enough to read aright; which we now see, as through a glass darkly, but which a larger knowledge, hereafter, will enable us to see with open vision But what has it said about the shape and position of the earth?

Says the book of Job, "He stretcheth out the north over the empty place, and hangeth the earth upon nothing." Again, "He hath compassed (or encircled) the waters with bounds, until the day and night come to an end." Says Solomon, "when he prepared the heavens, I (wisdom) was there; when he set a compass upon the face of the deep;" that is a "circle," for such is the meaning of the word "compass" throughout the Bible. Says Isaiah, speaking of the Almighty, "He sitteth upon the circle of the earth."

How wonderful is this language! as remarked by another, it might be taken as a fit motto for the last treatise on astronomy, or an inscription for the Lord Rosse's telescope, or professor Mitchell's observatory. Did Job, Solomon and Isaiah, indeed know, that the earth was a circle—a sphere suspended over the empty place—hung upon nothing, in the fields of space? If so, they were far in advance of all men of their times, and they had more knowledge of astronomy, than the world has ever given them credit for. But if not, then what a proof is this, of an infinite intelligence, pervading their thoughts, and so shaping their words, as to so anticipate the discoveries of our times, without shocking the prejudices of their own.—Selected.

Paradise—an Earthly and a Heavenly.

"To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God."—Rev. 2:7.

The following interesting sketch of the finest floral garden in America owned by Henry Shaw, at St. Louis, Mo., is given in a St. Louis paper. The proprietor is a bachelor, with some peculiar whims and habits, and no heirs.

"He is a Scotchman, a millionaire, and some seventy-five years old. He has constructed the finest flower garden in the world. It has thirty-five acres in it, and is a gorgeous marvel of a garden. It has every flower in it obtainable over the world, that will live in St. Louis climate. It is a bewildering paradise of floral beauty. The flowers number by the millions. What it cost, no one can tell. Shaw himself don't know. It is threaded by walks and adorned with conservatories and hot-houses, full of the rarest exotics. A force of one hundred gardeners is needed to keep the place in order. Shaw, it is said, spends his entire income from his millions in keeping it up. He began the thing after the war, and for several years has opened it to the public. Hundreds of thousands of visitors resort to it. It is the chief attraction and curiosity for the stranger in St. Louis to visit. And strange to say, no police guard it, and no flowers are pilfered. This is the public reverence to the man's generous enterprise. We visited the elegant house at the head of the garden. A picture of Shaw represents him standing among his flowers. Two elegant portraits of beautiful ladies, in the garb of a past day, represent some of his female progenitors. A large book is kept there for visitors to record their names in. A curious feature of the garden is beds devoted to one flower. For instance: there is a large bed with every variety of cactus; another with hundreds of verbenas, and so on. Everything is in prodigal profusion."

A peculiar ambition surely. It will however distinguish him and make his name to be remembered. This splendid and costly garden is by him willed to the city as a public pleasure park, or paradise, on condition that the city binds itself to keep it up in full splendor. It is to be known as Shaw's Garden, to perpetuate his name, as he has no offspring to do it.

One better, and more able than Shaw, has willed us a much more valuable and beautiful garden, its acres comprising the whole earth, upon easy terms. Shall we fulfil the conditions, and rest in the future paradise? We may if we will. A sickly multitude daily gaze upon the exquisite loveliness and unsurpassed beauty of Shaw's garden, who must leave it to toil and die; but all that enter the future paradise will have upon their cheeks the roseate hue of health, in their frames an immortal vigor, and upon their brow the fadeless crown of unwasting life; and they will not be transient visitors, but dwellers in that lovely place. Well might John Wesley say, in his sermon on the New Creation, "The whole earth shall become a more beautiful paradise than Adam ever saw." It will be the perfection—the crowning consumation of God's great work in and for our world, which is beautiful in its ruins, as it groans beneath the curse, bearing upon the marred forms the footprints of beauty, and having the sure promise of redemption.—Our of the World's Crisis.

The visitor to the British Museum may now see (the Athenæum observes), in passing through the King's Library, among the curiosities exposed to view in the table cases a copy of the Indulgence issued by Pope Leo X. for the rebuilding of St. Peter's at Rome. This Indulgence was issued and printed in the year 1517, under the direction of Albert, Archbishop of Mentz and Magdeburg, and it was sold by John Tetzel and Bernardinus Samson as subcommissioners. The manner in which Tetzel carried on the traffic led, everybody knows, to the remonstrance of Luther and the Reformation. This document, printed on vellum, and on a single sheet, was purchased for the Museum last October. It is now placed in the King's Library, close to the original printed copy of the ninety-five theses against Indulgences and other Papal practices posted by Luther on the doors of the Church at Wittemberg on the 31st of October, 1517.

The Great Reward.

As I look over the papers, I now and then find offers of large rewards by injured individuals or communities, for the detection of offenders for the purpose of bringing them to punishment.

This stimulates the officers of justice, and sharpens the eyes of multitudes eager for the prize. I think it would not be amiss to offer rewards for turning thieves into honest men, drunkards into sober men, liars into lovers of the truth. It would argue great benevolence in the government to offer a handsome prize—some earthly and precious gifts—to those who should do the most to reclaim the vicious and make virtuous and happy men of them. But governments savor too much of vengeance. Their rewards are for the capture of the offender with a view to his punishment. This may be often expedient; but if they were to offer some handsome bounties for good done for the rescue of the degraded, and the recovery of the abandoned, I do not think it would be one of the causes of their ruin. There is a government I have read of that does this thing. I was struck with the chief magistrate's proclamation. I never read of so large a reward offered for any enterprise. Many of the subjects of that government had revolted, ill-treated the supreme authority, and did what they could to injure the public welfare. The head of the government offered a reward to any that should bring the rebels back, not for the purpose of punishing them, but for the purpose of making wise and good men of them. The object was not to imprison them, or put to death, or afflict in any way the revolted; but to do them good. This is so strange, that your readers will not be satisfied with my account of it, so I must give them the exact words: "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and that have many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever."

I think this is a very remarkable proclamation. The reward offered is large enough to meet any man's desire. "Shine as the stars!" People sometimes shine in gold lace, and glitter with diamonds and precious stones; but all this is pitiful compared with the stars—a lamp to the sun. And then to shine "forever and ever!" Gold may grow dim, diamonds perish; but here is everlasting brightness. And it is the brightness of moral excellence, and therefore, must be connected with happiness. We cannot predict the happiness of that pure and beautiful star; but that moral being, shining in the beauty of holiness for ever and ever, must have fullness of joy. This brightness is blessedness. But for what is this reward offered? For "bringing many to righteousness." Not for catching rebels and bringing them to punishment. Not for helping the hand of justice to overtake the vile and abandoned with the reward of their deeds. It is a plan of infinite love to stir up one mind to the making another happy. And if such an offer, a reward does not set men's hearts on fire with zeal to seek each other's holiness and happiness, it cannot be for want of the greatness in the reward. And if this does not make us think well of the Great King that makes the proclamation, what can? What will show that he cares for the welfare of men, if such an attempt to engage them in making others happy does not? He wishes men to be blessed by being turned to righteousness, and wishes to make them blessed by being the agents of such a change in each other. Brethren, let us all try to get the bounty offered. It will take us a good while to reckon up all the good of "shining as the stars for ever and ever." SAML. FRANKENBERGER, M. D.

Sir Isaac Newton had among his acquaintances a philosopher who was an atheist. It is well known that this illustrious man who takes the first rank as a mathematician, natural philosopher, and astronomer, was at the same time a Christian. He had in his study a celestial globe, on which was an excellent representation of the constellation and stars which compose them. His atheist friend, having come to visit him one day, was struck with the beauty of this globe. He approached it, examined it, and said to him, "Who made it?" "No one!" replied the celebrated philosopher. The atheist understood, and was silent.

THE RESTITUTION

PLYMOUTH, IND., ...AUGUST 30 1876

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

☞The Editor is to speak in Chicago next Sunday, morning and evening. Meetings will be at the corner of Robey street and Warren avenue.

☞An infidel lady writing to the Boston Investigator, of the death of her husband, states that he died as he had lived, "an Infidel Christian." Such remarks from those who believe in no God, but spell the word nature with a big N, excite a broad grin. An Infidel Christian is an unbelieving believer. This is a new sort of folks.

☞A correspondent in the Advent Review wants to know whether a Sabbath keeper can keep tavern also. The editor says they can, but he at the same time admits that they had better get some other employment. Now let some one ask whether Sabbath keepers can build fires on the Sabbath day. Under the law they could not. Wonder if our Seventh Day friends will not have some trouble about cold meals. Please see Ex. xxxv. 3.

☞In giving their reports of the success of the law, Sabbatarian preachers quite uniformly state that so many "decided to keep the Sabbath," or so many "resolved to keep the Sabbath." We have no fault to find with this, but it looks a little strange that no such report can be found in the New Testament. When Paul went to Corinth he said nothing about the Sabbath. The Gospel met with success in the different cities, but nothing is said about certain ones having "decided to keep the Sabbath." This omission looks rather strange when compared with modern Sabbatarian reports.

☞It is claimed by some that sin is the transgression of the law, and the law consists of just ten commandments. Let us look at this idea in the light of the facts. The apostle Paul states, in Romans 5th: "Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned: For until the law sin was in the world, but sin is not imputed where there is no law."

1. It will be seen by this that Adam was a sinner.

2. He was a sinner before the law was given in the days of Moses.

3. He did not transgress any one of the ten commandments when sin was brought into the world. He violated a special command and in this way death came into our world. It is plain, therefore, that neither sin nor death came by virtue of disobedience to either one of the ten commandments. This fact should not be overlooked.

Manuscripts.

There are several manuscripts on hand that would probably have appeared ere this if they had been written in a manner to be set up without copying. For ourself we have not been well enough to attend to this drudgery for two or three weeks. We have done more copying in the past than we can for time to come. We will get along as well as we can with those on hand, but we would recommend a careful study of the rules in regard to employing capital letters, as well as a constant reference to the Dictionary in the matter of spelling words. Some errors are, perhaps, unavoidable, but care will evade most of them, and save us a vast amount of labor and perplexity. We say to our brethren—write, but write in a plain full hand, and our compositors can eliminate trivial errors.

Peter's Burning Day.

It it sometimes said that Peter's burning day refers directly to the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, the Roman prince. This view has been sustained by quite a number of respectable writers, but without much plausibility. In order to sustain this view, the position has been taken that the phrase, "the world," means merely the Jewish world; and that the phrase, "heavens and earth which are now," means also the Jewish state. We have always been at a loss to know how any expositor could take such a position. A careful reading of the Scriptures will at once disabuse honest minds upon this point. Let us look at the subject in the light of the general question.

1. In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth. The phrase as here used, includes, at least, the whole earth.

2. The flood-epoch, is set down as the dividing line between the old world and what Peter calls "the heavens and the earth which are now." But the Jewish commonwealth did not come into existence until hundreds of years thereafter. It must be evident that Peter's second world began where the first ended. Now, as the Jewish state did not come into existence until a number of centuries after the flood, we must conclude that the second world is more extensive than the Jewish commonwealth.

3. It is conceded on all hands that the new heavens and earth are to be universal, and that the whole earth will be included in that sublime epoch when righteousness will fill the world as the waters fill the sea. If the first world means the whole fabric known as heaven and earth, and the new world means all the earth, must we not conclude that the second world or "heavens and earth," includes the whole earth? To us this argument is conclusive, and forever sets at rest the idea that by the second world Peter referred merely to the land of Palestine. The idea that the first and third worlds are general, and that the second is local, is most absurd.

Again, the new heavens and earth-state has not yet come, and yet it is claimed that we are eighteen hundred years this side of the second world. Is it possible that any one in his senses can believe that eighteen hundred years of our world's history is shut out of God's plan, and that they belong neither to the old or the new world? Must not the new world begin where the old one ends? If the old ended when Jerusalem was destroyed, did not the new begin then? If so, who would care to make the new heavens and earth a matter of hope? The facts are that the theory is at variance with the whole Bible, and dwarfs the whole plan of God into a mere system of foolishness. But with the idea that the three worlds are universal, all is plain.

The World.

Some teachers have gone so far as to argue that the word world, as used in the New Testament, means simply the Jews. It is stated in view of this idea that Jesus died for the Jews and not for the Gentiles. It is also claimed that the phrase "end of the world," means the end of the Jewish state. One error is quite sure to be fruitful in begetting others. If the phrase "end of the world" refers to the close of the Jewish state, and means no more nor less, then, of course, the mission of Christ came to an end in connection with the downfall of Jerusalem. But this phrase has a wider range of meaning than this. "The harvest is the end of the world," says Jesus. If this refers to the harvest of blood and war, and extends no further than the downfall of Jerusalem, how is it that John states that Jesus is the "propitiation for sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world." It is only necessary to inform the reader that this was written twenty years after Jerusalem was destroyed! See John ii. 2.

Question Answered.

A brother writes us inquiringly about the church and kingdom. He wishes to know whether the church is the kingdom etc. To us there is but one Bible answer and that is embraced in the following statement: The church, the cross, the suffering and the discipline, belong to this age or world, while the kingdom, the crown, the glory and the reigning, belong to the age or world to come. The mortal is now the immortal then. At present we have natural, then the spiritual. Between us and that next world, we have Messiah's coming and the resurrection of the holy dead. These events mark the ending of the now and the begining of the then. Paul is plain upon the point; "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God." 1 Cor. xv. The church is yet mortal, is yet flesh. When the immortal comes then the kingdom will come. The church, "heirs of the kingdom—is taught to pray for the kingdom to come." When this prayer is answered the kingdom will have come. The cross will be exchanged for the crown, the mortal for the immortal.

Centennial Paper.

The issuing of a double number of the RESTITUTION, and a surplus of extra copies of such number as a campaign document, depends upon the liberality of our friends. Some time ago we signified that one hundred dollars, at least, would be required to successfully carry out this enterprize. We supposed that we had one hundred brethren who would contribute the small amount of a dollar each for this purpose. Brethren here made a start, and a few from abroad responded to the call for assistance. The matter then came to a stand still. We lay this matter once more before our readers. To furnish every subscriber with two copies so that one could be given to candid readers, and the other retained, as well as to have a surplus for preaching brethren to distribute, would be not only a cheap means of disseminating the truth, but would undoubtedly tend to enlarge our subscription list. Get our brethren out at once in this matter, and make a centennial contribution to the cause for this specific purpose.

The Sabbath.—No. 2.

The following texts are adduced Sabbatarians, in proof of the perpetuity of the Sabbath through the Christian dispensation:

Christ said, "The Sabbath is made for man." Mark ii: 27. It is claimed that the noun man, having been used in an unlimited sense, denotes the whole race of men. We have shown that the same indefinite noun—as applied to the very people to whom the Sabbath was given, and for whom alone it was made. It was made for the same man who ate angel's food and who saw the face of the Elohim and survived. The Sabbath was made for man. So was circumcision, and all the Sabbaths and ordinances of the Mosaical system, made for man. They were not made, as before observed, for angels or beasts. But does this fact prove their perpetuity through the Christian dispensation. But it is further affirmed that the conclusion deduced from this fact, contains proof of the perpetuity of the Sabbath to the time Christ used this language: "Therefore" He says, "the Son of Man is Lord also of the Sabbath." He is not Lord, they say, to destroy, or abolish the Sabbath, but to protect, and preserve it, the same as He protects and preserves His people, whose Lord, He is also.

He gives this as the reason why He had the right as the Sabbath's Lord to set aside the law regulating the Sabbath, so as to justify His Disciples in doing that which was not lawful the same as Abiathar, the High Priest, had done in the days of David. Abiathar, being Lord of the law regulating the exclusive right of the Priests to eat the shew-bread, had a right to set aside the claims of the law, so that David, and they that were with him could do that which was not lawful, and yet be innocent. See Mark ii: 25, 26. If the Disciples had not done that which would not have been lawful, had not Christ set aside the claims of the law why did He give the example of law-breakers to justify them. The facts upon the face of this record are that the Disciples had violated the Sabbatic law, and were innocent, because Christ, as the Sabbath's Lord, had a right to subserve an institution which was made for man to the highest interests of men. But that all the laws and Sabbaths, annual and weekly, were binding until they reached their end, in the death of Christ, no one will deny. Again, the perpetuity of the Sabbath this side of the crucifiction of Christ, is argued from the example of the women who kept the Sabbath according to the law, while their Lord and Master was slumbering in the grave. We read, "And they returned, and prepared spices and ointments, and rested the Sabbath day according to the commandments." This example no more proves the perpetuity of the Sabbatic law, than the observance of the passover, and all the feasts of the Jews, by the apostles after the crucifixion, proves their pertuity. There is no evidence that these women had any faith in the resurrection of Christ, or the old constitution being superceded by the new. Indeed all circumstantial evidence is against it. They thought the soldiers had taken the Lord away, and they wished to know where they had laid Him. With such a faith they would of course observe the Sabbath, without any reference to its cessation, as they had been accustomed to do.

Again, it is claimed that our Savior taught the perpetuity of the Sabbath in the destruction of Jerusalem, by the following instructions viz: "But pray ye that your flight not be in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day." Matt. xxiv: 20. The Sabbath is here enumerated with other impediments which would intercept their escape, such as pregnancy, winter, etc. The Jews observed the Sabbath so strictly that they would not even defend their city on that day. Hence, for this reason, the Romans did most of their work in making a breach in their wall on the Sabbath day. With such facts before us it is plain that our Savior referred to the opposition of the Jews to their escape on that day, and not to the sanctity of that day, any more than the sanctity of the winter, more than any other season of the year. They were to pray that these impediments might not intercept their flight. Again, the example of the Apostles is adduced as indisputable evidence of the perpetuity of the Sabbath. The arguments from this point are two-fold. First, It is claimed that the Apostles often observed the Sabbath, and, second, they called it the Sabbath, and thereby, endorsed the idea formerly expressed by this word, and represented by his name. In reply, we admit that the Apostles called the seventh day the Sabbath, but we fail to find precept or example for the Apostles, or any one else ever having Sabbatized on that day. It is nowhere affirmed that the Apostles rested on the Sabbath day. And if such record could be found, it would no more prove the perpetuity of the Sabbath, than the fact of their having observed the passover, and Jewish feasts would prove their perpetuity. They call all the Jewish feasts by the same names by which they were known previously to their cessation. They also observed these feasts, not because they wished to bind them on others or to teach their perpetuity, but because they had been accustomed to do so.

The Apostles visited the Jewish synagogues on the Sabbath day for the same reason that we would visit the churches of the Gentiles on the first day of the week, viz: because they could obtain the ear of a larger number of hearers, that being the day on which they assembled. It may be affirmed that Paul preached to the Gentiles on the Sabbath day. It should also be remembered that the Gentiles, according to the margin, requested that the same words might be spoken in the week, or in the Sabbaton between the two seventh day Sabbaths. The same Greek word is translated Sabbath in Acts xiii: 42, which is translated week in Luke xviii: 12. The Gentiles wished Paul to preach the same words in the Sabbaton, or week between the two Sabbaths. The Pharisee is represented in Luke xiii: 12, I fast twice in the week, (Sabbaton). The simple fact is, that Paul preached on the Sabbath in the synagogue, and the Gentiles wished that the same word should be preached the following week. "And on the following Sabbath (Sabbaton, week,) almost the whole city assembled to hear the Word of God." "Diaglott." Or even if it had been the custom of the Gentiles, in Antioch, to meet with the Jews on their Sabbath, it would not prove its perpetuity. Acts xxi: 13; does not prove that there was no synagogue by the sea side. But even if it could be shown that the Apostles observed the Sabbath, it would no more prove its perpetuity than the fact of their having observed the Jewish feasts would prove their perpetuity.

The language of John in Rev. i: 10; is urged in proof of the perpetuity of the Sabbath. John says, "I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day." It is claimed that no other day is called the Lord's day. In 2 Pet. iii: 8; we read, "But beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night." Putting these two days together, we learn that the day of the Lord will be a thousand years long. There is no divergence in the import of the phrases, "Lord's day," and "day of the Lord." The Lord's children, and the children of the Lord are the same children. So the Lord's day, and the day of the Lord, is the same day. Paul, in his second letter to the Thessalonians speaks of the same day. He says, "For ye, yourselves, know perfectly, that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night." Thess. v: 2. This is the great and terrible day of the Lord of which Joel and Peter spake. Joel ii: 31. Acts ii: 20. This is the day appointed by the great God, in which His Son shall judge or rule the world in righteousness. Acts xvii. 31. John was carried forward in spirit, or vision, to the thousand years reign of Christ. See the twentieth chapter. The phrase, "in spirit," in the book of Revelations, always denotes a vision of future events. "And immediately I was in the spirit and behold, a throne was set in heaven, and one sat on the throne." Rev. iv: 2. This was evidently a pictorial representation of Christ sitting upon His throne, ruling the world in righteousness. "So he carried me away in the spirit into the wilderness; and I saw a woman sit upon a scarlet-colored beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns." xvii: 3. This vision related to an event at least five centuries in the future. Also chapter xxi: 10. "And he carried me away in the spirit to a great high mountain and shewed me the great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God." This city will be the metropolitan city of the Kingdom. The phrase, "in the spirit," in Rev. i: 10, is not an exception to all the occurrences of this phrase in the book of Revelation. "The phrase, "The Lord's day," or day," or day of the Lord, is never used with reference to the seventh day, in the teachings of Christ and His Apostles, unless this be an exception. That it is not an exception, it is evident from all the testimony going before, and from the verse immediately preceding it, in which he speaks of himself as the companion of all those who should suffer tribulation on account of the Kingdom; thus pointing forward to the Kingdom age, as the grand and glorious era, into which the Spirit had led him in prophetic vision.

A Brief Journal of Travels and Labors.

From Canton we sped our way as fast as the cars could take us for Toronto, Ontario, where we were to hold a public discussion with a Presbyterian minister by the name of Marpels. The discussion was held in Temperance Hall during the 26th, 27th and 28th of June—three sessions of two hours each, per day. Mr. Marpels affirmed the following:

1. The Scriptures teach that man possesses an immaterial entity called soul or spirit, which elevates him above the beast.

2. That this immortal entity continues conscious and intelligent after the death of the body.

3. That the punishment of the wicked will be eternal, and that this punishment consists in conscious misery.

Mr. Marpels is a gentleman of fair ability, but he was evidently not prepared for the work which he had with so much confidence assumed; for he was the challenging party. We have not space to give an outline of the arguments pro and con. They were such as are usually adduced in discussions on the nature and destiny of man. To say that he made a signal failure, will, without doubt, express the sentiments of mere truths of those who heard the discussion. Mr. Marpels did not inspire confidence in the members of his own church, much less in the members of other denominations. The result was, that nearly all who attended after the first night, were such as were interested in our side of this question. The attendance, though not large, was select; and a number of the same ones attended our subsequent meetings. Thus, we think that good will grow out of the debate.

A professed correspondent, but supposed to be one of the editors of the Globe, wrote an odoplandum appeal to prejudice, urging the adherents of Orthodoxy not to attend, or countenance such infidelity. The supposed author of this cowardly attack is a Presbyterian preacher of note and ability. The meetings were presided over by Mr Golden Smith, recently from England, an accomplished scholar and gentleman of fine ability. This distinguished gentleman presided with ability and impartiality, for which he has our thanks. At the close of the discussion, Mr. Smith made a neat speech, giving a cogent statement of our views, and denying the charge of infidelity which had been alleged by the Globe, and giving as a reason, that this charge is false, the fact that the Bible was the only arbiter in the discussion. This discussion, on our side, was gotten up by the Christadelphian church in Toronto, and carried on under its prestige. They have quite a congregation of intelligent believers, which convene weekly in their own house to expound the Word and commemorate the death of their absent Lord. Having been invited by the ecclesia, I spoke twice on Sunday for them. We were highly gratified with our visit, among our Christadelphian brethren. They treated us with kindness and hospitality, and communicated liberally of their means for our labors amongst them. We spent much of our time during our sojourn at the pleasant and quiet residence of Bro. Cleverdeu, eleven miles from the city. He and Bro. Coomb are whole sale dealers in crockery ware.

We shall long remember this excellent brother, his very kind family, and pleasant home. Our last meeting was held at his house. We talked to a small company of neighbors who paid excellent attention to the Word spoken. A number of our brethren from different parts of the Province were present during the discussion. We lectured on the purpose of God concerning man and earth the next evening after the conclusion of the debate,—a perverted report of which appeared in the Globe the following morning. The editor refused to publish a correction of the misrepresentation. The editor of the Mail consented to publish a synopsis of the original lecture. A short but fair report of the leading positions of both sides was published in the Mail, each day; thus evincing a spirit of liberality. Mr. Smith's speech was published in full, in the Mail. The Mail is ably edited, and worthy a liberal support. It is free from sectarian influence, which cannot be truthfully affirmed of the Globe with its vaunted professions of reform and liberality. The chief editors of the Globe are Presbyterians in faith, and intolerant and proscriptive in practice. Having been vanquished in a written discussion through their paper, they excluded articles on our side, and continued to publish slang and misrepresentations against our views without admitting correction or confutation. In addition to these discussions, two discussions had been delivered in favor of the monstrous doctrine of endless misery and replied to by the Hon. Mr. Hay, member of Parliament.

The Lord's Prayer.

This prayer is dispensational; and is given to all the co-heirs, co-kings and priests, with Christ, "The King of kings."

The entire Sonship, the subjects of "the heavenly calling" have this "fellowship with Christ." He has prayed to the great delight of the apostles: Luke xi. 1-4, and they desired instruction, and that they themselves might pray so to!

Hence as "The called, the chosen and the faithful," take up through this age the same prayer; it is the entire Sonship, in solemn, sacred "fellowship of the spirit;" praying that the Heavenly Father would show his good pleasure by giving them the kingdom.

"Hallowed be thy name." Let thy name be reverend and holy. But no one with his own Saxon English in him would exchange this "Hallowed;" for the corresponding word sanctifies of later derivation. Thus it is with hundreds of instances. Our native tongue and other things equal are better than any borrowed one, at every point of truth.

The first proper prayer, after a becoming word of reverence for God, as our "Father in heaven" is "Thy kingdom come."

This prayer, "Thy kingdom come," takes precedence; as in Gospel precept the kingdom has pre-eminence. Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness. All other things are made subordinate and secondary. This prayer and precept of Jesus agree with his example. His parables were closed and crowned with the kingdom. His theme for forty days between his resurrection and ascension was the kingdom. His prayer, his precept, and his example, thus concur to exalt the doctrine of the kingdom to come.

What then is the range of this prayer? "Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven.

Note. This embraces creation—Heaven and earth. Gen. 1. Its scope is to rid earth of sin and sinners; of rebellious men, and apostate angels; of death and him that had the power of death; that is the devil and achieve the regeneration—the new heavens and the new earth.

The Gospel is the goodness of the ultimate close of the kingdom of men, and the triumphant establishment of the kingdom of God over a renovated world. It will end in the restitution of all things spoken then to be consumated. When our Lord as the blessed and only potentate, shall have put down all rule, authority and power to the last enemy death: and God be all in all. 1 Cor. xv. 24-27.

This kingdom will come, however, at the last trump (the seventh) when the Divine kingdom will be heralded. The kingdoms of this world will (then) become our Lord's. He will take to himself his great power and be king. (Reign). Rev. xi. 15-18. Dan. vii. 14. 2 Tim. iv. 1-8. Psa. lxxii. 68. Psa. xi. 4-9.

It is to follow "the 4th"—the Roman, as that succeeded the "3d"—the Grecian. These great governments Dan. vii. do not exist as contemporary; but as they succeed each other in their order.

The Mohamedan power came up in the east to occupy the third part of the prophetic earth, as contemporary with Papal Rome. But at the time appointed, the time of the Gentiles end. And the set time comes to favor Zion. Psa. cxii. 13-22. Luke i. 31-33. Rom. xi. 26-29.

The Lord's throne (as revealed) is in Zion. Psa. cxxxii.

Let us all join to pray: "Thy kingdom come; Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven." That will be enough. Amen.

Report of Committee on Organization.

Constitution of the Christian Association of America.

ARTICLE I.—NAME.

The Association shall be called the Christian Association of America, and shall be composed of such persons and churches as accept the Bible as their only creed and Christian character as the only test of fellowship.

ART. II.—OBJECT.

The object of this Association is to secure a more perfect union and co-operation of the scattered churches of the Abrahamic Faith in the great work of preaching the Gospel and developing love, harmony, and unity, in faith and practice of the same; but is not designed to exclude united action on the part of churches in Canada or elsewhere for the purpose of local evangelization, but membership in this Association, contribution to its funds, and general co-operation in its plans and purposes are expected and requested of all churches of the Abrahamic faith in America.

ART. III.—OFFICERS.

The officers of this Association shall be a president, one or more vice presidents, a recording and a corresponding secretary and a treasurer, all of whom shall be chosen annually.

ART. IV.—THEIR DUTIES.

The duties of the officers of this Association shall be none other than those usually performed by such officers.

ART. V.—TIME OF MEETING.

This Association shall meet annually by delegates from the different churches composing it, at such times and places as it shall, from time to time elect.

ART. VI.—RATIO OF REPRESENTATION.

Each church composing this Association shall be entitled to one vote in its deliberations for ten members or less, and one for every additional ten members.

ART. VII.—UNION DELEGATES.

Two or more churches may unite in sending a delegate to the meetings of this Association, who shall then be entitled to cast as many votes as the churches represented by him are entitled to; and upon any question upon which they have instructed him how to vote, he shall cast the vote of each church according to its separate instructions.

ART. VIII.—PREACHERS, MEMBERS, BUT NOT VOTING MEMBERS.

All preachers of the Gospel who desire to unite with this Association shall stand connected with some local church of the Abrahamic Faith, and if of good standing in their respective churches, shall be entitled to a seat in this Association and a voice in its deliberations on presentation of their credentials signed by the proper officers of their churches, but none but regularly elected delegates shall be permitted to cast a vote.

ART. IX.—CREDENTIALS OF PREACHERS.

All preachers of the Gospel in good standing among us, shall hold credentials signed by the proper officers of this Association giving expression to that fact.

ART. X.—CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

The churches belonging to this Association shall be independent or congregational in their church government, and, as such, shall be entirely free in determining the times and places of their meetings; the time and manner of the celebration of the Lord's Supper; method of raising funds for the support of the Gospel, or caring for the poor, and in all other matters pertaining exclusively to the local church.

ART. XI.—PAPERS.

The weekly paper known as the RESTITUTION, published by the Christian Publishing Association, at Plymouth, Ind., shall be regarded and recognized as the public organ of this Association.

ART. XII.—HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.

The management of the missionary work to be done by this Association shall be committed to a board of directors, which shall be called the Home Missionary Board, composed of ten persons besides its officers.

ART. XIII.

A quorum for the transaction of business by this Association shall be not less than ten voting members.

ART. XIV.—ITS DUTIES.

The duties of the Home Missionary Board shall be to receive and consider all calls for missionary work; to employ laborers in that field, to assist public churches; to receive and disburse all monies devoted to that object, and in general to advance the cause of Christ by any and every means in their power as they shall elect, pastoral work alone excepted.

ART. XV.

Its officers shall be a chairman, a clerk, a corresponding secretary, and a treasurer, and shall be elected annually.

ART. XVI.

The business agent of the RESTITUTION shall be ex-officio chairman of the Home Missionary Board, and shall preside at all of its meetings, sign all orders on its treasurer, call special meetings of the board at his pleasure, and in general to perform all duties usually discharged by such officers.

ART. XVII.

The duties of the clerk are to keep all records of the board, issue by direction of the chairman all calls for extra meetings of the board, etc.

ART. XVIII.

The corresponding secretary of this Association shall be ex-officio corresponding secretary of the Home Missionary Board, and shall attend to all correspondence relating to that interest, receive all calls for missionary work, etc.

ART. XIX.

The treasurer of the Christian Publishing Association shall be ex-officio treasurer of this Association, and also of the Home Missionary Board and shall give such additional bonds for the security of its funds as the board may require.

ART. XX.—TIME AND PLACE OF MEETING.

The Home Missionary Board shall meet annually at the time and place of the Christian Association of America, and furnish an annual statement of its officers for the approval of that body.

ART. XXI.—FUNDS—HOW RAISED.

Funds for carrying on the work of the Home Missionary Board may be raised in the following manner:

1. Immediately after the adoption of this constitution, each church, at its next meeting, and at regular intervals thereafter as each church may elect, not exceeding three months, shall take up a public collection for this purpose after giving due notice thereof, or shall devote a certain amount of the regular funds of the society to this end as they may elect.

2. It shall be the duty of every isolated person who is in sympathy with this Association to regularly contribute to its funds as the Lord prospers them.

3. It shall be proper for this board to receive bequests or donations from any person or persons, disposed to assist it in its labors whether they are members of the body of Christ or not.

4. Any person paying into the treasury of the Home Missionary Board $10 shall be an annual member of the same, and shall have a voice in its deliberations.

5. Any person paying into the treasury of the Home Missionary Board $100, shall be a life member of the same, and entitled to a voice in its deliberations.

ART. XXII.

All monies for the Home Missionary Board shall be paid directly to its treasurer, who shall receipt for the same, and report the amounts received and disbursed, in a monthly report in the columns of the RESTITUTION.

ART. XXIII.

Any person who shall be employed by the Home Missionary Board in the work of evangelization, shall receive compensation at the rate of not more than $2.00 per day for his time; but any funds received from other sources while engaged in the employ of the board, he shall not be under obligation to report.

ART. XXIV.

It shall be the duty of the board to employ any efficient brother who shall be in good standing among us, in the missionary work, who shall be recommended for the same by the church or churches nearest the locality of the work to be done, if in their judgment the cause can be best promoted by so doing.

ART. XXV.

A quorum for the transaction of business by the Home Missionary Board shall be not less than a majority of its members.

ART. XXVI.

This constitution may be altered or amended by a two-thirds vote of all the churches composing this Association, in regular conference assembled.

J. F. WILCOX,
H. V. REED,
J. M. STEPHENSON,
E. MILLER,
A. D. ESHELMAN.

As will be seen by consulting the conference minutes, published in last week's issue, the above report is submitted to the brethren for their consideration. It is requested that each congregation take action on it by adopting in whole, part, or rejecting as they may think proper, and forward such action to me, which will be filed for consideration at the general meeting to be held at Plymouth, Ind., commencing the 28th of December next. I suggest that the report be criticised and acted upon article by article, as this will preserve order and convenience.

G. M. MYERS.

Both Sides.

EDITOR OF RESTITUTION: Will you kindly allow me a small space in your intelligent paper for the vindication of the truth, in regard to some assertions made by Bro. Wilcox in the RESTITUTION of July 5th, 1876.

First he said that the Methodist and Congregational churches take the lead here which I would not deny if there were a Congregational church here. He further adds that the Disciple or Christian church are, or were, at one time numerous and active. It appears that Bro. W. would like to impress on the minds of the readers of the RESTITUTION that the Christian church here is retrograding. This insinuation is not correct.

The church referred to here at the time referred to was larger in number than it ever was before, and was in a prosperous condition. In regard to the choirmen one of them was undoubtedly in sympathy with Bro. W. and as for one being a Free Mason there was one. He is a man who is esteemed for his honor and integrity. Bro. Kendall referred to is not a member of the Christian church, as I know by his own writing with his own name signed, and he is in full sympathy with Bro. W., as to the achievements he accomplished in falling down the bulwarks of error and delivering many joyful captives. Our perceptive powers are not keen enough to perceive it. Yours in love of friends and truth. W. W. FOSTER.

A FEW WORDS TO BRO. FOSTER.

The Presbyterian and Congregational church only differ from each other in matters of church government and are frequently confounded. In Wisconsin the two bodies so far coalesce that they formed for many years but an association, and the same is true of the two churches in many other places.

To call a Presbyterian church Congregational or vice versa, therefore would not be such a departure from the truth as to require vindication at any ones hands; but to deny that there is a Congregational church in your town, without stating that there is a Presbyterian church instead, stands in need of correction.

As to the statement concerning your society, (the Disciples) the sentence you criticise stands thus: "But the Disciples are, or were at one time, numerous and active, proselyting and belligerent."

The phrase "or were at one time," seems to have given you offence.

I do not care to enter into a controversy with you as to the relative prosperity of your society before and after the debate. I wish it no ill, but bid it God-speed in so far as it is faithful to the truth; but when it clashes with the truth I prefer to see the truth conquer. It might have been far more numerous if it had been more faithful, and instead of seeing many of its best members either withdraw in sorrow, or be expelled for heresy, it might have gone on conquering and to conquer, as in its best days. Simple liberty of speech is not much to grant men and women against whom no dog can wag his tongue. As to Free Masons and secret societies, men generally in sympathy with my opponent. I am glad you do not venture to deny so plain a fact. It is my experience with human nature that man entertains prejudices that they are not aware of, and are extremely biased when they think themselves perfectly fair. A wise judge knows better than to accept a gift, and herein lies one of the principle objections to secret societies. They blur the judgment like a bribe, and judges and jurors decide unfairly without being conscious of it. The fair-minded and popular gentleman to whom you refer was not conscious that his judgment was warped by his knowledge of the fact that my opponent was his superior in the Masonic fraternity, and would doubtless repel the charge with indignation, but the fact remains the same nevertheless.

It is also true that religious bigotry is more fatal to justice than perhaps any other failing of man and is as greatly to be deplored but a man may be religious without being a bigot. As to the doctor's being in undoubted sympathy with Bro. Wilcox," I am glad to know that out of the three chairmen who were members of your church, I had the sympathy of one of them. The doctor's genial and portly physique was very ornamental and appropriate in the chair, but alas was of short duration. I am glad to know however, that his sympathies are becoming more provincial as light dawns on his mind, and believe that his modesty would not again compell him to vacate a position to which he proved himself more ornamental than useful; as the doctor you must remember refused to take the responsibility of a decision.

In regard to Bro. Kendall if he was not then and is not now a member of the Disciple church, I am not responsible for the error, as I know nothing more on the subject than I stated in the article criticised. And finally I am willing to let time and your own honest convictions sharpen your perceptive powers sufficiently to enable you to see clearly when you now only "see men as trees walking."

Yours as ever, in the love of Truth,
J. F. WILCOX.

Napoleon on the Divinity of Christ.

Canon Liddon, in his Bampton Lectures for 1866, gives, with the authority for it, the following account of Bonaparte's sentiments on this subject, expression in St. Helena:—"When conversing, as was his habit, about the great men of the ancient world, and comparing himself with them, he turned it is said, to Count de Montholon with the inquiry, "Can you tell me who Jesus Christ was?" The question was declined, and Napoleon proceeded. "Well, then, I will tell you. Alexander, Cæsar, Charlemagne and myself have founded great empires, but upon what did these creations of our genius depend? Upon force. Jesus alone founded his empire upon love, and to this very day millions would die for him. . . I think I understand something of human nature, and I will tell you all these were men, and I am a man; none else is like Him; Jesus Christ was more than a man. I have inspired multitudes with such an enthusiastic devotion that they would of died for me, but to do this it was necessary I should be visibly present, with the electric influence of my looks, of my words, of my voice. When I saw men and spoke to them, I lighted up the flame of self devotion in their hearts, * * * * * * * * * Christ alone has succeeded in so raising the mind of man towards the unseen, that he becomes insensible to the barriers of time and space. Across a chasm of eighteen hundred years Jesus Christ makes a demand, which beyond all others is difficult to satisfy. He asks for that which a philosopher may often seek in vain at the hand of his friends, or a father of his children, or a bride of her spouse, or a man of his brother—he asks for the human heart: he asks to have it entirely to himself: he demands it unconditionally, and forthwith his demand is granted. Wonderful! In defience of time and space, the soul of man, with all its power and faculties, becomes annexation of the empire of Christ. All who believe on him, experience that remarkable, supernatural love towards him. This phenomenon is unaccountable; it is altogether beyond the scope of man's creative powers. Time, the great destroyer, is powerless to extinguish the sacred flame; time can neither exhaust its strength nor limit its range. This it is which proves to me convincingly the Divinity of Jesus Christ.—Christian.

DIED.

To the Restitution:

This is to inform you of the decease of our friend and brother, Amos Sanford, after an illness of about three months, suffering with congestion of the lungs, brought on by over exertion to the calvitary. He died at home, surrounded by his family—wife and six children—and buried in the faith in which he spent his life to proclaiming. A few minutes before the death, he called his family to his bedside and implored them to live steadfast and meet him in the first resurrection. Fully conscious that his time had come, he made the following selections of Scripture, and marked them in pencil, with a request that they should be read at his funeral service: 1 Cor. xv. 1-4 11; Psa. liv. 15. He also selected the following beautiful music to be sung found in Hymns of the Morning, p. 44, "Jesus is coming again" and p. 196, "Comfort in Affliction;" and "His coming," p. 16 of supplement. Rev. Minton, Presbyterian minister of this place, read the above selections of Scripture, and the music was sung by a select choir, after which the funeral services were concluded.

Mrs. Sanford desires to return many thanks to kind friends for benefits received, and now that her husband is taken away, she desires that she be not forgotten, but that the kind sympathies of the brotherhood be still extended to her in her bereavement.

A FRIEND.

ANNA, Illinois, August 22, 1876.

Brother Reed:

Allow me to communicate to the household of faith the sad news of the death of Clara Brown, age nearly thirteen daughter of Brother Malcholr and Sister Elizabeth Brown. On the 13th of August 1876, about 2 o'clock p. m., she and her younger brother crossed over Wolf River to gather berries in their absence the water rose over the bridge about ten inches. She attempted to cross, but a plank being gone, she thought to avoid the vacancy, but missed her footing, and was swept away. Diligent search was made till the 19th, at 12 o'clock m., when the body was found about eighty rods below the bridge.

When I beheld the deep, deep grief of the parents and family it felt like exclaiming, with Isaiah, "Oh that thou wouldst rend the heavens that thou wouldst come down."

Yours, in hope. J. P. BIRKEN.

BUSINESS DEPARTMENT.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

O. M. Myers will visit for the purpose of holding meetings—

Henry Meadmore's neighborhood, 10 miles S. E. of Warsaw, Ind., Sept. 2 and 3.
Bluff, Ill., Sept. 9 and 10.
Lanark, Ill., Sept. 16 and 17.
West Irving, Iowa, Sept. 21—23.
Jamestown, Mich., Sept. 29 to Oct. 7.

W. J. R. Feemlesone will visit Marmont for holding meeting, Saturday evening, Sept. 2, and on Sunday, Sept. 10, Parker's school house and have a basket meeting.

There will be a quarterly meeting of the Michigan conference, at Jamestown, commencing Friday evening, Sept. 29, and continuing over Sunday.

Brother H. V. Reed and Brother O. M. Myers have agreed to be in attendance. A full attendance is earnestly solicited. Those coming from the south on the G. R. & I. R. R. will stop off at Rose, at about 6 p. m. Those coming from the north will take the Chicago & M. L. S. road at Grand Rapids at 11 a. m., and stop off at Hadsonville. Teams will be at the station on Friday, at the time of the arrival of the trains to convey to the place of meeting.

By order of the Ex. Board.

JOEL A. SIMONDS.

The annual conference of the Church of God in Iowa will convene at Ivesdale, Tama Co., Iowa, on Thursday evening, Sept. 21, 1876, and will continue over the following Sabbath. Those wishing to come by rail will stop off at Belle Plaine, where they will find teams to convey them to the place of meeting. Come, brethren, to this meeting, and let us all know by our works that we have a faith that works by love and purifies the heart. Then let us never forget, if our mission is to do good, that love is greater than faith or hope.

J. T. PRICE, President.
JOHN FREES, Secretary.

Seeing by the recent letter of Brother Wilcox, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, that the church of Christ in that city find it impossible under the circumstances in which they are placed, to a certain the annual conference in their city, the church at Baltimore has resolved to invite all those of Brethren in faith who have been baptized believing in the Gospel of the Kingdom of God, to meet in our city (Baltimore,) to break bread with us and drink wine in celebration of the death and resurrection of our Lord on the first Sunday of October. Meeting of the brethren will commence on the Saturday afternoon previous, September 30.

We especially hope that the brethren on the Atlantic coast will make an EXTRA EFFORT to attend these meetings. The date mentioned has been decided upon that those of our brethren and sisters from the Western states who purpose visiting the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia may have an opportunity to arrange their visit so as to pass through to Baltimore to attend these meetings. We trust that all that can come will come, and we will spare no pains to make their stay pleasant and profitable.

It is very important that all brethren coming to these meetings should communicate their intention at least three days prior to September 30, that the proper arrangements may be made for their reception; also what train they will arrive on, that we may meet them at the depot. Please address all such communications to T. F. Wells, Engraver, 212 W. Baltimore Street, Baltimore where also any stranger brother may come if not met at the depot.

N. B.—Brethren coming in will recognize those who are waiting to receive them at the cars by a strip of white ribbon attached to the lapel of the coat.

J. F. GRUELICH,
Secretary of the Conference.

Centennial Number of the Restitution.

It has been deemed best to issue a Centennial number of the RESTITUTION, wherein is to be set forth our faith and hope upon the great questions of Bible truth. Those who have heretofore contributed to the Tract Fund, will find the amount credited under this head. It is to be hoped that every brother will give something toward this laudable effort to let the light of the glorious Gospel shine into the hearts of men. No people have as much truth and do so little. Why is it? Let every one do his duty. God will bless you.

Valuable English Works.

Our readers are informed that we expect shortly to have for sale the works mentioned below. Orders and remittances for the same may be sent at once to this office.

Discussion on the State of the Dead. Between the Rev. W. C. Bradman, Congregational minister, and W. Kellaway, editor of Bible Echo, and minister of the Gospel. Bath of England. The propositions discussed were: 1. That the dead exist in a living, conscious state after their decease. Affirmed by W. C. B. 2. That the Scriptures teach that men in death are wholly unconscious, insensible, and unable to perform any act whatever; and that they rest in darkness, silence and the dust. Cloth, bevelled boards, well bound, 35c; postage 10c. Paper cover, 25c; postage 5c.

Doctrine and Relations of Future Punishment. By Rev. R. Constable, M. A. late Prebendary of Cork, Ireland, 320 pp. An elaborate argument touching the punishment of the unsaved. It is particularly fine in its philological chapters respecting the meaning of the Greek words used by the inspired writers to indicate the doom of the lost. Price $1; postage 12c.

"We hail this book with lively satisfaction. Undoubtedly the subject which it treats with such an attractive combination of learning and modesty of power and reverence, has held hold of the minds of many of the most thoughtful Christian men of our day. Its growth, from a pamphlet in the first edition to a handsome volume of three hundred and thirty pages in the fourth, is conclusive proof that the question discussed is one of profound importance.....We trust the compliment this publication on the tasteful and handsome dress to which they present the book to the public, and express the hope that the necessary outlay will speedily be much more than recovered by the large sale of a work which must take a standard place in this painfully neglected department of Christian theology.—The Rotherham.

Hades; or, The Intermediate State of Man. Crown 8vo, 2d edition. Price $1.25; postage 15c.

This work presents the Bible doctrine of the state of man between death and the resurrection.

"Mr. Constable has, in a series of works, devoted much labor and research to establishing from Scripture and other sources the real nature of the future state; and the present book is the result of his more exhaustive labors on one special point. His argument is supported by no little learning, a keen logic, and clear and available style. There is a good deal to be said for the general doctrine propounded."—Nonconformist.

"It is characterized by his usual vigor of thought and clearness of expression. To all who are lovers of truth, rather than of tradition, we cordially commend the treatise."—The Church Messenger.

Bible Echo. Volume I., May to December, edited by W. Kellaway. The only English weekly that advocates the ancient Gospel. Bound volume of numbers of the Bible Echo, containing important papers and discussion on vital matters, and the news concerning the spread of the scriptural doctrine of immortality. Price $3.75.

Bible Echo. Vol. II., January to June, 1875. This is a continuation of the above for the period stated. Price $2.

Bible Echo. Vol. III., July to September, 1875. This completes the Bible Echo as a weekly newspaper, and also finishes the old series. Price $1.50.

Bible Echo. New Series. Monthly numbers from October, 1875. The yearly subscription for this magazine, including the 9 months of last year, is $2 50.

Some Facts Upon all Subjects. By the author of "Esquire Within Upon Everything." Useful to the physician, the artist, the chemist, the engineer, the manufacturer, the agriculturist, the student, and in the housekeeper. 320 pp. Price 50c; postage 10c.

A New Work by Mrs. H. V. Reed.

Earnest Words for Honest Skeptics. Nearly 200 pp. Well printed on heavy toned paper, neatly bound in cloth. Price 75c; postage 12c.

"This book is one of the most satisfactory of its kind that could be written; indeed we know of no matter in which we are pleasing to those who see the necessity of substituting the Bible as a revelation from God. We would be more than content, we would be proud, if the title page bore our name instead of that of the estimable and talented lady, the authoress. Her "Bible Triumphant" was a good work, and it is, we know, warmly appreciated by many. But this work, compact, as forcible, as convincing, it must be hard to guess where its success will stop. Everybody should possess a copy."—El Dorado Echo.

Bible Proper Lord. A new supply to our pocket. Price, paper covers, 50c; cloth 75c.

There is Left the Way of Prayer.

Oh the is a power in hope and faith,
That works when all else fails.
It reaches even unto death,
And then by might prevails.
When all the measure of life is spent,
And no relief is there;
When gold, and friends and strength are rent
There's left the way of prayer.

When dangers unforeseen arise,
And often they will come,
And threats all our desire oppose,
Our relationship, life and home;
And though our hope appears to die,
Our brother shut in despair;
There's but a Saving Power on high,
That can be reached by prayer.

We often plead we cannot lend
To charity our aid,
Nor duty minister as we want believed
Life's light to every shade;
Though calm no goal where to relieve
Life's miseries and strife;
Yet, if we've nothing else to give,
We give the aid of prayer.

"Ask, and ye shall receive," are words
That were not said in vain;
By prayer we at the heavenly door,
That reach to earth again.
These words in faithful recess set,
Most wondrous fruits will bear,
For time never left unchance. Yet
An earnest, heartfelt prayer.

It's a consolation sweet
This blessed truth to know,
That when life's ocean we've passed o'er
We have a place to go.
Where all sorrow we calmly rest
From sorrow, sin and care:
Where heaven's glory is ever possessed,
Via fervent and in prayer.

Cave of Machpelah.

The point of greatest interest about Hebron is the field and cave purchased by Abraham from "Ephron the Hittite," as a place of sepulture for himself and family. There can be no reasonable doubt in reference to the locality of this tomb: all history and tradition fix it exactly where pointed out, within the walls of the great mosque, which the Mohammedans guard with religious jealousy as one of their four holy places, and is known among them as the Harem, or "Castle of Abraham." The name Machpelah would indicate a double, and were told by the sheik of the mosque—a personal friend on whose word we could rely—that under the elevated platform of the Harem there under the elevated platform of the Harem there were two large natural grottoes, one above the other, that the patriarchs and their wives were buried in the lower one, and that the upper one also was full of human bodies, which is more than probable as it was the custom of the old Israelites to gather the bones of their forefathers from all parts of the land and deposit them in or near this mausoleum of their great ancestors.

The walls enclosing this sacred spot tower above anything else, and are the most conspicuous objects in the city. They are about seven hundred feet in circuit, ornamented with pilasters without capitals, and of great strength; agreeing in every respect with the description given by Josephus, and are evidently of Jewish or Phenician workmanship. Jewish tradition attributes them to David, which is very possible, as this was his royal city, and the capital of Judah, down to the capture of the "Castle of Zion from the Jebusites.

The mosque which stands at the southern end of this enclosure, appears to have been built for a Christian church, during the Justinian age, and without doubt covers the tomb that contains all that remains on earth of the chosen progenitors of the nation, through whom in the fullness of time, came the Messiah of our world. Christians are not admitted into the cave, scarcely allowed to touch the outer wall, and the Mohammedans, owing to their great reverence for the dead, connected with a superstitious dread of the place, never or seldom enter it. Many, entertaining the idea that whoever attempts to intrude will be struck instantly with blindness or death.

The question, as to whether the embalmed body of Jacob is still here, must for the present remain unsettled, as we have no reliable account of any one ever going beyond the entrance to the cave, and no one is likely to do so soon, as the door leading to it is now securely closed. The Prince of Wales and a few others, have been admitted into the mosque, but no further. The six cenotaphs here seen, are nothing more than coffin shaped shrines representing the real tombs that are in the cave below. The first you come to on entering the mosque, in a little chapel to the right right, cased with marble and closed with silver gates, is the shrine of Abraham; and directly opposite to the left, Sarah's, in a similar chapel, both covered with green drapery embroidered with gold. Two other chapels, near the center of mosque, contain monuments of Isaac and Rebecca. The shrine of Jacob and Leah are in a cloister opposite the entrance, at the farther end of the court. A small hole in the marble floor near the shrine of Abraham through which a lamp is suspended, said to be kept constantly burning, is the only opening into the cavern below. Thousands of prayers written on little slips of paper, are thrown down this hole, under the superstitious belief that all prayers offered here will be surely answered. At the other end of the mosque, in the door to the right of the cave, is a marble trap-door, large enough to admit a man, and apparently leading to the cave below. This door is now closed with iron clamps, and concealed with Persian rugs. The probability is, a stair-case leads from here down to the tomb, but is no longer used. All the natural features of this locality, together with the moslem traditions concerning these shrines, and the religious awe with which they approach them, agree remarkably with the Biblical narration, and it is impossible for the devout mind to contemplate the events that have here transpired, without feeling the force and truth of the Psalmist's declaration, "Surely, the righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance."

As we sat in a grove near the city, under the shade of an olive tree, absorbed in meditation, what recollections of the past were awakened. There was Mamre the favorite camping ground of the patriarchs, and where the Chaldean shepherd sat in the door of his tent, and served his hasty meal in the cooling shade, to the angels who honored him with their visit. Down the valley yonder, winds the path along which Joseph the Hebrew must have gone, after being sold by his brethren to the Midianites. And down the same valley of Eshcol, Jacob also, in after years, must have journeyed on his way to Egypt, to see his long lost son. Here too, by the roadside, is an ancient pool, looking old enough to be the same over which David caused the murderers of Ishbosheth to be hung. And just beyond the pool on the hill-side facing the west, is "the field of Ephron," and cave of Machpelah probably the only piece of ground Abraham ever owned in fee, purchased as a family tomb on the occasion of Sarah's death, she being the first to occupy it; then Abraham himself was buried here. His sons Isaac and Ishmael performing the ceremony. Next, in a good old age, Isaac was gathered unto his people, and buried here with his parents, and after him Rebekah and Leah were laid in the shades of this same tomb. The last solem service of this character performed here, excelled all others in magnitude and pomp. Jacob had gone down to Egypt and become the father of a numerous family. Joseph was next to Pharaoh in position, and when his father died there was great lamentation, the highest honors were paid Israel, his body was embalmed, and with all the pageantry of royalty, attended by horsemen, chariots, and a great multitude of mourners, they brought his remains up to Hebron, and laid him with his kindred in the cave of Machpelah, where possibly, his body may yet be found undisturbed and uncorrupted.—DeHass.

National, Not Individual Probation in the Millennial Age.

Allow me to save time and space to your intelligent and zealous correspondent, "J. M. S.," by correcting his error in supposing that I denied, in my previous articles, on his "Fair Chance" theory, that the nations would be put to the proof and required to decide "under which King" they would serve, after our Lord comes to reign in his kingdom. I believe with him in the everlasting Gospel being announced to every nation under heaven, and if he will pause and consider the burden of that message, he will see that it is a proclamation, not to individuals, but to nations and peoples. Hear it in Rev. xiv, 6-8: "And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation and kindred and tongue and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment (not of his probation) is come, and worship him that made heaven and earth and the sea and the fountains of waters."

This everlasting Gospel or message of the good news of the age is declared to the nations that they may have probation (if you please so to call it) to this extent that every nation shall forthwith decide whom they will serve. If they are obedient they will reap the promised blessedness. If they refuse to obey, then war will be made upon them by the King of saints and his invincible army, as in Rev. xix. 11, and pestilence and drought will be added as in Zech. xiv. 16-20, and thus they will rapidly succumb and obey, or resist and be destroyed. Thus truth and law and righteousness will triumph, and the promise made to Abraham and David that in their seed (who is the Christ) shall all the nations of the earth be blessed. Thus righteousness will reign and the earth be filled with the glory of the Lord, and there shall be one Lord and his name one. Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more," etc.

This, in the millennial age—an age of reward to the saints—of judgment to disobedient contemporary nations until they are subdued or destroyed from the earth, and of great spiritual and temporal blessings to all the inhabitants of the world, for the long and happy period of one thousand years.

At least so it appears to the undersigned as the result of more than thirty years of diligent and anxious and earnest investigation of the blessed Book, the only true source of wisdom and knowledge in the premises.

ALLAN B. MACRUDER.

Correspondence.

Brother Read:

My attention has for some time been called to the subject of baptism. Some time since I wrote you of my feelings and resolved to look into my own heart more carefully and prayerfully, and note its experiences, its wants, its desires. I have sought all the help at my command; have had many and long conversations with brethren and sisters of your true and—I now believe—only true faith scattered to the saints. In my early experience I have been so often exhorted to have faith in Jesus, to hope, trust, love Jesus, which God knows I tried to do, but some how I could get no little satisfaction: something more I felt the need of. I searched the Scriptures, prayed, and finally decided to give up all, every idol, and come out from the world, believed on Christ, was immersed, and have since been a Baptist. But with all this, there has been a want of something more.

A year ago I became acquainted with one of your brethren, my neighbor, J. O. Woodruff, who is warm in the truth, and who feels strong yearnings and desires that others may drink from the same fountain, and participate in the light of the Gospel of the Kingdom; and thro' the conversations we had, and the reading of his many books—God's spirit aiding—in company with the dear old Bible, and though I feel myself so weak, so small, yet feel also that wherein I was blind now I see the truth, so simple, so beautiful, so rich, that I often think how much more I am getting acquainted with Jesus! Yes, I know him now! Why is it that with all my longings and seekings no one said little or anything to me about knowing Jesus? This is so essential, so necessary. I have felt for a long time as though my baptism might have been a mistake. I was taught that baptism followed conversion. I was saved before baptism; I must ow put on Christ; nothing was said to me of the saving faith, or of knowing Jesus. This is so essential, and of so much worth that now my baptism looks to me so poor, so beggarly! How could I have a solid faith, a love, a trust in one I did not know? John says: "This is life eternal, to know thee, the only true God and Jesus Christ."

Now, can you imagine how my baptism appears to me? I have struggled hard to think it made no difference—that I had done my best—and why would it not do? But something comes before me, and asks whether I have acquired the Name? am I reckoned a part of himself? This is my present state of mind. After much reflection and study I feel I have not put on the Name, and can only do so by baptism into it or in the language of another, this relationship is so sure, its results so certain, that all who are now in Christ Jesus are spoken of as having passed from death unto life; although this life, we are told is yet hid with Christ in God, and will be given when Christ appears. Let me say that I hope that at some not far distant day to be able to answer the question, "What doth hinder me to be baptized?" by my coming out from the world, and publicly putting on the full family name of my kinsman, Jesus Christ, for there is no other name given under heaven whereby we can be saved.

If my letter pleases you, and if you think others with like experience, (and there are many seeking and feeling as I have been), may be led to inquire concerning the things of the Kingdom, I desire you to publish it. I believe you labor for such as we. May God bless your efforts, and may the good seed you sow spring up in good and honest hearts.

MRS. ELIZABETH LYTLE.

ELIZABETH, N. J.

It is with much joy that we have the privilege of saying to the "household of faith," that two more poor suffering souls have (Mr. and Mrs. Dan) resolved to seek the "kingdom of God and his righteousness," by treading the path that Jesus has marked out for them. They were members of the Presbyterian church at this place, but as the glorious truths of God's holy word was shown to them they received it with all joy and gladness of heart, and on Sunday, August 6th, were baptized into the all-saving name of Jesus.

Brother Dann, for about two years has been suffering from that terrible disease, consumption, and is likely to suffer until either relieved by death, or the soon coming Lord. In all his suffering and poverty, he does not complain, but takes great comfort in the hope set before him. The truth is taking effect in the minds of others, and have hopes that more will soon obey the truth. The church here have peace and harmony, and are directing their energies to further the cause of Christ.

We are sorry to see so much personal controversy in the RESTITUTION. We pray you to cease it, and direct all your time and energies to those things which tend to convert and save men now. Personal controversy destroys the usefulness of the paper. Many excellent articles appear in its columns, that we would like to put in the hands of learners, but are ashamed to do so on account of controversy in other parts. Brethren, do not injure the cause of Christ for the sake of personal glory. WM. H. WILSON.

AUSTIN, TX.

Brother Chaplin: I am confined at home, and have been for some time. Wife and daughter both sick. Wife still quite sick; daughter some better; the prospect now is for wife to be down, and may be, never recover. The doctor thinks the case a bad one. She is down with hemorrhage of the bowels. The symptoms a little better to-day. I had several appointments out, in our state and Illinois, but could not fill them, and the proceeds of my labor I need so much. I am very hard pressed at this time. I intened to be at our conference, but will not be able to come, I do not expect. Oh, how I long for the Lord to come and put an end to all our trials, then there will be no more sorrow or crying. I depend entirely on my preaching for a living, as my health has been poor for several years, but, perhaps, there will be some way opened up for me. My last visit out, was at Bro. Messimore's and Bro. Giblin's. I had promised the brethren in Illinois to be with them in the latter part of July and a part of August, but sickness prevented. Love to all the brethren and sisters in Plymouth.

Yours in love of the truth,

J. S. HATCH.

CRAWFORDSVILLE, Aug. 6, 1876.

Thinking that the brethren of the RESTITUTION would like to hear from the church at this place we submit the following report: The church at Indian Hill school house were set in order the 1st of May by appointing Payton, J. S. Wilkins, Elders I. B. H. Snapp, J. S. Lawrence, deacons. We hold meeting every two weeks, and occasionally Bro. Poor and other preaching brethren comes along and preaches for us. Bro. J. W. Loveace came up from Ft. Scott and preached five discourses; he is an able speaker and a powerful reasoner. The brethren here have concluded to have a conference in October, to be held at Indian Hill school house, two miles west of Strown, Coffey county, Kansas. Bro. Loveace was chosen while here to give notice through the RESTITUTION of the time of conference. We hold a membership of 21 members who most firmly believe in organization breaking of bread and prayers, with singing of hymns and spiritual songs, making melody in our hearts. H. UPDEGRAPH.

STRONG, Coffey Co., Kansas.

"Be Filled With the Sp'-it."

"Make haste, my beloved, and be thou like to a roe or to a young hart upon the mountains of spices."—Sol. Songs viii. 14.

For the encouragement of Bro. "Searcher," let me say, his article was blessed to me, and really seemed more like light on that vital subject to the Church than anything I have seen.

In my experience of forty-eight years in the Divine life the effective power in me for good has been the Holy Spirit of God, just in proportion as I have yielded myself a living sacrifice to obey the leadings of this spirit, I have been useful and only in that proportion. And just in that proportion has my peace abounded.

This subject is beautifully illustrated to my mind in God's manner of dealing with his ancient covenant people: "And on the day that the tabernacle was reared up the cloud covered the tabernacle * * and at even there was upon the tabernacle as it were the appearance of fire, until the morning. So it was always; the cloud covered it by day, and the appearance of fire by night. And when the cloud was taken up from the tabernacle, thus after that the children of Israel journeyed; and in the place where the cloud abode, there the children of Israel pitched their tents, * * as long as the cloud abode upon the tabernacle they rested in their tents * * whether it were two days, or a month, or a year, * * but when it was taken up they journeyed." Num. ix. 15-22.

Thus they had an infallible guide through that trackless desert under Moses, and is the Church under Christ less favored? On the eve of his departure, he said to his disciples: "If ye love me, keep my commandments. And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another comforter, that he may abide with you forever; even the Spirit of truth; whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him; but ye know him; for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you." John xiv. 15-17.

When the understanding is illuminated and the heart warmed and cheered by this Holy Spirit of God—the blessed comforter, how the written Word opens up its treasures to us, and we are filled with joy and peace in believing, and are ready for every good word and work. Praise the Lord of Hosts.

Letter From Brother Kellaway.

Brethren and Sisters:

The kind reference made to myself by your editor and brother with reference to my work of publishing in England in the interest of the truth, in the RESTITUTION of the 26th of July, has just come under my notice, and deserves the acknowledgement I now make.

The Christian courtesy, sympathy and love you have extended to me, go to stimulate me to fresh exertion in the promotion of the knowledge of God, both as to his plan in the Christ, and the establishment of his Divine Kingdom.

Those who have read my books know my convictions as to the facts and means of salvation, and I am happy to say that although opposed by some they are received by many others. Those who have not yet read the English books upon Immortality and the Kingdom of God, I cordially invite to do so. They may be had at the RESTITUTION office as announced. Others also can be obtained by addressing myself personally, care of the editor of the RESTITUTION.

The labor in England is trying in a pecuniary respect, and unless I can get some help it will have to be suspended—which I should indeed regret under the present favorable circumstances and wide spread inquiry.

I had the pleasure a fortnight ago last Sunday of meeting with the church at Brooklyn, L. I., and speaking to them in the name of Jesus. The brethren enjoyed the word. Invitation given by Brother G. W. Young. Made the acquaintance of some whom I expect to see again, if not in this present evil age, in that age of blessing which is so close upon us.

I see the editor hopes I may "find it in my heart to pay him a visit; it is in my heart, but not within the space of time and means at my command. Hence this gratification must be reserved for a future day. But I will not forget you in prayer.

And I ask you when you retire to think of me in the presence of "our Father,"—let his name be hallowed, and his kingdom come.

I have met with Brother Hayes since my arrival, whom I find to be in earnest for the truth, and for the right direction of men seeking the way of peace.

Yours, sincerely,

In hope of the Savior's appearing,

W. KELLAWAY,
Editor of Bible Echo.

P. S.—As perhaps some may desire to take the English magazine advocating the truths we love, let me say that the Bible Echo is $2 50 a year, postage included. The present volume, consisting of 1½ year's numbers, is $3 10. Amount may be sent in currency to care of the editor of the RESTITUTION.

Conference Report.

Minutes of quarterly conference held by Pleasant Grove, and Wild Cat congregation to appoint and instruct delegates to appear at the annual conference of the South-west Missouri, and North-west Arkansas District, to be held on Friday, before the Second Sunday in September, 1876. It having been motioned and seconded that Elder Joseph Neville be appointed president of the conference, said motion was unanimously carried.

Motioned and carried, that Brother Geo. C. Ward be appointed secretary of said conference, and said secretary was requested to furnish a correct report of the proceedings of such conference.

Brother Kidwell then spoke of the effort being made to divide the district comprising Arkansas, and a portion of South-west Missouri into sub. districts, with bounderies to be agreed upon and defined by the annua conference, and the necessity of selecting and locating Evangelists in each sub. district. He also refered to the necessity of the accommodation of those coming to conference from a distance.

The motion was then put and carried, that the delegates from this district be instructed to ask that Brother Geo. Kidwell be appointed as Evangelist for the sub. district, comprising North-west Arkansas and South-west Missouri.

And said delegates were instructed to recommend and maintain that the congregations in said sub. district, shall pledge themselves for the amount decided upon by their conference assembled, and said amount shall be paid directly by said congregation into the hands of the Evangelist, and not into the hands of any third party or Evangelists fund whatever.

The delegates were instructed to report to the annual conference, that the conference comprising Pleasant Grove and Wild Cat congregations subscribe and pledge themselves for the sum of——dollars.

Brothers Ward Llewellyn and and Floyd were appointed as delegates and instructed as above.

GEO. C. WARD, Sec'y.

REPORT OF EVANGELIST.

I have traveled over six hundred miles circuit of territory, preaching and proclaiming the gospel of the kingdom as I went for the past two years almost wholly at my own expense, resulting in the organization of four congregations besides numerous converts not yet organized, and, with the gratifying result of great interest being awakened, and the people were lead to earnestly search the Scriptures. My latest convert was formerly a Campbellite Preacher of note who had searched the Scriptures expecting to discuss with me, but who at the meeting appointed, preached the faith he expected to oppose, and was baptized into the faith.

GEORGE KIDWELL.

Religious Aspect of the Servian War.

Some of the English writers affirm that the Servian declaration of war against the Turks was exclusively the work of the Russians. Observers on the spot declare that this is a very superficial view of it, and that the Servians themselves are very jealous of the influence of Russia, although they would be glad of her aid in winning their independence. The Servian nationality is not an offshoot or dependent of the Russian. It is a history older than that of Muscovy, and it numbers in that region of the earth 7,400,000 souls who speak the Servian tongue and who belong to the Servian branch of the Church. Discussing this subject, the Springfield Republican observes:

But there are greater things at stake in this business than the sympathies or the sneers of the missionaries. We cannot but remember that with the fall of the Eastern Empire, and the consequent disabling of the Greek Church, the Roman Church rose in importance; and we ought perhaps to correct our statement of the other day, in regard to the relative distrust of the Greek Church by Protestants and Romans. For the Romish Church views the rehabilitation of its old rival with the keenest envy. This fact is especially embarrassing to the Empire of Austro Hungary, in both divisions of which the Catholics comprise a large majority of the inhabitants. It is impossible to overestimate the magnitude of the interests involved in the restoration of the Greek Church to an approximate balance of power with the Papacy. Such a restoration is among the great probabilities of the coming century. We shall not see the Greek Church replaced by Protestantism to any extent, that not being the law of modern religious change, but we may see its dogma liberalized to a point that leaves little distinction. This is the law of modern religious change, as we see it going on in all Christian countries, to-day,—the retention of the church form and name, and even of creed, but the silent and irresistible change of belief and faith.

If the Servians triumph, as they must ultimately, the Moslem will be driven back to the Bosphorus and from the Bosphorus out of Asia Minor. Asia Minor is studded with old Christian communities which have resisted subjugation and conversion through all the centuries, and which, as the Turkish power weakens, will become vitalized with the same religious and civil liberty which has emancipated the Russian serf, which has put the ballot and the school-book into the hands of the Servian peasant, and which now arms the Servian people to strike a blow for their sister-provinces. These are expressions of human action which cannot be disguised, or imitated by any other dispensation: they mark the frontier of Christianity, or else the history of eighteen centuries is a lie. Let us not then be blind by our super-sensitive sectarianism to their true significance. Let not the ministers of the Gospel in America require a new sheet to come down to them in a vision to rescind these that. "In every nation, he that feareth Him and worketh righteousness is accepted by Him."

A correspondent of the Harrison News, writing from Forest, this state, gives the following account of the mysterious appearance of a woman's portrait on a church window in that village:

Inside the last two years there has been something making its appearance on one of the glasses in the church window, and now it is plain to see a true picture of a woman—can see it as far as ten rods from the church. The glass is perfectly clear and smooth on the inside, and nothing can be seen of the picture on the inside. There have been hundreds to see the picture, and it is a mystery to all, and can't be accounted for. Different things have been tried on it to rub it off, but to no effect. As the church is within two hundred yards of my house, I can see that the picture gets plainer every day. If any person doubts this being so, there can be plenty of the best proof to substantiate the above.

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Indiana.

Letters for the Editor should be sent to the same place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began. It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with Jesus Christ as King of kings, and the immortalization of his elect to rule with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

1st Peter iii: 3-4.

BRO. MYERS:—Will you please give an exposition of 1st Peter iii. 3-4. 1. Is it the outward man, or the hidden man of the heart that is to be clothed? 2. What is the hidden man of the heart? 3. Is the spirit in ver. 4 a conscious entity in man? 4. And is that spirit said to be incorruptible? A few words upon these points will be thankfully received. ENQUIRER.

REPLY.

To offer a criticism upon this text we will approach it by coupling with it its context. Then by way of analysis we have:

1. Brethren exhorted to be obedient to civil governments. ii. 13-17.

2. Servants are enjoined to be in subjection to their masters. ii. 18-25.

3. And wives are entreated to be in subjection to their husbands. iii. 1-6.

The chief object of this exhortation to wives appears to be that of the evangelization of their unbelieving husbands. This work of evangelization was to be accomplished by one of two ways, or perchance by both.

1. By a chaste conversation; not only in setting forth the glad tidings of the kingdom, but in all conversation bearing forth the practical principles of Christianity. Ver. 2.

2. By adornment. Ver. 3. This was not to consist in the adornment of the outward person, with any superfluous dressing common to that, this, or any other age of the world, but to consist in the outward man bearing to the unbelieving husband the manifestations of the hidden man of the heart, which hidden man of the heart was to be clothed with an incorruptible clothing consisting of a meek and quiet spirit. Ver. 4.

WHO ADORNED?

It is discoverable from the above analysis and paraphrase that we entertain the idea that both the outward man, and the hidden man of the heart are to be adorned. In justification of this idea it is discernable that the hidden man of the heart is to be adorned by dropping out of the King James rendering the interpolated words in italics. Further this idea is sustained by consulting other renderings. See.

1. Diaglott—"Whose decoration, let it not be that external one, of braiding the hair, and putting on of gold chains, or wearing of apparel; but decorate the hidden man of the heart with what is incorruptible,—a meek and quiet spirit."

2. Improved Version—"Let not whose ornament be that outward one of plaiting the hair and of wearing gold, or putting on apparel; but let it be the hidden person of the heart, in the incorruptible ornament of a meek and quiet spirit."

3. Stuart—"Whose ornament let it not be the external (ornament) of bruided hair and the putting on of chains of gold or of clothing, but let the hidden man of the heart be adorned with the imperishable ornaments of a meek and quiet spirit."

That the outward man likewise is to be adorned, (but not with the superfluities of the world,) 1st The text itself teaches. 2 The object for which the ornament was designed, namely the conversion of the unbelieving husband, could be accomplished only by bringing before him, for observation, upon the outward person the clothing of the hidden man of the heart. Therefore, the ornament was to consist in the outward men bearing to the unbelieving husband the manifestations of the hidden man of the heart, which manifestations were a meek and quiet spirit.

THE HIDDEN MAN OF THE HEART.

In answer to the second interrogatory of enquirer "What is the Hidden Man of the Heart," it is necessary to notice closely almost the entire expression, word by word. The expression taken entire is similar in value to that of "the inner man," spoken of by Paul. Rom. vii. 22; 2 Cor. iv. 16; Eph. iii. 16; Col. iii. 9-10; and on account of their similarity in phraseology, and also in doctrinal value, while upon this point we will consider them together. Then selecting word by word, the word,

1. Hidden—denotes something out of sight, not yet brought to view; and such is true as yet of the man under consideration. He is yet hid from view, and will remain hid at least till sometime in the future. Our spiritualistic friends say till the phenomenon called death. But we are inclined to believe that he will not come to view till Jesus comes.

2. Of the Heart—Equivalent in expression to the word "inner" in the other text. This man is called the "inner man" simply because of his dwelling inside of the fleshly mortal man; and he is called "the man of the heart," because of his locality in the fleshly man. Of course his locality is not in the fleshly heart, but in the affections of the fleshly man

A question just here might serve to call up some valuable thoughts for us. Thus question; How does this man get into the heart (affection) of the fleshly man?

We answer this question by stating 1st that Jesus of Nazareth sows the seed in the heart for his production. This seed is said to be the word of God. Luke viii. 2; and the word of the Kingdom. Matt. xiii. 19. The same as sown by Jesus. Matt. iv. 23; ix. 35; xxiv. 14. The same as sown by the Apostles. Acts ii. 24-33; viii. 12; xiv. 21-22; xxviii. 30-31. 2 This seed sown for the production of the "inner man," "the hidden man of the heart," is able to reach the heart. Matt. xiii. 19; Luke viii. 12. 3 This word received, retained and acted upon judiciously will produce in that heart faith. Luke viii. 12.

4. This seed of the Kingdom contemplated in all its parts, presenting life from the dead to incorruptibility and heirship in the Kingdom with Jesus, begets in that heart love to God. This is faith working by love. Gal. v. 6.

5. This removes that heart from the things of the world, its former desires and sets it upon things that are pure. This is a purification of heart. Acts. xv. 9.

6. When faith has thus worked by love and purified the desires of that heart then comes within that heart the will, the desire, the determination to break off from the things of former life, and to live differently, like the Prodigal when he came by reflection to see his condition in poverty and want, to arise and go (return) to his fathers house. Luke xv. 18. This is a change of heart—repentance in its primary sense.

7. This change of heart put into practice—bearing its fruits—bearing its evidence. Matt. iii. 8-9, makes a subject for another step in the work and brings that heart to the death of Christ where his blood can be found. Rom. vi: "Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into his death.

8. From this buried condition by which the blood of Christ is reached, the party arises to walk in newness of life in new relationship. Here the old relationship is legally put off and a new put on v. 4-6, with Col. iii. 9-10. Here we have the "inner man," "the hidden man of the heart," commenced in embryo. Here we have the heir to God and the joint-heir with Christ commenced, yet to be perfected—consummated, see Rom. viii. 17. with, Luke xx. 35. The glorification with Christ and joint-heirship is made dependent on suffering with him; and the becoming a child of God is dependent on a resurrection.

Now with the "inner man" "the hidden man of the heart" thus produced, another question of value might be brought forward for thought. It is, how is this "new man" "inner man" "hidden man of the heart" to be sustained? This question is answered by Paul in addressing the Ephesians iii. 16. Here we learn that this man is strengthened by the spirit of God.

It is sometimes thought by many persons that this "new man" "inner man," "hidden of the heart" is, an inherent immortal principle in man called the immortal soul or spirit. But that this it incorrect we offer: 1. That none but those who have complied with God's will are ever addressed as possessing this "inner man" "hidden man of the heart." see Rom. viii. 22; 2 Cor. iv. 16; Eph. iii. 16; Col. iii. 9 10; and the text.

2. That the phraseology relative to the inception of this "inner man" identifies it with the act of obeying from the heart the mould of doctrine contained in the gospel; compare Col. iii. 9 10 with Rom. vi. 3-6.

3. That this "inner man" is strengthened by the spirit of God, Eph. iii. 16; which spirit the man of the world does not have, and cannot receive as a comforter—strengthener; see Jno. xiv. 16 17.

4. That this "inner man" is renewed day by day; 2 Cor. iv. 16, which the soul, spirit, or any other principle in man would not need in case it was immortal—incorruptible. That which is incorruptible—imperishable—needs no renewing day by day, or year by year, or by the thousand years.

Next, this hope (for such it is) begotten within the heart as above described, is called a MAN, because it leads the party to live by faith, 2 Cor. v. 7, and look forward to the time when the legal relationship thus begotten will bring him up from the grave as an actual man. Then, it is said to be "hidden," because not yet seen. It is said to be "inner," "of the heart" because formed in the affection by obedience. And it is said to be a man, because the hope looks forward, to a resurrection from the grave in full manhood.

3. IS THE SPIRIT CONSIDERED IN VERSE FOURTH A CONSCIOUS ENTITY?

We answer this question negatively. Spirit primarily considered is an element which emanates from the personage of the Deity. This moving upon the human organism produces life and its different manifestations. This element is deposited in the belt of atmosphere which surrounds the earth, and therefore is defined as air, air in motion, wind &c. by all Lexicographers, which is simply the thing (wind) containing put in the definition for the thing (spirit) contained in the wind.

When this element which emanates from the Deity moves upon a human organism and produces life and its many manifestations such as fear, hatred, malice, pride, ambition, meekness, love, patience and many other dispositions these dispositions thus produced are sometimes called spirit. It is the cause (spirit) producing, put for the effect (dispositions) produced. This is spirit secondary, and frequently occurs in the Bible. These two definitions will cover every occurrence of the word spirit in the Bible excepting where the word is used in an extraordinary sense denoting Holy Spirit. Under this secondary sense of the word spirit, denoting disposition do we place the word as it occurs in the text.

4 IS THAT SPIRIT INCORRUPTIBLE?

Only as an attribute. The meek and quiet disposition is incorruptible in its effect, being prompted by the spirit of God; see Gal. v. 22-23; and leads in the end to life everlasting. Gal. vi. 8. G. M. MYERS.

Oak of Abraham.

About one mile up the river of Eshcol, north of Hebron, and the only point in the neighborhood that overlooks the valley of the Dead Sea, or from which the smoke of burning Sodom could be seen, is the plain, or more properly the grove of Mamre, only another name for Hebron, the first permanent home of the Patriarchs in Canaan.

Near the foundations of some very old buildings may still be seen the grand old "oak of Abraham," not a forebirth, but a sturdy, evergreen oak, with broad spreading branches,—a beautiful symbol of the patriarch whose name it bears, and whose spotless life after the lapse of ages, is still fresh and green in the memory of the Church. The tree will girt over twenty feet, is very much like the oaks on Carmel, and in the forests of Bashon, and if not the identical one under which the Jews were sold by their Roman conquerors after the fall of Bether, it certainly marks the spot and is a decendant of the famous grove in which Abraham and Sarah pitched their tent 4,000 years ago.—Ds Hass.

A Question and Its Answer.

Then I heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that certain saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot?

And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed. Dan. viii. 13, 14.

First we consider the question—"How long is the vision of the daily sacrifice and transgression, and making desolate, to give both the sanctuary and host to be trodden under foot?"

The answer is, "unto, or until, 2300 days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

It is of great importance to know what sanctuary is referred to. Is it God's sanctuary, or that of the little horn of the vision? The vision must determine this point. Here is the evidence in the case: it—the little horn, —waxed great (see mar.) against the host of heaven, and cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them; yea, he was magnified, (exalted) to be the prince of the host; and from him the daily was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary was cast down. Now we have the case before us. The sanctuary of the vision is that of the little horn of the vision; the little horn was exalted to be the prince of the host, the army of heaven; from him, the same horn, the daily or continual was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary cast down; or, as expressed in the question, his sanctuary given over to be trodden under foot. Let us trace the history of this horn as given in Dan. viii. 9-13. Out of one of them came forth a little horn; it waxed great against (mar.) the host of heaven; it cast down some of the host and of the stars; he (it) was magnified (to be) the prince of the host; and from him (it) the same horn,)the continual was taken away, and the place of his (its) sanctuary was cast down; the host (mar.) was given over for transgression against the daily, and it cast down the truth to the ground; the same horn or power that came out of one of them, waxed great towards the south, the east, and the pleasant land. It is he who waxed great against the army of (the) heaven—that was exalted to be the prince of the army, and from him (it, the same horn,) the daily was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary cast down. If a few words must be supplied, are we not safe in supplying those that are in harmony with the vision? This vision did not concern, or take in, Jerusalem, its sanctuary and people; for the angel came to Daniel afterwards to give him information concerning his people, the Jews. Dan. ix. 14. "Now I am come to make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days, for yet the vision is for many days."

It was in the third year of King Belshazzar that Daniel saw the vision of the horn and sanctuary, and, afterwards, in the first year of Darius, that we find him pleading for Jerusalem, her people and sanctuary. Then in the third year of Cyrus the angel came to inform him of his people. Does any one suppose that Daniel was so dull as to not understand? Had he not seen the sanctuary at Jerusalem cast down?

Before proceeding further, let us correct a false assumption concerning the 2300 days. It is assumed that they cover the pushing of the ram, the work of the rough goat, and all the horns that arose after the first was broken. But no such question is asked. From the little horn the daily is taken away, and the place of his sanctuary cast down, and the host, and the host given over for transgression; and the question is not How long is the pushing of the ram, the work of the goat and of the horns? but How long is the vision of the continual, the transgression, and making desolate, to give the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot? The 2300 days cover just this and no more. Taking from the little horn the daily or continual, up to the cleansing spoken of, then the treading under foot begins, and 2300 evenings and mornings from the time when this taking away begins, the cleansing takes place, and then the treading under foot begins. The daily was not taken from the ram, nor from the horns of the goat, but from the little horn that came forth (was born) out of one of them, and it is from this horn that the continual is taken away; it is the place of the sanctuary of this same horn that is cast down. Then, if we know anything about this matter, we must identify this horn, his sanctuary, etc. If this can be done, then may we not be able to tell when this taking away begins? If this can be done, then we can tell when and where the 2300 days begin and end, and what takes place at this end; and this I propose to do if religious newspapers are not too timid to publish. To the timid I would say that the Lord's coming does not enter into this vision of the 2300 days.

Gossipping.

BY J. M. HARLAN.

How often do we find persons in different communities that do not know how to govern their tongue, and what is the reason? It is because they give way to their passions, which if they would try and resist, they (the passions) would naturally leave them. Some gossip because they have nothing else to talk about, or do not try to know anything else, which would make them and their neighbors happy. But instead of doing their neighbors any good, they try to injure them, and also injure themselves in the attempt. While we thus pursue this subject we call to mind, a family of young ladies who always have something interesting to talk about, because they try to cultivate that kind of spirit. We have seen them at home and in galleries of art. We have caught glimpses of them coming from the book store or the library, with a new volume in their hand, with a countenance full and delighting with what they have read.

They always have something to say of importance because they know something of importance to talk about. We have left them after a delightful hour, stimulated and refreshed, and during the time not a neighbor's garment was touched or even hinted at. One topic of conversation was only drop ed to give place for another. They could listen as well as they could talk. They had no temptation to gossip, because their neighbor's doings formed a subject very much less interesting, than one that grew out of their own knowledge and culture. And here lies the secret of the whole matter. It is formed either by malice or ignorance. Nor does this belong only to the young, but to the old as well. Nor does it belong to one community only, but it is almost everywhere present, causing the best friend to be the bitterest enemies, the separation of man and wife, and the divisions and strife in the churches where one of busy bodies is. Brethren, these things ought not to be so. Instead of this evil communication we ought to go to our brother or sister and admonish them in the spirit of the Lord, in the way that is right. The apostle Paul says "let no corrupt communication proceed out of our mouths, but that which is good to the use of edifying, that it may minister grace to the hearers," but "the tongue is a little member, and boasted great things: behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth." All kinds of birds and beasts have been tamed, but the tongue can no man tame? It is an unruly evil full of deadly poison." James iii. 6, 7, 8. Why full of deadly poison? Because it fills the whole community (where it exists) with malice, envy and evil speaking. "Therewith bless we God, even thy Father, and therewith curse we men, which are made after the similitude of God." Out of the same mouth proceed the blessing and cursing. My brethren, these things ought not so to be. 9-10. We ought to be careful how we speak of another's lest we offend all, but let us be "slow to speak and swift to hear," for fear of condemnation, when we will have to give an account of every idle word we speak. Now to the young brethren throughout the land (although I am young myself) be careful what kind of a spirit you cultivate, remembering the life you live here you will be judged by in the world to come. Choose rather to be alone than to go in the way of evil men, who will be abased, when we that are faithful until the coming of the Lord, shall be exalted to inherit the earth.

Then let us cultivate a meek and quiet spirit which is in the sight of God of great price. And humbling ourselves in the sight of the Lord, that we may be lifted up. Remembering before destruction the heart of man is haughty, and before honor is humility.

Signs of the Times.

1. Is it not evident to the most casual observer, that these are times of excessive worldliness? Gain and gayety are the two grand idols of the age. Together they enthrall the heart, absorb the energies, and command the homage of the multitude. Everywhere men are in haste to be rich, and utterly unscrupulous as to the means used to secure the boon. Health is imperilled, physical and mental powers are overtaxed, conscience stifled, character and and reputation sacrificed, and of all to be deplored, the eternal welfare of the soul neglected, in order to gratify a towering ambition, or an insatiable avarice. This spirit is seen in the unseemly scramble for office, in the shameless abuse of power, in the eager pursuit of pleasure, in the prevalence reckless speculation and grasping selfishness, and in extravagant expenditure of money on costly furniture, needless luxuries, and superfluous dress—in the latter instance not only despising Christain simplicity, but in many cases outraging all propriety and good taste, displaying complete disregard to health and comfort, so that homage may be rendered at the shrine of fashion. This evil saps the very foundations of society, and awakens suspicion and distrust. It often sunders the dearest and tenderest ties, while it perverts and degrades the noblest gifts. It is especially fraught with peril to man's spiritual welfare. Its very essence is forgetfulness of God, and eternity. Of it comes science without faith, politics without principle, business without conscience, literature without holiness, pleasure without purity, in short, man without God. It invades even the sanctity of the Christian church, to tarnish its purity and impair its strength. It produces among professing Christians a regard for talent, rather than piety; for costly church edifices, wealthy congregations, and showy forms, rather than the simplicity of Christ, the spirituality of the believer, and the rescue of sinners from eternal perdition. To a christian mind such a spectacle is truly painful. To note its character and effects, and apply its remedy, is the aim of all who desire the true prosperity of our country, and the eternal well-being of souls.

2. Are not these, also, times of widespread immorality? This may be inferred from what we have already observed. For where there is excess in worldliness, there will invariably be laxity in morals. If, instead of immutable truth, high-toned principle, and a regard for the general weal, society is governed by time-saving expediency, self-interest, and sensual gratification, then it must become essentially corrupt; evil of every grade must flourish and prevail. Is it not even so in our midst. We appeal to the state of things around us for proof. What do we see? Wickedness in high places and in low places, in legislative halls, and in judicial courts, in stately mansions and in wretched hovels, in educated and refined society, among the ignorant and debased. What do we see? Suicide treading in the steps of murder; drunkenness, profanity, and Sabbath desecration jostling each other; the innocent and unwary decoyed from the paths of virtue and honor to a course of infamy and shame; life and property constantly imperilled; and crime following crime in quick and alarming succession. What do we see? Speculation tampering with dishonesty, and bribery catering to the theft; the public purse rifled for private or party ends, or for sectarian purposes; the press designed to be the fount of knowledge, the exponent of truth and the guardian of virtue, too often used to gratify a vitiated taste, or disseminate a vile and godless literature. In view of such scenes the true patriot will mourn, and the Christian will take shelter in the pavilion of Divine sympathy and care. How to grapple with these evils, and if possible eradicate them, is a great and grave question, well deserving the attention of every Christian thinker and philanthropist.—Prophetic Times.

The Honored, and the Saved.

If a man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire. 1 Cor. iii. 15.

It is evident, from this passage, that salvation merely, is not all that is made attainable through the provisions of the gospel. There is such a thing as being saved, and, at the same time, sustaining irreparable loss. The nature of this loss is only explicable by understanding the nature of God's everlasting kingdom. Our Lord's admonition to the Philadelphian church furnishes the key to explain the difference between the saved and the honored conditions connected with the world to come. To be saved is one thing, to attain not only salvation but royal dignities, is quite a distinct and different affair. The persons to whom the apostle alludes secure the one, but lose the other. The crown of a royal dominion, and the mitre of a princely priesthood, are what they never reach. To be made unto God kings and priests, and reign on the earth, will be the portion of only a very select class indeed of the vast multitudes of the finally redeemed. An innumerable host of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, will finally stand before the Lamb, wearing the white robes, and waving the palms of victory, who will with a loud voice ascribe salvation to God who sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb. These obtain a position before the throne of God and serve him day and night in his temple.

In the innermost circle, around the throne of God and the Lamb, is found the princely priesthood. These sing the heavenly melodies of the new song, and offer the incense from golden censers. In the next circle are the myriads of myriads, and thousands of thousands, of the holy angels, who respond to the glad hymnings of the glorified choristers of the central bands. In the third and outer circle is embraced the multitudinous, white-robed host who bear the grand refrain through the countless ranks of the uncrowned saved; in the heavenly arrangement, the Bride is nearest the throne, sharing the crown, honor, and peculiar prerogatives of the Son of God, himself. The holy, unfallen angels, who have not, like the Son of God, been made perfect through sufferings, yield the first place to those who have entered into the fellowship of the Redeemer's sorrows; "If we suffer, we shall also reign with him." Then come the saved who are never invested with dominion like the elect and chosen from the many called. We are running for an incorruptible crown —a crown of glory that fadeth not away. The inheritance of the elected class is co-heirship with Jesus Christ in all the princely and priestly honors of God's everlasting kingdom. The other class remain always lower than the angels, and far lower than the crowned and mitred who reach the very summits of exaltation and glory. The church of the first-born ones is the class to whom the advantages of a double portion in the rich inheritance of ages, as well as the prerogatives of rulership and priesthood belong. The other children are not disinherited because they come short in forming that perfect character that warrants an election to heaven's highest honors. The cross, self-denial, and self-sacrifice give the discipline and training necessary for the special salvation.

An honest careful attention to the common requirements of the gospel, in its primary principles, may win for us the advantages of the common salvation; but for the transcendent honors connected with the crowns, thrones and sceptres, in the princedoms of the grand Empire of God, the crosses, the labors, and struggles of a narrow pathway wet with the tears of penitence, must be uncomplainingly borne. We are competitors for the sublimest dignities that it is possible for heaven to place within our reach; and we may lose a crown of glory that fadeth not away. We may miss a throne and a sceptre through our own indolence and carelessness. Through his faithfulness, in his humiliation, our Lord and Redeemer has reached the dazzling summit of glory and power next the throne of the eternal Jehovah himself. To share in those exalted and eternal honors is the hope of our high and heavenly calling. When the door to these royalties is once closed, it will not be opened again forever. Such an opportunity for a distinguished position in the kingly exaltations of an everlasting empire will never be proffered us again during the mighty cycles of the coming eternity. How all earthly honors fade and vanish in view of the exceeding great and eternal weight of glory. Paul found it impossible, even when employing the intervolved and superimposed hyperboles, in his untranslatable delineation of future glories, to describe the blessed reality. Due discipline and training are essentially requsite in order to fill an earthly throne with honor; how much more a heavenly? We are in the race; eternal honors are at stake; shall we win or lose? Let us contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints: and while we cherish the one faith let us be careful to judge nothing before the time. A Christ-like disposition, and a holy devoted life may win a place among the palm-bearing multitude notwithstanding some defects in faith that an erroneous education rendered unavoidable. The fall of Israel is not a fall from salvation, but a fall from the special privilege of furnishing the princely nobility and priesthood of the ages to come. We stand by faith; let us not be high-minded but fear. It is a great thing to be saved, a greater still to wear a crown of glory through endless ages.

Journeyings and Labors.

Before leaving Toronto we would note an epoch in the history of the investigation which has been going on in Toronto for many years. The representatives of the Presbyterian denomination in England and the provinces closed their session in this city the week before the discussion commenced. Questions of great moment were to be adjusted. The learning, the wisdom and eloquence of the great Presbyterian church had culminated there. Nearly two solid weeks of their precious time was devoted to the investigation of the nature and duration of future punishment. A member of this august body had been charged with having, in some unguarded moment, expressed a desire that at some period of eternity the sufferings of the damned might be mitigated, or that these hopeless beings might be released. Like Dr. Watts, the nobler impulses of his heart had overleaped the barriers of an inexorable theology

The Globe could spare whole pages daily in presenting an ex parte investigation, but could not spare more than a fourth of a column to the other side, and finally excluded their articles entirely.

All wide-spread investigation of the nature and destiny of man only reveals latent doubts in relation to the immortality of the soul and endless misery, which pervade the minds of all independent thinkers. In confirmation of this we might appeal to the great conventions which recently convened in London, New York, and Toronto. The struggling emotions of this man's heart only vocalized the unuttered wish of every mind in that great assembly. The same doubts which corroded Mr. McDonald's mind had thrown the shadows of suspicion on every mind in that general assembly of puritans. At the conclusion of this noted trial, Mr. Cook, one of the leading delegates, arose and confessed for the whole body. Referring to the doctrine of endless misery, he said:—"We all have doubts."

In vain may editors of mammoth politico-ecclesiastical papers anathematize, popes issue bulls, and general conventions and synods thunder denunciations. This investigation is from God, and must go on though kingdoms crumble and ecclesiastical hierarchies disintegrate. We are living in an age of investigation, when heavy systems of error are being torn up from their foundations. Everything, whether new or old, ecclesiastical, political or scientific, must be thrust into the crucible of investigation, and be either purified or consumed. When crowned tyrants and mitred ecclesiastics can chain the chariot of the sun, and arrest the planets in their orbits, it will then be time to think of binding the chainless freedom of thought, or staying the march of truth as it strides through the ages.

"Truth crushed to earth shall rise again;
The eternal years of God are hers."

The question may be asked how it happened that the Christadelphians should invite us to be their standard bearer. We were sent for by the request of Brethren Thomas, Degur and Cronkhite. We as a people have never disfellowshipped our Christadelphian brethren. There is no essential doctrine at issue. The difference relates chiefly to times and processes. We had no objection to standing up for the truth under that ecclesia. We were cordially received, and treated with Christian courtesy.

We next visited our old friend, Mr. Drew, and his kind family. We enjoyed their quiet, pleasant home exceedingly during the sultry days and nights we sojourned with them. His residence is about two miles from Oshawa. No one with whom we are acquainted in the Province loves or is willing to do more for the truth than Brother Drew. There are a number in Oshawa who believe with us in the main. Brother Drew conveyed us to Brooklyn, where we enjoyed an exceedingly interesting visit with Brother and Sister Thomas. We enjoyed his society and counsel during the discussion at Toronto. Although Christadelphian in faith, he does not disfellowship those of his brethren who may differ with him in reference to resurrection and judgment.

In company with Brother and Sister Thomas we went over in his carriage to Salina, where we preached on Saturday evening, and on Sunday forenoon and afternoon. The last two services were attended by brethren and sisters from an area of ten miles. The best of interest prevailed. Their little church was filled with intelligent listeners to the word, most of whom were brethren and sisters. Brethren Hogarths and Mitchell reside there. With at least a half dozen carriages and wagons well filled, we hastened to our next appointment at Oshawa, about eight miles distant. The Disciple church was well filled, and the audience listened with much more than ordinary interest to a lecture on the Eastern Question. The pastor of the Disciple church, with one of his brethren, attended our meeting in the afternoon at Salina. He spoke in terms of approval of the discourse in the afternoon, and in the evening differing only on one or two important points.

It has seldom been our privilege to address a more attentive or intelligent audience. We were promised the use of the Disciple church whenever we should want it—of course when not occupied by themselves.

Our good, zealous and intelligent brother Cronkhite, of Arona, attended our meetings at Toronto, Salina and Oshawa. We would not forget to mention the liberality of our brethren wherever we labored in the Province.

Having returned to Toronto the following Tuesday evening, we lectured in the Temperance Hall on the eastern question; and the next evening we preached to a small congregation which convened at Brother Cleverden's house. The next day we bade farewell to kind friends, intending to preach at Sweaburg, but the train from Hamilton being several hours behind time, we could not have made connection at Woodstock for that place. We have since learned that Brethren McLellan and Thoms were at Woodstock in time to have conveyed us to Sweaburg. We regret the disappointment.

The Cause in Iowa.

The week following the state conference of Indiana at Antioch, on consultation with our brethren at Plymouth, it was decided that I should attend the Advent conference and camp-meeting at West Irving, Iowa, now just closed.

I did so, and having learned many gratifying things, and, as I believe, aided in bringing about some promising results I lay before the readers of the RESTITUTION an account of the whole matter.

Reaching West Irving Tuesday morning, Aug. 29th, I found a fine large tent capable of holding 400 or 500 people, pitched in a fine grove on grounds belonging to Mr. Geo. S. Williams, (who generously donated them for that purpose) and several family tents on either side, which with the commodious boarding tent kept by Bro. Marshman, gave a very picturesque appearance. There were gathered here in council or came before the close of the meeting to participate in the work, the following Advent preachers from different parts of the state: F. W. Hough, C. W. Pitcher, P. F. Willoughby, R. B. Dutton, E. A. Marsh, C. C. Ramsay, Moses Chandler and his two sons Dr. A. Chandler and W. R. Chandler, M. A. Newcomb, Mr. M. J. James, and Frank Burr, editor of Advent Christian Times. Brethren R. J. Hill, Wm. Brayton and J. F. Prime were also present.

Bro. Eychaner was expected, but did not come. The Adventists have divided Iowa into six districts, three on the north and three on the south, four of which were represented here. This meeting was composed of delegates from each of these districts, and holds annual sessions. It is a Union conference of former rival factions under would be leaders and bearing the name of Christian and the other Advent Christian Conferences. The last general quarterly meeting of our brethren in this state appointed Burr, Hill, Prime and Eychaner as a committee to confer with this conference in relation to a union with them.

The reason for the step was given in the preamble to the resolutions (which see) viz: that the differences were more in name than in fact. Now the fact is that many of the preachers, and it is believed also a majority of the members are age-to-come, so called.

The old prejudice so carefully fostered by P. & W. Deyo, J. V. Hines and the Advent Christian Times is gone, and an inquiring liberal spirit has taken its place. "What is truth" on this question seems to be the only matter regarded now.

And I am happy to say that the advances on our part were met in the most liberal and friendly spirit. An equal share in the preaching was freely accorded us, a seat in the convention and full liberty of speech granted. A few only manifested a spirit of proscription; the majority even of those to whom the age-to-come had been a hated heresy listening with candor to the strange doctrine preached. Indeed we were in the majority reckoning in all who held to our faith among them.

A committee was appointed to meet with us and arrange the terms of union. We met at the house of Bro. Levi Marsh and arranged that our brethren should retain their, name organization, and specific work, but should meet with them in conference annually as one body and the resolution following was adopted as an amendment to their constitution thus settling the principle upon which the only question of importance which divides us should be treated.

Resolved, That this conference accords the fullest liberty of speech, of thought, and of conscience to all of its members; and while they maintain the essentials of the Christian faith and character no man shall be proscribed on account of his faith in relation to the doctrine of the age-to-come, so called, or be hindered in giving expression thereto either for or against. But that we will aid each other to the extent of our power to attain a knowledge of the truth in all matters till we all arrive at the fullness of the stature of man and woman in Christ Jesus.

Signal, J. F. Wilcox, R. J. Hill, J. T. Prime, C. A. Huson, P. F. Willoughby and R. B. Dutton, committee.

This was presented, fully discussed and unanimously adopted.

The conference then passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That each subordinate conference composing this body be requested to act upon the above amendment to the constitution, and report such action at our next annual meeting; the question for consideration being, shall the resolution offered by the committee become a part of the constitution or not?

Resolved, That we, as members of this Union State Conference do hereby pledge ourselves that we will use our utmost endeavors to promote the spirit of the resolution and we will work to bring about a permanent union at our next annual meeting. We also recommend the brethren at large to render their hearty co-operation in effecting this union.

There was not a dissenting voice to these resolutions except Frank Burr, who was in favor of the union, but thought it could only be effected on the plan of utterly ignoring all questions upon which we differ, thus, as we think, putting a bar to all discussion of differences and utterly preventing the possibility of ever reaching a harmony on them. Happily the convention thought differently, and gave the utmost freedom of speech and conscience to its members. The matter stands now awaiting the ratification of both parties viz: Our conference which meets on the 21st inst., and the different subordinate conferences of the Adventists in the state.

The cause greatly needs a strong healthy man of a cool head and a warm heart to take the general supervision of matters in this state. Bro. R. J. Hill and J. T. Prime are both broken in health and have abandoned the field for their farms and there is none to take their places. It is greatly to be hoped that the move was inaugurated for a general organization will succeed and a general missionary work entered into, in which Iowa can share. The outlook is full of hope; progress is made in the truth everywhere, and we must buckle on the armor for greater conquests.

The Insensibility of the World to the Warning Voice of Christ.

If the prospect of the future be bright and consolatory to the true Christian, as ought it to be, dark and oppressive to the unbelieving and the impenitent. The glory of God will receive its twofold manifestation in the awards of justice, and in the gifts of mercy. The time of vindication at length will come. During many a long year the name of Christ has afforded occasion for the exercise of mockery, contempt, and superstition. Recognized in the theory of human societies, whether political or ecclesiastical, he is practically despised; and the principles of worldly policy supersede his counsels, and nullify his decisions. The majority of nominal Christians are utterly careless of their responsibility to his tribunal; and expect the course of the world still to proceed in the same manner as it has done from age to age.

In vain the Scriptures announce a limited period to the forbearance of God; in vain they call for repentance, and faith, and godliness; in vain they proclaim "a day in which God will judge the world in righteousness" by the august Ruler "whose goings forth are from everlasting;" "whereof God hath given the assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead." A death-like torpor and incredulity rests upon the human soul, and all the judgments and mercies of the Almighty make no impression. In private life tear chases tear, and death succeeds to death; but no man learns wisdom save the despised saint whom God deigns to enlighten and heal. In public life, wars and commotions, pestilence and earthquake, anarchy and blood, attest, during successive centuries, the controversy which God has with national impiety; but national reform, humiliation, and godliness, are conditions of public life unfelt, unseen, contemned.

If there be zeal for social rights—for mental freedom—for commercial greatness—for intellectual progress; it pauses short of the claims of God. Secularity pollutes the church; and while civil policy expands the enactments of legislation to the multiplied interests of the citizen, it contracts their influence over the acknowledged rights of God. On this theater of human action, man is everything, God is disregarded. His name is indeed upon their tongue, and his authority is registered upon the page of the public liturgy; but his will, his decisions, his warnings, and his promises, are matters of cold speculation or of excitement. In the day of sorrow, sickness, or death, there may be a transient reference to his mercy; but it is the refuse offering which the world will no longer ask for nor receive.

The approaching day of account, the government of the world in the hands of Christ, the results of his incarnation, his connection with mankind, his responsibility to him incurred by talent, wealth, rank, and power, these ideas are rejected as illiberal, onerous, and enthusiastic. The secondary interests of man chase his primary necessities from his sight, and three-score years of life are preferred to eternity. The care of the body is preferred to that of the soul; and the applause of man is deemed a brighter heritage than the enduring approbation of God.

It appalls the thoughtful mind to contemplate the fearful upshot of this state of human things. The day of God approaches; but where is the preparation for his advent?

When our Almighty Redeemer foretold his return in glory to the world, in which previously he had been rejected, he announced the very manifestations which we witness of this incredulity and contempt: "As the days of Noah, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be, for as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and knew not until the flood came and took them all away, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be."

The flood came upon the world unexpectedly, though the theme was of incessant prediction. During one hundred and twenty years did the warning voice of God utter its mournful accents, and entreat a cessation in the work of ungodliness and sin. The accents were scattered to the air; they reached no rebel heart of man. The shortness of time, the approach of death, the brooding darkness of the gathering storm, interrupted not the career of sensuality, the progress of licentiousness, nor the noise of sin. They ate, they drank; the harp and the viol, the tabret and pipe, and wine were in their feasts; they formed alliances; they built up many a domestic dwelling place; they coveted individual and national renown; but they regarded not the work of the Lord nor knew the operation of his hands. They ridiculed the prophetic word. They smiled in idle scorn, while the prophet built and surveyed his ark, the appointed refuge from the approaching wrath. But the insensibility of man delayed not the purpose of God; the neglected warning canceled not the recorded purpose; the mirth of the criminal arrested not the hand of the executioner; the horizon blackened; the tempest burst; and the teeming population lay buried beneath the waves!

And so it shall be, we are told by infallible authority, in the last judgment of the great day. The same insensibility; the same complacency in ungodly gratifications; the same oblivion of justice and mercy; the same contempt of divine law, and attachment to human schemes, will characterize the period of time, proximate to the second advent of Christ, as characterized the period antecedent to the terrific flood of Noah. It would be an awful employment to portray to the mind, with anything like historical accuracy, the tremendous alarm which must at length have seized upon the world, when the threatened judgment actually commenced; when the torrents of the skies and the tides of the ocean united their fearful strength; and by successive ravages marked out a storm unlike the wintry desolations of later years, a storm directed by the same Almighty hand which had hitherto restrained the furious elements, and made them subservient to human welfare. Creative power was now charged with retributive indignation, and the arm of God had shattered the schemes of man! The business of earth at length paused; the din of pleasure ceased; the strife of individuals was suspended; the politics of nations were arrested; all classes of society mingled together, appalled by a common ruin; the landmarks of property were annihilated; armies were useless; wealth was a name; and science a delusion. The avenging scourge of Omnipotence passed over the whole earth, and no criminal remained behind to tell the tale. Conviction came too late; remorse could be no substitute for repentance. The hour for contrition was forever gone.

And to this scene of utter disaster the Redeemer refers, in order to illustrate the consternation which will arrest an impenitent world when he shall return to the earth on which he has been so long despised.

The day of his advent will arrive, and who may abide his anger? Insensibility and scorn will characterize human society. The voice which warns will excite contempt; and the hand which, not in anger but in love, points to predicted judgments, will be met by no friendly eye. The business, pleasure, gains, and philosophy of life, will occupy the world, until the sign of the Son of man shall appear in the heavens, and the authority of Christ shall allow of scorn no more. It were fearful to portray that final alarm which will overwhelm a guilty world, when, too late for refusal, the cup of trembling is held to its lips!

The destruction and calamities of the last days of the times of the Gentiles are delineated on the page of Scripture with a force and energy calculated to shake to the foundation the strongest confidence of the world. But the men of this world will not read; they will not listen; they pursue the game of life, and sport upon the precipice of perdition!

True religion is despised, and the authority of the Son of God is forgotten. But the obduracy of man cannot invalidate the claims of God. The records of the Omniscient no human hands can erase; resisted or received, they hasten to their accomplishment. Would to God that the great and the rich of the earth, the wise and the intelligent—the princes and the prelates, the nobles and the clergy of every land—would that all to whom God has entrusted the use of power, and influence, and eloquence, and wealth, might remember the condition of man and the tribunal before which he must stand. And would that the mingled multitudes doomed to toil, obscurity and penury, might alike receive the message of the eternal world. Would that if any human being hitherto occupied but with the details of earth, should now scan these feeble lines, he might hear the warning voice, and remember the Savior of whom it speaks. Painful is it to think of a ruin in which no human skill can avert, of a degradation which no art of man can reclaim, of a waste for which no afterthrift can atone.

Whoso is wise will ponder these things, and he shall understand the loving kindness of the Lord.—Hon. G. T. Noel, A. M.

Bishop McQuaid on the Evils of the Day.

Bishop McQuaid, of Rochester, speaks severely on the evils of the day. The Bishop says: "The dangers from which the early settlers were exempt are now crowding on us. A population ashamed to work; large numbers of young men brought up in idleness in a country that has no place for drones; professional office-seekers, with education enough to be mischievous when not employed; frightful increase in the buying and selling of votes at the ballot-box, without shame on the part of the buyer or seller; peculation and the bartering of official patronage and influence among the highest officials of the Government; abounding immorality among the people; disregard of the indissolubility of the marriage tie, neglect of wholesome discipline in the family, and the consequent ill-directed training of children, tell us that the essential conditions of self-government are growing weak and passing away."

Those only live under God's protection that observe and follow his directions.

Those that are thankful for mercies received, may expect more to be more thankful for.

The Doom of Babylon.

O city of the seven hills,—
O Babylon the great!
The angel of the trumpet sounds
Thy fast-approaching fate.

Thy smile or frown, O guilty Queen,
Men neither court nor dread;
Thy curses uttered shall rebound
On thy own Gorgon head!

O city that so long hath ruled
Supreme o'er land and sea,
The drug you loved the world to drink,
Shall be wrung out for thee!

O skeleton of queenly power,
Dim phantom of the past,—
The horoscope foretold thy doom;
Thy life is waning fast.

The "mene tekel" on thy walls,
By mystic fingers traced,
In deep illuminated lines,
Can never be effaced.

Bounded of thy royal robes,
Uncrowned by God's decree,
The hurtling arrows of his wrath
Will soon descend on thee!

The Kellaway and Boardman Discussion.

This neat little volume of 148 pages on "The Separate States," bound in cloth, at fifty-five cents per copy, at the RESTITUTION office, has been placed in my hands to read and notice. I have read connectedly about one-half of it, and sketched the remainder. I have met with volumes more ponderous, and of course more exhaustive on some points than this, yet with none more simple, and easy, with none more Christian like, with none more free from useless epithets toward an opponent. Just as all religious debates should be conducted, this seems to have been conducted, not for victory, but for the purpose of eliciting truth. If we were to hold a written discussion this is just such an one as we would like for it to be; and these are just such men in deportment as we would like to have for opponents.

As a specimen of the manner and matter of the work we give below their argument for, and against, the first proposition, drawn from a noted text of Scripture. G. M. MYERS.

MATT. x: 28.

BETA—(Boardman)—Man cannot by any possibility "kill the soul;" only God can do it in Gehenna, not Hades. The confusion of Hades with Gehenna in our authorized version is something sad, and terribly misleads the ignorant, as you who can read the original well know. p. 14.

When I stated in my last, that man cannot by any possibility 'kill the soul' (Matt. x: 28), only God can do it in Gehenna, not Hades, I have made, I believe, an unanswerable statement. p. 22.

ALPHA—(Kellaway)—The principal passage in Beta's argument,—one on which I think he would be willing to rest his entire case,—which he regards as a very Gibraltar to his whole position,—a passage from which he has made a statement and repeated it, calling it unanswerable, is Matt. x: 28: "Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear Him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." These are the utterances which to Beta's mind are the end of all controversy, and assert by the easiest inference the continued life of the soul apart from the body.

Now while I believe this passage quite as firmly as Beta, I understand it very differently from what he does. And my understanding of it I think to have the advantage of his in three important particulars: 1. That I do not have to contradict other Scripture on the same point; 2. That it removes the great uncertainty of intermediate life; 3. That it enables me to give to the resurrection that importance which Holy Scripture gives to it. I will elaborate the first of these points. It is, that looking at the passage in another way from Beta, I do not have to contradict Scripture, which Beta does. I affirm, Beta has to entirely silence the testimony of other portions of God's Word by his interpretation of this passage. If I can prove this to the satisfaction of my readers, I have raised one of the greatest reasons why his interpretation should be abandoned as unsound.

Scripture, in other parts of the testimony, tells us distinctly that the soul of man CAN be and has been killed. It tells us that it CAN die, and HAS been destroyed by the hand of man. Scripture history is most explicit on this point,—it utters the fact with the greatest assurance. In Scripture we read of souls living and dying; of souls smitten and killed; of souls dead and in their graves; of souls redeemed and brought up out of their graves. Let us refer to some of these.

First, to the possibility of the continued life of the soul in some instances of Bible history (teaching, of course, the possibility of its death if the means of preservation were not at hand). Abram said to Sarai his wife, "Say, I pray thee [to the king of Egypt], that thou art my sister, . . . and my soul shall live." (Gen. xii: 13.) Lot said to the angel hurrying from the doomed Sodom, "Let us escape thither [to Zoar], and my soul shall live." (Gen. xix: 20.) In Psa. lxvi: 9 also, we read of God "holding our soul in life."

And souls die, according to the following Scriptures. The wicked Balaam prayed, "Let my soul die [margin] the death of the righteous." (Num. xxiii: 10.) And Samson, in the house of Dagon, asked of God this petition, "Let my soul die with the Philistines." (Judges xvi: 30.)

And souls can be destroyed by the sword. "Joshua took Hazor and smote the king thereof, and all the souls that were therein, with the edge of the sword, utterly destroying them; there was not any left to breathe." (Josh. xi: 11.) See also, as passages of the same import, Josh. x: 28, 30, 32, 35, 37, 39.

And souls become dead. "All the days that he [the Nazarite] separateth himself unto the Lord he shall come at no dead body" (Hebrew, soul). (Num. vi: 6.) "There were certain men who were defiled with the dead body [Hebrew, soul] of a man." (Num. ix. 6.) See also the 7th and 10th verses of the same chapter.

Souls, by God's mercy, are preserved from going into the grave. "Thou hast kept me alive, that I should not go down to the pit" (Psa. xxx: 3.) "God will redeem my soul from the hand of the grave." (Psa. xlix: 15.) Hezekiah, the good king, acknowledged the mercy of God, after He had restored him to health, in the following language:—Thou hast, in love to my soul, delivered it from the pit of corruption." (Isa. xxxviii: 17.) And there is such a thing as saving a soul from death. (James v: 20.)

I have quoted all the above passages of Scripture to show that the soul can be preserved in life, or it can die by natural causes. That it can be destroyed by the sword. That it can become dead. That it goes into the grave and perishes. And that its redemption is from thence, and no otherwhere. And all this is Scripture. It is just as much Scripture as Matt. x: 28. Moreover, part of it is written in the law.

Now I believe these texts to be true—as true as Matt. x: 28. But if "kill" be understood as of exactly the same force in each passage, there is a contradiction, one at least, in the Word of God,—a variance which all the ingenuity of man cannot reconcile, and all the piety of a saint cannot ignore. But it is a long foregone conclusion that the Bible is not self-contradictory. A "yea" and a "nay" from the mouth of God is impossible. So, I say there must be a sense in which Matt. x: 28 is true, but it is not Beta's sense, the other Scriptures rendering such a construction impossible, because inconsistent with the harmony of revelation.

Hence I understand Matt. x: 28 to teach that God only can kill a man absolutely and for ever,—God only can destroy completely, and place beyond the possibility of a resurrection. Man can kill the soul for the time being,—he can destroy life temporarily,—but he cannot so kill as to destroy the capacity for receiving life again; and thus he cannot "kill" the soul in that extensive sense in which the word is used in the Gospel as recorded by Matthew.

Further, this interpretation receives countenance from the fact that even the New Testament teaches that the soul can in some sense be destroyed by man. This does not appear in our English version; but I give a few cases to substantiate my statement, knowing that every Greek scholar will confirm me in what I say. The word for soul in Matt. x: 28 is (psuchen.) Now psuchen occurs in other passages in which it is considered as destructible. Herod sought Jesus' soul (psuchen), to destroy it. Matt. ii: 13, 20: see Greek. Jesus, when he would heal the man with the withered hand, asked the question of those who watched Him, that they might accuse him of breaking the law, "Is it lawful to do good on the Sabbath days or to do evil? to save life (psuchen, soul), or to kill?"—the same word as used in Matt. x: 28. (See Mark iii: 4, and Luke vi. 9: In the latter passage the question is, "To save soul, or destroy it?") There are other passages of a similar nature, passages which show beyond a question that to some extent and for some space of time the soul can be destroyed by men, either by direct violence, or such neglect as leaves it to perish. But there are also passages which teach that no man can kill the soul absolutely and eternally, as God will the souls of the ungodly in Gehenna; and Matt. x: 28 is one of them.

So I conclude that this saying of our Lord's, to which I have given much space and more than usual attention, does not support Beta's notion of a separate state of conscious, intelligent soul-life during death.

Morality in Words.

Has man fallen, and deeply fallen, from the heights of his original creation? We need no more than his language to prove it. Like everything else about him, it bears at once the stamp of his greatness and of his degradation, of his glory and of his shame. What dark and sombre threads he must have woven into the tissue of his life, before we could trace such dark ones running through the tissue of his language! What facts of wickedness and we must have existed in the first, ere there could be such words to designate these as are found in the last. There have been always those who have sought to make light of the hurts which man has inflicted on himself, of the sickness of which he is sick; who would fain persuade themselves and others that moralists and divines, if they have not quite invented, have yet enormously exaggerated, these. But are these statements found only in Scripture and in sermons? Are there not mournful corroborations of their truth imprinted deeply upon every region of man's natural and spiritual life, and on none more deeply than on his language?

It needs no more than to open a dictionary, and to cast our eye thoughtfully down a few columns, and we shall find abundant confirmation of this sadder and sterner estimate of man's moral and spiritual condition. How else shall we explain this long catalogue of words, having all to do with sin, or with sorrow, or with both? How came they there? We may be quite sure that they were not invented without being needed, that they have each a correlative in the world of realities. And indeed, as regards abundance, it is a melancholy thing to observe how much richer is every vocabulary in words that set forth sins, than in those that set forth graces. When St. Paul (Gal. v. 19-23), would put these against those, "the works of the flesh" against "the fruit of the Spirit," those are seventeen, these only nine; and where do we find in Scripture such lists of graces, as we do at 2 Tim. iii. 2; Rom. i. 29-31, of their opposites?—Trench.

Hebron.

No city on earth can claim such a long continuous history as Hebron; certainly the oldest populated city in Palestine, if not in the world. Before Rome, or Ninevah, or Thebes, Hebron was. It is mentioned even before Damascus, and on the best authority, "was built seven years before Zoan in Egypt," the Tanis of the Greeks. Zoan has been in ruins for 2,000 years, its very site is in dispute, whilst Hebron looks as fresh and thriving as any modern oriental city. It appears also, to have had a still more remote antiquity, being originally known as Kirjath-arba—the "City of Arba," the father of Anak, from whom sprang the powerful race of giants that occupied the land in the days of Joshua and Caleb.

It is difficult to conceive of a community existing through so many ages, marked by so many social, religious, and political changes. Of a city, still astir with life, that must have been standing long before Christ was born, before Joseph was sold to the Ishmaelites, and before a verse in the Bible was written; and the possibility of identifying after so long a period the city where David was crowned king over all Israel, the valley where the spies cut the great "cluster of grapes," the plain where the tent of Abraham was pitched when he entertained the angels, and the very cave of Machpelah where the ashes of the Patriarchs repose, seems incredulous. And yet, all these places so fraught with interest are still here, and may be visited any day.

Hebron is beautifully situated in the valley of Eshcol, among olive groves and vineyards, and near the summit of the highest ranges of the Judean Mountains. This fruitful valley is still noted for its fine grapes, and single "clusters" may still be found here, that would require two men to carry.

The present name of the city was probably given in compliment to Abraham, the Arabic meaning of Hebron being the City of the "Friend of God," Abraham having settled here soon after parting with his nephew Lot on their return from Egypt. Here he abode for many years, here Isaac also lived, and here Sarah died.

The associations of the place were enough to inspire the heart of the venerable Caleb with courage, and it is no wonder, after the conquests of the country, having the first choice of the whole land, he selected this, the roughest portion, as an inheritance for himself and family.

The wicked will at last be made to feel what they will not now believe and fear.

Errata.

In report of committee on organization, article xiv., fifth line, for "public churches," read feeble churches.

Art. xv, 5th line, for "affairs." read officers.

In my article to Brother Foster, second line, for "church," read churches.

Seventh line, for "an association," read one association.

Instead of "As to the Free Masons and secret society men generally in sympathy with my opponent," read: As to the Free Masons and secret society men generally in the in sympathy with my opponent, &c. The remark was intended for that class at the institution only. It may be true elsewhere—it was true there.

For "man catechists," read men-atertain.

Next column, seventh line from the top, for "pro slack al," read pro-nounced.

Third line from the bottom of the article, for "when" read where.

BUSINESS DEPARTMENT.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

G. M. Myers will visit for the purpose of holding meetings—

Dixon, Ill., Sept. 9 and 10.
Lanark, Ill., Sept. 14 and 15.
West Liberty, Iowa, Sept. 21—27.
At the Wisconsin conference, Sept. 29 to Oct. 2.
Leroy, Mich., Oct. 6 to 15.
At any point on Brother Miller may arrange, Oct. 15 to 29.

Since the recent decease of Brother Wilson, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, that the church of Christ in that city find it impossible under the circumstances to which they are placed, to entertain the annual conference in their city, the church at Baltimore has resolved to invite all those of like precious faith who have been baptized, believing in the Gospel of the Kingdom of God, to meet in our city (Baltimore), to break bread with us and drink wine in celebration of the death and resurrection of our Lord on the first Sunday of October. Meetings of the church will commence on the Saturday afternoon previous, September 30.

We especially hope that the brethren on the Atlantic coast will make an EXTRA EFFORT to attend these meetings. The date mentioned has been decided upon that those of our brethren and sisters from the Western states who purpose visiting the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia may have an opportunity to arrange their visit so as to pass through to Baltimore in time for these meetings. We trust that all that can come will come, and we will spare no pains to make their stay pleasant and profitable.

It is very important that all brethren coming to these meetings should communicate their invitation at least three days prior to September 30, that the proper arrangements may be made for their reception; also what train they will arrive on, that we may meet them at the depot. Please address all letters pertaining to the meeting to F. G. WELLER, W. Baltimore street, Baltimore, where also any stranger brother may come if not met at the depot.

Secretary of the Conference.

All brethren and sisters who purpose to attend the Baltimore conference are especially requested to arrange their visit so as to arrive in this city not later than Saturday afternoon, September 30, at supper will be spread in the hall at 6 o'clock, and the first meeting will be held at 7 o'clock punctually. Also we are anxious that all who are coming should be on hand at the opening.

Also, for the greater comfort of the visitors, and those who have the care of the arrangements, the brethren and sisters are requested to inform the undersigned, by letter, at least three days before the meeting, (and if possible earlier) what line of railroad and what train they intend to come on.

Married brethren will please state if their wives will accompany them.

As we have reason to expect a large gathering, strict attention to these preliminaries will enable us to provide suitable lodging, and will add greatly to the general comfort.

We again call attention to the fact that the committee of reception will be distinguished by a strip of white ribbon attached to the lappel of the coat. But if from any cause brethren should fail to recognize them, please enquire for me, during the day at 218 West Baltimore street, or during the night at 128 East Monument street. If brethren arrive on Saturday evening, they will please find the hall at the North-west corner of Pearl and Lexington streets.

N. B.—All are requested to bring their hymn books.

THOS. C. WEBB.

The annual conference of Northern Illinois and Southern Wisconsin, will convene September 22, 1876, at 7:30 o'clock p. m., at the Fairfield school house, Green county, Wisconsin, and continue over Sunday.

Those coming by rail on the Western Union, should write to Aaron McCauley, Rock Grove, Stephenson county, Ill. and they will get all at Darwin.

Those coming to Judah should write to Cary Noble, Twin Grove, Green county, Wis.

Brother Myers will be expected at this meeting.

J. S. ARMOUR, Pres.

There will be a quarterly meeting of the Michigan conference, at Jamestown, commencing Friday evening, Oct. 6, and concluding over Sunday.

Brother H. V. Reed and Brother G. M. Myers have agreed to be in attendance. A full attendance is earnestly solicited. Those coming from the south on the G. R. & I. R. R., will stop off at Ross, at about 4 p. m. Those coming from the north will take the Chicago & M. L. R. road to Grand Rapids, at 11 a. m., and stop off at Hudsonville. Teams will be at the station on Friday, at the time of the arrival of the trains to convey to the place of meeting.

By order of the Ex. Board.

JOEL A. SIMONDS.

The annual conference of the Church of God in Iowa will convene at Friday, Tama Co., Iowa, on Thursday evening, Sept. 21, 1876, and will continue over the following Sunday. Those wishing to come by rail will stop off at Belle Plaine, where they will find teams to convey them to the place of meeting. Come, brethren to this meeting, and let us all show by our works that we have a faith that works by love and purifies the heart. Then let us never fear God, if our motto is to do good, that less is greater than faith or hope.

J. T. PRICE, President.

JOHN PRICE, Secretary.

Centennial Number of the Restitution.

It has been decided best to issue a Centennial number of the RESTITUTION, wherein is to be set forth our faith and hope upon the great questions of Bible truth. Those who have heretofore contributed to the Tract Fund, will find the amount credited under this head. It is to be hoped that every brother will give something toward this Bible effort in let the light of the glorious Gospel shine into the hearts of men. No people have so much truth and do so little. Why is it? Let every one do his duty. God will bless you.

Put Your Name on this List.

Recently quite a number of brethren have concluded that an easy and effectual way to get the truth before the minds of the people is to send them the RESTITUTION for three months. This is a good decision. It is almost impossible for the paper to be received and read by any household for three months without its making an impression upon their minds for good. So send on your names and money. We hope to have a goodly number report. The following is a list of those we already have above referred to:

Valuable English Works.

Our readers are informed that we expect shortly to have for sale the works mentioned below. Orders and remittances for the same may be sent at once to this office.

Discussion on the State of the Dead. Between the Rev. W. C. Bradbury, Congregational minister, and W. Kellaway, editor of Bible Echo, and infidel ter of the Gospel. Both of England. The propositions discussed were: 1. That the dead exist in a living, conscious state after their decease. Affirmed by W. C. B. 2. That the Scriptures teach that men in death are wholly unconscious, insensible, and unable to perform any act whatever; and that they rest in darkness, silence and the dust. Cloth, bevelled boards, well bound, 85c; postage 10c. Paper cover, 35c; postage 5c.

Duration and Nature of Future Punishment. By Rev. H. Constable, M. A. late Prebendary of Cork, Ireland. 320 pp. An elaborate argument touching the punishment of the unsaved. It is particularly fine in its philological chapters respecting the meaning of the Greek words used by the inspired writers to indicate the doom of the lost. Price $1; postage 12c.

"We hail this book with truly satisfaction. Undoubtedly the subject which it treats with such an attractive combination of learning and modesty, of power and reverence, has laid hold of the minds of many of the most thoughtful Christian men of our day. Its growth, from a pamphlet in the first edition to a handsome volume of three hundred and thirty pages in the fourth, is conclusive proof that the question discussed is one of profound importance.....We trust the compliments the publishers on the tasteful and handsome dress in which they present the book to the public, and express the hope that the necessary sanity will speedily be much more than recovered by the large sale of a work which must take a standard place in this palsiedly misunderstood department of Christian theology.—The Rainbow.

Hades; or, The Intermediate State of Man. Crown 8vo, 2d edition. Price $1.25; postage 10c.

This work presents the Bible doctrine of the state of man between death and the resurrection.

"Mr. Constable has, in a series of works, devoted much labor and research to establishing from Scripture and other sources the real nature of the future state; and the present book is the result of his labors. His active labors on one special point. His argument is supported by no little learning, a keen logic, and a clear and available style. There is a good deal to be said for the general doctrines propounded."—Nonconformist.

"It is characterized by his usual vigor of thought and clearness of expression. To all inquirers after truth, rather than of tradition, we cordially commend the treatise."—The Church Messenger.

Bible Echo. Volume I, May to December, edited by W. Kellaway. The only English weekly that advocates the ancient Gospel. Sound volume of numbers of the Bible Echo, containing important news and discussions on vital matters, and the latest movements in the spread of the scriptural doctrine of immortality. Price $1.15.

Bible Echo. Vol. II, January to June, 1875. This is a continuation of the above for the period plated. Price $2.

Bible Echo. Vol. III, July to September, 1875. This completes the Bible Echo as a weekly newspaper, and also finishes the old series. Price $1.75.

Bible Echo. New Series. Monthly numbers from October, 1875. The yearly subscription for this magazine, including the 3 months of last year, is $3 50.

New Facts Upon all Subjects. By the author of "Enquire Within Upon Everything." Useful to the physician, the artist, the chemist, the engineer, the manufacturer, the agriculturist, the gardener, and the housekeeper. 324 pp. Price 60c; postage 10c.

A New Work by Mrs. H. V. Reed.

Harvest Words for Heart Service. Nearly 368 pp. Well printed on heavy toned paper, neatly bound in cloth. Price 80c; postage 8c.

"The book is one of the most satisfactory of its kind that could be written; indeed we know of none either in every way so pleasing to those who see the necessity of maintaining the Bible as a revelation from God, or which we would be more glad, if the title page bore our name instead of that of the estimable and talented lady, the authoress. Her 'Bible Triumphant' was a good work, and it is, we know, warmly appreciated by many; but this work, we regret, to say, so much surpasses it, that it would be to the interests of the cause we have at heart, if everybody should possess a copy."—Ill. Bible Echo.

Bible Telephone. A new supply is expected. Price, paper covers, 50c, cloth 75c.

Griesbach, with interlineary word for word English translation; a new Emphatic Version, based on the interlineary translation, on the rendering of eminent critics, and on the various readings of the Vatican Manuscript, (No. 1,209 in the Vatican Library), together with illustrative and explanatory notes, and copious selected set of references, to the whole of which is added a valuable alphabetical appendix. 12 mo. 1,000 pages, bound neatly in cloth. Price $3. Extra bound, $5.

The Three Watchwords.

ALFRED NORRIS.

To Work, to Watch, to Wait;
Ah, me! the fiery sun,
The level, treeless, barren, dew-drained fields—
I would the work were done!

To Watch, to Work, to Wait;
Ah, me! the restless roar
Of wreck-strewn oceans roofed with sombre clouds—
I would the Watch were o'er.

To Wait, to Work, to Watch;
Ah, me! thou absent Friend,
Come thou quickly? So thou exhort: I would
The Waiting hath an end.

My soul be still and strong;
Sight follows after faith.
In all advancement of the true and good,
He cometh as he saith.

My soul be still and strong;
Here on thy Lord's estate
No place is useless, no experience vain.
Work on, Watch on, and Wait.

"The Rich Man and Lazarus."

Preface to an Exposition of the Parable.

It is claimed by some, that parables are built upon facts, and therefore this parable is claimed to be founded on the doctrine of the consciousness of the dead, and that Jesus believed and advocated this doctrine. But the facts are, the Jews that refused faith in Jesus believed said doctrine, (see Josephus) and Jesus founds the doctrine of God's (national) punishment upon their false belief, and thus shows them and all others that understand him, the result of their unbelief and opposition to him, and facts which are stubborn things, show and prove a literal and national fulfillment in the present dispensation of Jehovah's dealings in Jewish history of affairs.

I will now give a brief summary of the important points of the subject, without reference to proof, either argumentative or Scriptural. But sustained by bold asseverations and assumptions, such as we generally get in modern times from the pulpit. On nearly all doctrinal subjects treated, contained in, and supported by the creeds of human origin and tradition, that now fill the land like the frogs of Egypt.

1. Dr. Luke's report shows a crowd around Jesus of interested hearers, consisting of publicans and sinners, murmuring scribes and Pharisees.

2. To silence those muttering murmurers, Jesus spoke the two parables of the lost sheep and lost silver, to a promiscuous crowd.

3. To show his mission of mercy from heaven was to the lost and degraded, who will repent and come, and not, as they poor, self-righteous, self-convicted, covetous, outside murmuring scribe and Pharisee brothers, might suppose, only to the seed of Abraham, who claimed to be already safely in the fold, He gave them the parable of the prodigal son and his murmuring brother.

4. To convince them of their guilt before God in violating his law, by going to the Romans and Spartans, to form alliances with those corrupt nations, He gave them the parable of the unjust steward, and hinted their removal out of the stewardship.

5. His teaching being contrary to their will, and also a rebuke to their conduct in a public manner, they belched out at him in public derision, thinking thereby to avoid public stigma.

6. He plainly tells them that as God knows all hearts, He is not deceived, and that they cannot serve God and mammon at the same time.

7. That the law, or old covenant was preached until John, and that the new covenant, and himself its mediator, since the days of John.

8. That the law was of divine appointment to an end, and was the covenant wife until fulfilled; but that it was now to die by statute limitation, and they as the unjust steward, (nationally), were to die with it.

9. That in the past dispensation, they, as Abraham's seed, and the depository of God's oracles, were greatly exalted; but now, 1. By making void the law covenant, while it was in force; and 2. By rejecting him and the Gospel covenant as presented by him, they were doubly guilty of adultery (morally) as illustrated by the marriage covenant violated, between a man and his wife. Verse 18.

10. As without a parable he spake not, to those without, and as his address is now directed to the Pharisees, in a promiscuous congregation, we, therefore, not to impeach his word, are bound to admit that what follows is a parable, and as really so as the first four of his discourse.

11. The parabolic nature of the text, Luke xvi. 19-29, being established, we affirm that the figuration rich man, is the old law covenant of a past dispensation, including the nation of men that were under it, and that once operated it, and also in the days of Christ, namely, "once" the twelve tribes, but in Christ's day, Judah and Benjamin.

12. His clothing, the fine linnen represents him in the past, righteous in the sight of God, and so they, and also the law were, in all its institutions and their national deeds, until, as such, they had sinned.

13. The sumptuous fare was the providential protection and beneficence of their husband, Jehovah of hosts, by the old covenant, who, when they kept the law, He sent his angels to defend them.

14. Lazarus, the ulcerated beggar, is the purely idolatrous system of Gentile religion, in a national point of view, embracing the people with no pure system of religion in the past Levitical dispensation.

15. His laying at the rich man's gate is the Gentiles occupying the court of the Gentiles at the Jewish temple in olden times.

16. The crumbs that he then desired is the word of God, that the rich man kept in trust as Jehovah's steward, and this was all the means that the idolatrous heathen had at that time of obtaining the knowledge and blessings of God in a religious way.

17. The dogs that lick his sores are the missionaries of the Samaritans, who, being partly instructed in the worship of Jehovah, by the law of Moses, worshiped idols in common with the one God of Israel.

18. The licking his sores is their attempts to convert the Gentiles according to the law and the worship of of God, which forbid idolatry.

19. The death of the beggar is the cessation of his former condition in a religious, and also a national respect, and took effect when Peter and Paul went and preached to the Gentiles.

20. His being carried to Abraham's bosom, is the Gentiles embracing the Gospel of Christ as the covenant of God with Abraham.

21. The angels that performed the work are the ministers of the Gospel, namely, the apostles of Christ, sent to the Gentiles to announce glad tidings of salvation.

22. The rich man's death is the destruction of the temple worship and the end of the national covenant relation between God and the Jews by the old covenant, by the national war with their chosen king and Roman ally, to whom they sent embassadors first (and contrary to law) in the high priesthood of Judas Macabees.

23. His burial is the dispersion of that nation into all lands and countries, a complete overthrow (by the Romans) and burial of their kingdom, and all the national institutions of the old covenant.

24. His hell, (hades, Greek,) or dead state, is their present national condition as has obtained with them since their kingdom was destroyed from off the earth.

25. His torments in the flames of hell are the righteous and national judgment of God executed by the rich man's chosen agent, Rome, the fourth empire of the Gentiles.

26. His seeing Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom, is the Jews, now seeing that the Gentiles claim to be, and are by faith in Jesus Christ the seed of Abraham by covenanted relation, and that they themselves as a nation, are broken off and far removed.

27. They also see that while they are experiencing the curse as predicted by Moses for their sins, the Gentiles share the blessings of God as promised to Abraham by the Gospel call to the Gentiles of the present dispensation.

28. The bosom of Abraham in the figure, is literally the covenant of God with Abraham, confirmed by oath in Jesus Christ, forming the two immutable things as a basis of the Gospel hope, that is like an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast.

29. His crying to Abraham from his tomb, and their national hell of punishment for aid to mitigate his exquisite misery, is the Jewish nation in their dispersion, asking Jehovah as Abraham's seed, and in his name, for a relaxation of their (just) retribution and the coming of their long-looked for Messiah to accomplish it.

30. Although the Jews deny the true Messiah, who is now head over all things to the Gospel church and Gentile religion in this dispensation, yet they virtually and unwittingly ask for the things desired through Jesus our Messiah, as our Messiah is and will prove to be theirs, and is in the figure the Lazarus of the parable since he (Lazarus) was taken to Abraham's bosom. The Jews cannot be heard in the name of Abraham, but would be in the name of Jesus.

31. Abraham calls him son, and a parable will not allow us to say his individual son, but a figurative son, and that is either a Gentile Christian as Abraham's seed, or a national son of the tribes of Jacob, as a Christian would not be a subject of punishment, it is not, and cannot be such a figurative son.

32. Such son as a dead nation, and buried by dispersions, can remember the good things they had in their life time (which is the Levitical dispensation in this case) and also the degraded condition of the Gentiles at the court of their temple beseeching their pity.

33. But the Bible declares that the literally dead remember nothing, as in death the organs of the mind cannot eliminate a single thought, but its attributes literally and absolutely perish.

34. The dead nation can also, in its dispersion, reflect on their own condition, by their God giving them up to Rome their chosen king and ally, and also upon the comfort of the Gentile nations that believe in Jesus, who as the true Messiah offered to save them.

35. Abraham advertises his praying son of the impassable gulf between them, which on the part of the (national) Jewish side, is unbelief in Jesus, and on the side of the Abrahamic covenant, is faith in Christ unto salvation, to every one, or nation that fear God and obey his Gospel: two systems of religion as diametrically opposed to each other, can never become one and the same religion.

36. The parable contemplates national systems and events, and to interpret it of individuals and their actions, whether of Jesus or others, is to destroy its figuration and parabolic sense, and hence to pervert the text altogether; and how many do it with no consciousness of their guilt.

37. As this praying son of Abraham wishes aid for the brethren of his fathers house, he must refer to the house and family of Jacob, and to his brethren the ten tribes, who were taken captive by the king of Assyria over 700 years B. C., and over 100 before the Babylonish captivity.

38. As the rich man is the two tribes of Jacob's family, so the other ten are, by the same rule of interpretation, the five brethren; and so the whole "house," or family of Jacob are included.

39. The rich man wishes his brothers warned lest (literally) they come into the same captivity by his example of unbelief.

40. The ten tribes were relieved of their captivity by the decrees of Cyrus, Darius and Artaxerxes, who were all Persian emperors and universal kings; therefore, although captives at first, were not national captives at the time of this parable.

41. He is informed that his brethren have Moses and the Prophets. If they disbelieve them, they cannot receive any help from him, through the agency of Lazarus, any more than the rich man himself can.

42. Nay, says the rich man, but if one went unto them from the dead, (take notice, not from heaven, nor from paradise, but from the dead) they will repent.

43. The Savior shows here at the end of the parables in a literal manner, that men abandoned by God, are inclined to seek to the dead instead of seeking to God's inspiration, by Moses and the Prophets.

44. He also shows them that an unbelieving heart can resist any evidence, when it is hardened in sin, and that it resists the word of God with deliberation and determination.

45. He in after time, demonstrates to them the truth of his statement relative to one raised from the dead, by raising a dead Lazarus personally and showing him to them. Did they then believe? They did not, for they hated Jesus, and had not believed Moses and the Prophets that wrote and testified of Jesus being the true Messiah.

46. As Moses, the Prophets, Christ and his apostles, or in other words the Gospel is still the chosen power of God unto salvation of all that believe it; and as no unbeliever of the same can have its salvation, and also that the typical nation fell in the wilderness because of unbelief. Consider the awful nature of unbelief and the severity of God on all that fell, and also fall by its inexcusable wickedness. O may we all take timely warning and flee its bane, as the poison of asps, by believing firmly, and in the detail, both the promise and the oath, as the two immutable things that are unfailing, believing that Jesus will in the world (or age) to come possess the gate of his enemies according to, and also on account of the promise and the oath, thus confirms it.

Even so come Lord Jesus, and reign, that we may reign with thee.

C. F. SWEET.

P. S.—To the Editors of the Restitution:—I have had the manuscript fully written out, containing thirty-eight pages of fools cap, and six pages of important Jewish history, together with the six pages of recapitulation that I herein send you for publication, for now about three years, and not feeling myself able to pay, and not being willing to involve myself without means to pay, and at the same time so much said and published on the subject and the reflection that the masses did not know, and would not believe if told so in brief, that my exposition was superior to any yet published, and the result would be, if I published it and made a debt thereby, I could not sell enough to pay the printers bill as I ought. Well, I now wish you to publish this recapitulation of six pages and the following.

To our Brethren:—I publish here a recapitulation of thirty-eight pages, Scripturally and argumentatively written, in six pages, and I do so that you may see how I understand and expound the parable; and also that if you wish, and will do so, I will send any amount of books you may subscribe and pay for, at the printers cost, (except plates) for an edition of 500 or 1,000, if enough is subscribed to make the first edition that much. I think that an edition of 1,000, with plates, perhaps, may cost $125, and I will take the stock of ten, $10.00. Who will take the rest? or, if they do not wish the full amount in pamphlets and will assist to get them published, let them send to the RESTITUTION, or to me at Albion, Orleans county, N. Y., what they will do, and their will shall be respected and a report duly made in the RESTITUTION. C. F. S.

The Sabbath.

Many, doubtless, engage in Sabbath keeping through deception. Some that we have talked with, have argued, that inasmuch as God gave Adam a commandment to rest on the Seventh Day; therefore, it is the duty of all men, Gentiles as well as Jews, to rest on that day.

We find in their works, that Sabbath keepers assume that God gave Adam such commandment. In a work entitled "Truth Found," by J. H. Waggoner, we read—in it, (the Bible,) we are taught,—

1. That God made the world in six days.

2. He rested on the Seventh Day.

3. He blessed, sanctified, or hallowed, the Seventh Day.

4. He commanded that the Seventh Day be kept holy.

This language, though literally true, is calculated to deceive the careless reader, bringing into close relationship, as it does, occurrences that were 2500 years apart, and intimating that they occurred at the same time.

Here is another from another author. "The former covenant referred to, was with Israel, at the time of their deliverance from Egypt, 2500 years after the Sabbath was instituted and enforced.

Q. How does Mr. Wardner know that Sabbath keeping was enforced at, and from creation?

The point to be proved is entirely assumed, and on this assumption, he builds his theory.

In the sixteenth of Exodus, 2500 years after creation, we find the first commandment given to any one to keep Sabbath. And it is given under circumstances, showing that it was here first made known to the children of Israel. Moses, (it would seem,) had told the manna gatherers, to gather only as much each day as would suffice for that day; but on the sixth day, the rulers discovered that the laborers were gathering a double portion; so they came and told Moses. This proves that the rulers knew nothing of any Sabbath commandment, until Moses told them on the sixth day of the manna. It was not their business to gather manna, consequently Moses did not tell them about the Sabbath until they asked him.

In Deut. v. 15, we learn the reason why God required the children of Israel to keep the Sabbath. They had been servants in Egypt, and had been brought out through a mighty hand and a stretched out arm, "therefore" ——. Let us here inquire, which, among the notable events of God's miracle working power was the Sabbath instituted to celebrate? We answer, feeding the children of Israel on angels food, was an event worthy a memorial, that should refresh their minds one day in seven throughout their generations, "therefore, the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the sabbath day." The Sabbath, therefore was a sign or remembrance, that the Lord fed them on angels food.

In noticing the new covenant of Jer. xxxi., Mr. Wardner says: "But Paul says, (Rom. iii. 31), that we do not make void the law of God through faith. He evidently referred to the same law spoken of here in Jeremiah, which God promised to write in the hearts of his people,—i. e., the Decalogue—which was to be accomplished through faith in Christ; so that, by their fruits they might be known to be his children. This could not be, if there was no written law with which men could compare their conduct." Then, according to Mr. Wardner, the Decalogue or ten commandments was what God promised to write in the hearts of his people. He says, furthermore, "Every regenerate soul has this law of God written in his heart." "This is what constitutes the difference between the regenerate and the unregenerate."

Here we find that Sabbath keepers claim the Decalogue or ten commandments as a touch-stone of Christianity; and the keeping or desecration of them a criterion by which it may be known whether a man has been regenerated or not. In other words keeping the ten commandments, is the fruit of the Spirit. But Paul says, "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance. Not one of these can be found in the Decalogue; and yet, forsooth, the keeping of the Decalogue is the test of Christianity. There is not one commandment in the Decalogue that any unregenerate soul cannot keep, or that is not found upon the statute book of every state of this American Union, except perhaps the first and second.

But let us notice the new covenant of Jer. xxxi. The Lord says, that the new covenant shall not be according to the old. Sabbath Keepers will please notice that little negative adverb not in there; although they say the new shall be a transcript of the old, the Lord says, the new covenant shall not be like the old. What was the old covenant? Ans. The Decalogue. What was the new to be? Written in the heart. The Savior defines it to be love to God and love to man. This is the foundation principle of all the law and the Prophets. And we notice, that there is not a particle of love in the ten commandments, neither love to God or love to man. It is generally made up of, "Thou shalt not." Evidently a curb bit of restraint upon a stiff necked people. The whole subject seems to hinge right in the new covenant, since they have failed to find any commandment given to Adam to keep Sabbath, the Sabbath by some means must be tortured into the new covenant, and this they do by transcribing it into the new, when God says, the new shall not be like the old.

Paul says, Heb. viii. 6, that "Christ is the mediator of a better covenant," also, that the old covenant was faulty. Let us here stop and enquire: In what was the old covenant faulty? Would God make a covenant with his people, and leave a screw loose or a bar down? In short, will God give a commandment that it is not right to keep? The old covenant was all right when he gave it, and to whom he gave it, and could be kept in Palestine, where only it was designed to be kept, and where only it could be kept, and as the new covenant was designed to go into all the world and be preached to every creature; therefore the faulty part of the old covenant was designedly left out and not used in the establishment of the new covenant. The fourth commandment we regard as the faulty part of the old covenant, not faulty in Palestine, but faulty in and contiguous to the Arctic region where it cannot be kept. Dr. Kane, in his voyage to the Arctic region says, "The sun ceased to rise after the 13th of November. After that, the east was as dark at nine in the morning as at midnight."

Again, he says: "On the 29th of January the sun arose above the horizon after an absence of 86 days." We now begin to see why the old covenant was not faultless. The new covenant was designed to be preached in all the world, as far as human foot has trod the soil, yet Sabbath, beginning and ending at sun-down as it did, cannot be kept where there is no sun-down for 86 consecutive days. Tell me not, that God has made a law, and commanded me to obey that law, when a law of nature directly forbids my keeping that law.

Christ said, Matt. v. 17: "Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the Prophets; I am not come to destroy but to fulfill." Paul says, Christ was made under the law, therefore it was necessary that he should keep the law, for the law was of full force and binding until it was nailed to the cross, and taken out of the way. If Christ had broken the Sabbath or any other commandment of the old law, he could not have been our Savior, but he faithfully fulfilled every requirement of the law, and then the old covenant was taken out of the way, together with the law that surrounded it. But do we find any Sabbath law in the new covenant? We do not. Paul says, he kept back nothing that was profitable, but he said not one word about any one keeping Sabbath as a commandment from the Lord, but much to condemn the observation of days, months and years, times and seasons, as a means of justification, and shows conclusively, that such had gone back from Christ to Moses, from the Gospel to the law, and that Christ had become of no effect to all such as seek to be justified by the law.

But it is said that Mary observed the Sabbath, after the crucifixion, according to the commandment, and that the apostles observed the Sabbath in many instances. We reply, that the disciples retained their Jewish prejudices and customs, and carried them over into the new dispensation, but shall we say, therefore all those prejudices and customs are obligatory upon Gentile Christians of the present day? Show us a commandment from any of the apostles that we are to keep Sabbath day, and it will suffice, Mr. Waggoner says, in his "Truth Found," p. 47. "It will be admitted that commandments or laws, as they impose obligation, should be most definitely and clearly stated." If Sabbath keepers would abide by this rule, there would be no trouble about Sabbath keeping.

"The Sabbath was made for man." This is a fortress to which our opponents flee, as if it were impregnable, and as if it proved that all men were under obligations to observe the day as holy time. We admit that the Sabbath was made for man, for all men, in all time, and rejoice that it was, and rejoice also that "the Son of Man is Lord of the Sabbath."

God made the world in six days, (cycles or periods of time, as many read it,) and rested on the Seventh Day, thus showing to mankind, to all men, in all future time during the six working days or the six thousand years, that "the Seventh Day, or seventh thousand years shall be a great Sabbath of rest for the people of God, as Paul says, Heb. iv. 9: "There remaineth, therefore, a rest, or keeping of a Sabbath (margin) for the people of God. This Sabbath of rest was made for man, for all men, of whatever dispensation, whosoever will accept the terms. By becoming the people of God men may enjoy this great anti-typical Sabbatic rest-day. But to undertake to show from the typical Sabbath or rest day of Jehovah, that all mankind are under obligation to rest from labor on the Seventh Day of the week, is without authority. If it is not "definitely and clearly stated" that Gentiles shall keep Sabbath, then let us not add to that which is written, lest we be found untruthful, and the plagues that are written in his word be addedito us.

Yours in hope of entering into that rest. D. HOWARD.

Woman's Place in Nature, and Society.

This sudden revolt against the home duties and useful virtues, the modesties and affections, which formerly distinguished women, is an odd study. This frantic desire for masculine independence and notoriety must have a meaning, if we could but find it. Is it an unconscious check to population? so that a certain portion of our women are instinctively throwing themselves off from the main current of life, impelled thereto by a law of which they themselves do not understand the full significance? In which case will those who remain true to the old instincts be ranked as more animal than their hybrid sisters, or more human? And these hybrids themselves, what will they become? Emotional as women are by nature and as the very result of their organization, will the third sex carry into their professional work, their political life, the fancies and exaggerations, the lures and the fears, hysterical excitement, the baseless despair, the irrational hopes, which usually dominate the lives of women? So far as things have gone yet, women have modified or heightened the action of men rather than themselves set the measure by which history and humanity have been governed; but when the national councils are directly controlled by women, it will be curious to watch the working of the system, and to note how far sentiment and how far passion will have the upper hand, and whether the sweeter strain of the unpractical saint, or the instinctive violence of the Menad, will be the stronger. Women have the two possibilities, as the world has already seen. Their gentler prayers have softened the hard terms of conquerors and brought mercy to the councils of the cruel; and their passionate cries for vengence have roused the blood of men to fever heat, and from honorable foes transformed them into bloodthirsty fiends. Even now the opinions of women influence men in more than one questionable direction; and honorable names and masculine minds are dragged by them into historical associations where everything is represented but common sense and the more workable principles of action. If such things have been done in the green tree of indirect influence, what will be done in the dry of direct command, and when the monstrous regimen of women will be law under which we shall live? By the look of things this question will answer itself before many years have passed; and for good or evil the preponderating influence of women will come to be recognized as the chief factor in the great sum of mental forces. Yet surely their influence is strong enough as things are, without their direct invasion of the political platform. As wives and mothers, as sisters, friends, and the first women whom the young man loves, they have immense power over men; and a power which is yielded to voluntarily, and not resented by even the most arbitrary—who loves. Without love, we grant it, there is not much influence on either side. But when women are no longer women but hybrids, we doubt greatly if obtaining their rights will carry love along with them, and if they will not lose on the one side more precious things than they will gain on the other. Nowhere, where women rule, do things go well; neither where they are kept in slavery and undue subjection. Among the working classes, the women at times rule the men with a heavy hand, and shrewishness fills the public-houses as much as slatternliness. I have myself known instances where the wife has had her own industry separate from the husband's, and where he has given her boarding money for himself; and in all these cases I have known the wife both grudge and filch from the food which she had to allow the husband, and hold herself worthy of pity and compassion in that she had to cook for him when she herself would have made up with bread and tea, and passionately abuse him for his sensuality, in that he demanded to be more richly nourished than herself. And we see in the working classes where the waitress is the best man, we see in the houses of the better educated where the wife has the money settled on herself and where she has the stronger will, or holds the theory that women are the cream of creation—men only the skim-milk; and that the cream, by virtue of its own laws, rises to the top—and stays there—Mrs. Linton, Belgravia.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began. It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with Jesus Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

The East and the English.

The instructed and attentive observer sees grave and great issues in the present aspect of foreign affairs. It is declared that Russia is waxing hot with indignation towards Turkey for her brutality in the Turko-Servian war, and little is lacking but that her anger will burst into a flame. The Czar is almost certain to be dragged into a war against his will, by the inexorable clamor of his people. England is vehemently blamed for her tardiness of action. Truly, a great cloud is rising in the east. It is dark and electric and threatening. What cause has every praying soul to be full of prayer and solemn awe, and alert watchfulness, and sympathy with God? Who can tell what a majestic crisis is at hand? The Turk, as if smitten with blindness, is perpetrating acts that arouse universal sorrow and indignation. It is but but too likely that her day of doom is nearly come because she is so suicidally silly, and so pitilessly cruel. Her very madness makes her existence a perpetual shame. She must be deemed and doomed as not fit to have power, by the common decree of civilization. O, the heart aching sadness and pity one feels at the sufferings of the helpless, especially children and women, on whom the Turk enacts his worse than leopard-like deeds of villiany and blood!

Have you or your readers noticed the movement in England in regard to the identification of the lost tribes of Israel? At first I was skeptical, and waited long in doubt. But after a rest of years, after reflection and waiting, I am not unwilling to say I think the arguments of Mr. Hine and many others, have great cogency. Let us not be hasty, either to credit or condemn a view which strikes us at first as strange if not startling. Yet such is the rapidity of the progress of events, that with God's help the mind is urged to rapid action often, and to decisions which may be correct, even if early. I think it is more than likely that it is true that the Anglo-Saxon race are to be looked upon as composing the very Israel of God, for twenty-six hundred years lost to view, since the captivity into Assyria by Shalmanezer. Of course, Judah is not meant, being entirely separate and distinct from Israel. The arguments for this identity are quite numerous, and need early and diligent examination. I certainly think it would be unreasonable and unchristian to judge hastily in condemnation of this belief of many truly able and intelligent persons. The astronomer Royal of Scotland has done a great and noble work in bringing out so prominently and in detail the facts of the great Pyramid, and showing what six important signification they have in attesting Scripture, and in exalting the wisdom of God the author of this witness-monument in Egypt. And this same faithful man, Piazzi Smyth, is an avowed believer in the identity. Let not therefore the opinions of such a man be rashly condemned, until carefully considered. It may be proper to remark here, that the view of the Israelo-English or Anglo-Saxon identity has already gained such an earnest support and such a powerful foothold in Great Britain, that it is believed a very interesting movement will soon be inaugurated to test and establish the identity in the most remarkable and unmistakable manner, carrying conviction to universal Christendom, and arousing an interest which language will hardly be able to destroy. It is thought that this movement may soon receive the sanction of government itself. Let not the readers of the RESTITUTION be over much astonished, although it is indeed one of the wonders of this monstrous time. The project relates to the expected discovery of the Ark of the Covenant in Great Britain! It is declared as almost positively established by indirect but overwhelming evidence, that the Ark was transported thither by Jeremiah at or after the Babylonish captivity. I will not now go into detail. What is meant by this? "The scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet until Shiloh come, and to him shall the gathering of the people be." But the scepter did depart, unless it was preserved in some hitherto unknown way. It is said, however, that Zedekiah's daughters went unto the prophet to Ireland, one of them marrying a then ruling Prince in that Island, where at least a part of the tribe of Dan had already settled, and so clear on down through Irish, Scotch and English lines of royalty, a seed of David has borne rule to the present day, Queen Victoria herself being a descendant of the Bethlehemite king, and she a Jewess, ruling over the tribes of Israel. Nay, the very coronation stone so carefully preserved in Westminis er Abbey, is declared to have been carried by Jeremiah to Ireland, and to be the very stone on which Jacob slept and dreamed at Bethel.

Now, it is said, let the mound at Tara, in Ireland, be excavated with religious and careful hands, and the long lost Ark may soon be brought forth, a mighty testimony to the truth that in England, and the Isles of the Sea, are now lodged and living a people the most prosperous and powerful on earth, the very progeny of Jacob, the very seed of Abraham, now speedily to be seen and known, to be read and recognized and declared as that great and grand nation to whom (with Judah) pertain the most glorious promises of God's richest goodness. This Israel, that is, the ten tribes, are first to be identified and their identity proved beyond dispute or debate, and then they are to come up out of the land of Britain, (representatively) with Judah, appointing to themselves one head, entering through Acre into the great valley of Esdrelon, and great shall be the day of Jezreel. The valley of Achor will then and thus be a door of hope indeed. This very point on the Mediterranean coast is alleged to be the most important of all, strategically, giving its possessors command of the country. To me, the whole subject is of the deepest interest, and I think the RESTITTION could hardly do better than to publish a series of articles prepared expressly for the purpose, or else copied from the excellent and able paper, England's Glory Leader. It is thought sooner or later, Great Britain will obtain Constantinople, notwithstanding the well-known eagerness of Russia, and with Gibraltar and Malta, and Acre and Constantinople, England will have and occupy her gates of prophecy, and the seed of Jacob shall possess the gate of his enemies. There is enough in all this to warm the blood and thrill the nerves of strong men. I know it is easy to say—"it is incredible, it is impossible, I do not believe it, I cannot believe it," but, nevertheless, great and wonderful things are brought to light in our day, and if, yea, if, the Ark is found in Tara, then indeed a nation will be born in a day. Prophecy says, "go through, go through the gates," and what does England do? She owns Gibraltar, and she owns Egypt's shares in the Suez canal, and she guards the straits of Babelmandel. Let the reader look on the map. The bulk of the tonnage through the grand canal is British. Recollect that England has loaned immense sums to Turkey. Turkey is bankrupt and moribund. Now, how can England retrieve her losses? She may do it by getting Acre and other coast towns and territory of vast political value. Is she not entitled to indemnification? Will not English creditors and bondholders demand indemnification? Already there is a great buzz of displeasure with Lord Derby and D'Israeli for their tardiness.

All this does not seem to me to interfere with a just expectation of the speedy coming and kingdom of Christ. The church will be immortalized, especially first the ready saints. That advent seems imminent. From 1876 to 1882, are grand events in Pyramid testimony. If our era is miscalculated, and the true point of reckoning be dated back four years, then we are really and truly at A. D., 1880, and so much the nearer is the grand culmination. How this may be, I do not certainly know. I wrote this with great rapidity, but I hope I have written with distinctness, and I hope not without interest or benefit to some one.

G. COLEGROVE.

Constantinople.

The capital of Islam is undoubtedly among the most prominent points of interest at present, in view of the Eastern difficulties. Constantinople, or Istamboul, as it is known to the "faithful," is delightfully situated on a triangular peninsula at the entrance of the Bosporus. The harbor, known as the Golden Horn, will shelter vessels of the greatest draught and 1200 ships can ride easily on its commodious surface. The population is estimated at one million Mussulmans, Armenians, Jews, Persians and Levantines, who pursue their usual avocations undeterred by the wide social and religious differences that divide them,—a human Barnum's Happy Family. A wall containing twenty-seven gates surrounds the town. The old streets are very crooked, and strangers find it most difficult to traverse the labyrinthian recesses. Destructive conflagrations are not unusual. In 1865 the 6,000 houses, 20 mosques and numbers of baths, khans, etc., were devoured by the flames. The city is divided into districts, or quarters, which are usually occupied by different nationalities. The city presents a most charming appearance when viewed from the harbor near by. Its main characteristic is filth.

The markets, or bazaars, are large fireproof buildings, lighted from above, in which hundreds of tradesmen retail their wares. Open markets for the sale of horses are kept daily in several streets. The Avret Bazzar, or woman's market, was formerly set apart for the sale of female slaves.

The Sultan's residence of state is called the Seral Humayun. It is a small walled city of itself, nearly two miles in circumference, and includes mosques, baths, gardens, government offices, etc. Formerly it was inhabited by at least 5,000 persons and entirely inaccessible to strangers. Since free access has been gained, much of the romance and mystery surrounding the precincts have been dissolved. The outer gate of the seraglio is known as the Sublime Porte, a designation frequently applied to the Government itself.

The most noteworthy monument in the city is the Agia Sofia, formerly the Church of St. Sophia, originally built by Constantinople and transformed into a mosque by Mohammed I, in 1453. It is built of light bricks and lined throughout with colored marbles. The dome measures 107 feet. The ceiling and arches are inlaid with beautiful mosaic work and gilt. The gallery, fifty feet broad, is sustained by columns, some of which are of green jasper, said to have been taken from the temple of Diana at Ephesus. —Rural New Yorker.

Correspondence.

BROTHER REED:—I have been one of the speakers at our annual conference at Winchester, Va. I must say that we had a good meeting there. They did not turn out very strong for two or three days; but they continued to increase, until the last night of the meeting. I was sorry that our much esteemed brother, A. B. Magruder, was sick and could not attend. But Bro. Morgan, Boyer, and the writer, made an effort to set forth the first principles of the doctrine of Christ, in our plain way.

The writer showed them, on Monday night, that Christ preached to the multitudes in parables, and without a parable, he spake not unto them. And that even his disciples were not yet able to bear them. But when he may come, the spirit of truth, he will lead you into all the truth, and declare to you the coming things. Diaglott. These things have I spoken to you in figures; an hour is coming when I will no more speak to you in figures, but I will tell you plainly about the Father. John xiv. 26.

I tried to show forth that Christ did not give his commandments plainly unto his disciples until they were immersed with the Holy Spirit, at Pentecost. It was this endowment that enables his disciples to bear the great mysteries that were contained in Christ's parables or figures. Here, said the great Teacher, the "Comforter which is the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, he will teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance; whatsoever I have said unt you."

This demonstrates to me, very plainly, that Christ gave his commandments in plain language, by his Holy Spirit, after he ascended to the holiest of all to the right hand of the Father. After he was taken up, after that, he, through the Holy Spirit, had given commandments unto the disciples whom he had chosen. This Comforter is that which taught Paul the great mysteries of Christ, without ever going up to Jerusalem to see Peter, or the other apostles, for the space of three years.

Hear what he said: If you have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God, which is given me to youward: How that, by revelation, he made known unto me the mystery, as I wrote you afore in few words; thereby when you read, you may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ. Which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of man, as it is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit.

The four gospels were written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name. John xx. 31. I labored to show them that we should be led by the plain words of the apostles, who were ordained by the Lord, for his witnesses, first at Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth. And that the Holy Spirit was a witness to all them that would obey him. Acts v. 32. That the spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God. And heirs to that kingdom that we shall receive after the resurrection from the dead.

E. L. MAGREY.

DEAR BRETHREN:—I have long felt it a duty I owe the "Christian Publishing Association" for the goodness they have manifested toward me, by sending me the RESTITUTION free, to express my thanks. As I have no personal acquaintance with the editor, associate editor, business agents, or special contributors, I feel it more obligatory upon me to make this public acknowledgment of their kindness, and inform them, and those also of the faith with whom I have not had the pleasure of becoming acquainted, something of him upon whom they are bestowing their kind regards.

"The days of the years of my pilgrimage" are fifty years to-day, Sept. 9th. "Few and evil have the days of the years of my life been." I was educated a Methodist, united with the church when young, read theology, and was recognized as a teacher in the M. E. church.

In 1860 I learned that the Bible taught the conditional immortality through Christ alone, the preaching of which removed me from the painted synagogues of Methodism, and opened wide the door and let me out of Babylon, but closed the doors of my fathers children against me. One of those children, Asa Judkil, in a letter written Sept. 5th, which I received to-day, says, "For let me tell you, that when I took your letter to John, Ann, and Henry, and asked them what about the reunion of father's family, your religion was at once hissed in my ear. I told them I cared not a fig for no man's religion. Your religion had made you a better man; theirs could do no more. Yes, Joseph, if you had still been a Methodist, we might have had a glorious reunion of our family long ago. It was the devilish and hell-born bigotry in my brothers and sisters that made me feel sick of self, home, and the world, and not my religion as you thought." By the wish of my mother I was christened by a Roman priest, by the wish of my father I was christened by a bishop of the Church of England, by my own wish, I was sprinkled, when a young man, by the M. E. church. My christening in the Roman church named me Joseph, in the English church, Wellington. In the M. E. Church (it should have been) bigot.

In the winter of 1862, I was immersed by an elder of the Christian church, who with all my heresy I found willing to baptize me. From this date commenced my warfare in earnest, for soul sleepers in those days were not very numerous or popular. Although my meetings were well attended, many came only to oppose and blaspheme. But in the winter of 1864-5, the Gentile churches in and around the city of Emporia, Kan., uniting to crush out the great heresy, employed Professor Pierce, of Burlingame, (Presbyterian minister) to come to Emporia and strangle it in public debate. In this debate I had to contend with the united cunning of a legion of sectarian ministers: but I date from this debate the time when conditional immortality, the unconsciousness of the dead, and the final destruction of the wicked, dawned upon the minds of many in the Neosho valley, as the teaching of God's word. Although I was probably the first to proclaim publicly in Southern Kansas "the gospel of the kingdom," I am not so egotistical as to claim for myself the honor of all the evangelizing in this part of Kansas. No; other brethren have done a noble work in later years in this field. But for years I traveled from appointment to appointment, laboring with my hands to support my family, until grim poverty darkened my door, and my bodily strength exhausted by labor, study, and anxiety, from which I have never fully recovered. For some years past I have relaxed from night study and regular preaching; but when I see the anxiety manifested by the people to hear the word preached, the many scattered brethren that do not take or have the pleasure of reading the RESTITUTION, that are deprived of that comfort and strength found only in church fellowship, I feel like Paul, that "necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel," and to gather in church order the dear ones in Christ, and place in their hands, by some means, the rich feasts of knowledge found in the weekly visits of the RESTITUTION, This "necessity" being laid upon me how shall I escape the "woe?" Paul says, "The Lord ordained that they which preach the gospel shall live by the gospel. Brethren, I am willing to "Go into all the world and preach the gospel" to "preach repentance and remission of sins in the name of Jesus Christ. It is for you to say. Shall I go into the field. Your brother,

J. W. LOVEJOY.

("These are rather strong expressions. As they express an unbelievers feelings, they are admitted.—S. A. C.]

The Holy Spirit.

The questions of brother Crozier in your's of Aug. 2d, have just reached me on my return home. My reply must be brief; but I trust intelligible, though I omit the formal repetition of them.

1. "The Holy Spirit of promise—the spirit that descended on the day of pentacost, Acts ii.—the spirit that shook the place of prayer, and filled all with the Holy Ghost, so that they spake the word of God with boldness." The spirit that spoke by Stephen, Acts vii. 55-60; and to Philip; and then "caught him away" Acts viii. 29-39—was not "the Bible"

These and other quotations distinguish the point of difference. "They were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and spake the word of God with boldness."

The spirit was the enlightener, the inspirer that elevated them in mind and testimony from the plane of mere human thought into that which is Divine. Thus with St. John in Patmos, Rev. i. 9, "In the spirit" he could look through and see the out-come—the consummation to be attained through and by the millionial restitution. Rev. xx. 1-10; xxi. 1-5.

2. The Bible—the word of the Lord that we read, is not "the spirit." It is the product of his inspired patriarchs and prophets, Jesus and his apostles. These had their "gift"—their measure of the gift." 1 Cor. xii. 1-13. and to xiv. 26. But to Jesus it was "without measure," yet neither they nor He, was "the spirit."

In some texts the word and spirit are not discriminated; but again they are so. Thus where Jesus is impersonated in his doctrine, John vi. 48-68. It is explained, to forbid mistake, verse 63. "It is the spirit that quickeneth. The flesh profiteth nothing. The words that I speak unto you are spirit and are life!" In Hebrew, names are often used as we use the corresponding adjective; hence in English I should read: "my words are spiritual and life giving." The terms for "truth—the word of truth, and the spirit of truth," are coincident concurrent and co-related. They are as cousin-german, having a common source, and family character.

3. This point as to correlative and yet distinctive terms seems clear and certain from those that belong to the Divine name. Thus God and Jesus Christ, and Holy Spirit are Divine. Yet when we read of Jesus in promise; and as born of a woman, under law." Gal. iv. 4. Luke i. 30-35. Isa. iv. 67. and thus constituted "the Son of the Father in truth and love." 2 John 3; and of the spirit of God, (from God) we learn that one is absolutely; "The God!" "One God the Father; of whom are all things, and one Lord Jesus Christ by whom are all things." 1 Cor. viii. 6; and one spirit which proceedeth from the Father, and his coming and work which is concurrent with redemption by Christ. John xv. 26, Acts i. 8. ii. 1. Here we see discrimination.

4. We must not, can not rationally. With reverse this order even in thought, reverence we should bow to the wisdom from above. Deut. vi. 4; Mar. xii. 29-30; Eph. iv. 2-13. We should speak as the oracles of God.

The whole seems plain, thus we read of "Christ—the word of Christ; and the spirit of Christ!" But the terms and ideas are not convertible, yet they are all co-related and mutually depend on Himself.

We speak of man, his word and his spirit and never stumble at, or over it. Man here is absolute the center. Then his word is his mind, thought or purpose, expressed: and his spirit is that out-going of his mind, voice, and look, will and action which may move a nation! Here each dependent term is manly, but not the man.

The word of the spirit which is the word of God, may aid our apprehension. It belongs to the defensive and offensive Christian armour. Eph. vi. 17.

Our great need is the sweet submissive "mind of Christ." It is nourished by the word of truth, and earnest obedience, in a godly life and conversation, amen.

In conclusion, my answer to question No. 1, is No! But to No's 2 and 3, yes, with all emphasis. However I realize that human speculations have been delusive and deluding. Hence, my reverence has grown into a habit of thought and testimony, I trust, which has confined me to "the form of sound words" as given by those who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, 2 Pet. i. 19-21. An article to appear in the Prophetic Times, in due order, I trust will be adapted to aid some minds as to ulterior aspects of this general subject. But here my answer relates to the points in the important questions proposed. I was told that "a Disciple," to show his boldness and independence of orthodoxy, said: "I carry the Holy Ghost in my pocket!" This was in my apprehension, altogether erroneous and injurious. We all need the reverence, humility and goodliness, which the indwelling spirit inspires. J. B. C.

THE RESTITUTION

PLYMOUTH, IND.,... SEPT. 20th, 1876.

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

☞ We are to preach in Plymouth next Sunday, morning and evening. "Whosoever will, let him come."

☞ By a line from Bro. Joel A. Simonds, we learn that the conference in Michigan is indefinitely postponed.

☞ Bro. Thomas Wilson is to speak in Chicago next Sunday at the corner of Robey street and Warren Ave. Bro. Stephenson is to speak at the same place one week from next Sunday.

☞ Bro. Stephenson writes us that he is to preach the dedication sermon of the Brethren's meeting house, Tunnel City, Wis., where Bro. Wm. Putman lives, but does not give any date. Due notice will appear next week.

☞ From the last number of the World's Crisis we learn that Miles Grant has been deposed as editor of that paper. The position was offered to D. T. Taylor, but he refused to serve. John Couch, is now the editor, with Miles Grant, D. T. Taylor and — Stockman, as contributors.

☞ In this number the reader will find a very considerate article from Brother Magruder, on the association question. We trust that our Brethren will not run this matter into a controversy. The matter is merely submitted in the way of a plan for the more effectual prosecution of the Gospel of Christ.

☞ We spent last Sunday with the friends in Chicago. Had a pleasant time in presenting the word of truth. The modern way of traveling is decidedly convenient. The train left Plymouth at 6:15 Sunday morning and returned at 9 o'clock in the evening. This enabled us to go to the city, preach twice, and return the same day. Distance traveled, 108 miles.

☞ The Messenger, is the name of a new monthly, just started in Scotland by the friends of truth. Number one is before us. It has some good articles. We wish it ample success. Shall publish an article or two from it, soon. The Messenger's address is Glasgow, Scotland. M. W. Strong, is editor. Price 50 cents per annum.

☞ We have not made it a practice to refer to our financial matters in the columns of the paper, and do not believe in a system of continuous duns, but it is only just to remind our friends that we need what is now due on subscription. Please result at once. The office needs what is coming to it immediately. Let each one respond. If some of our brethren would put their shoulder to the wheel just now, it would be most thankfully received.

☞ Whenever the Sabbatarians are brought up with a short rope they cry out: "The Dragon was wroth with the woman." A good brother wants to know what they mean by this expression. The reader will find the expression in Rev. 12th chapter. The Dragon is a symbol of Pagan Rome, and belongs strictly to the old world. Sabbatarians claim that the Unit 1 States are represented by the beast with two horns. It is claimed that as this beast speaks as the Dragon spoke, that Sabbatarians are to be persecuted in this country. Wherever, therefore, any one of these elect saints is spoken against, or his views assailed, he cries out, "the Dragon was wroth with the woman," etc. The Seventh Day folks have always been anxious to have a little persecution so as to have their views of prophecy come true, but thus far the Dragon has been very kind to them. Indeed they seem to be pets of his. They pay him their taxes and he protects them in their worship.

☞ According to the latest foreign news, all efforts to effect permanent peace between Turkey and Servia have failed. Servia will not agree to the propositions made by the Sublime Porte. Russia is in active sympathy with Servia, and matters may become so far involved as to bring on a general war. There are too many nations and too many different interests and religions in close proximity. Some of them must give way. A general conflict throughout all Europe is only a question of time. The great number of men now in arms in the old world must be occupied. Such large standing armies have to be utilized in some way. There are 6,000,000 of men now in arms. Old prejudices are being revived, now kings are coming into power, and each one is ambitious for new acquisitions of territory. Events are rapidly taking on a warlike type. The peace of all Europe is now threatened by contending nations and armies. The storm may, by shrewd policy, be averted for a time, but it will come at last with fury and blood. Beyond it we shall behold the dominions of peace and rest.

☞ It is to be hoped that our brethren will avoid personalities in their articles. Patience with each other is a most commendable way to develop unity in faith and hope. Some men can growl at others and never stop to think that growling is a sin. Others never write only as they can review somebody. Such writers are mere negatives. They write to defend a dogma, or a pet hobby, or to show up some one's errors. This is not written to hit any one particular case, but to caution all against the spirit of envy and personal allusions. Nearly everyone has sore toes, and we must be careful how we step. Brethren, be courteous and humble, write in the spirit of meekness, use soft words and hard arguments. Emulate the noble life and example of our absent Lord, and be kind to all. We frequently publish articles which contain a sentence or two which should not be sent to the office. Words kill men as often as bullets. "Words fitly spoken are like apples of gold," etc. Be careful and not make them into apples of death.

☞ Is it not strange that some men want everything just exactly as it was in Apostolic times. And yet these very men like the art of printing, but they had no printing in Paul's day. They used old manuscripts for Bibles and did not know anything about the English language. Must we cease to read our English Bibles? They knew nothing about our modes of dress or form of society, and yet when the grand anthem of the ages is sung man from every nation will be in the white-robed throng. We became satisfied long ago that God's people must avail themselves of existing methods through which to preach the truth. Any method honestly used for the furtherance of truth is well pleasing in the sight of God. Hence the living voice, tracts or Bible themes, newspapers and associations of brethren are all available, and should be used for the advancement of the ancient Gospel. Any other view is light under a bushel. God works by means, and as we are to be workers together with Him, we must avail ourselves of every method consistent with love and good will toward men to save them from error and death. We believe that system or organization is the best method to accomplish this, therefore we believe in association.

A Bold Placard.

The following bold placard has been issued by the Catholics of Spain. If the spirit of this notice were to get the control in America we should look for similar devices to determine our Christian liberty. Spain is yet under the terrible ban of superstition and miracle, and yet it claims to be a Christian power. It will not be long before we of liberal Christian sentiment may be called upon to seal our faith with our blood. But here is the placard:

> "All native and foreign Protestant chapels, Bible societies and schools must immediately remove all external signs, placards and inscriptions indicating their faith."

New Honey in Old Comb.

We do not believe in putting new wine into old bottles, or placing new cloth in rotten garments, but it seems to be in harmony with nature to put new honey into old comb. The leaven in the meal, the pearl in the field, and Christ in the heart, are points which confirm the illustration. As the honey is taken from the comb, so the dead shall come from earth and forever share in harmony and love of the new world. We must not throw away the honey because the comb is old; neither must we reject truth when mixed with error. Honey is sweet, and truth is precious. The immortal is to come after the mortal ends. The crown will come when the cross is laid aside. The honey of the New Testament was concealed in the comb of the old. The law was the outer covering, but the faith of the Gospel has come to us through the types of the Mosaic ritual. Let us ever remember these two important relations, and gather the sweet promises of life and love from the outward forms of the legal age.

The World's Age.

The following is taken from the Scientific American and expresses much truth in a few words. It is quite remarkable however that nearly every writer upon the question of science, when alluding to the world's age speaks as though there was some authority for supposing that the world is only six thousand years old. The Bible says nothing about the age of the earth. Both chronologers have tried to figure out the exact calendar of God, but they have ever shown their foolishness.

Mr. William Chambers, the veteran author and publisher of Chambers' Journal, contributes to that excellent periodical a summary of some of the many views held by scientists as to the antiquity, of our world. The Quarterly Review treated the same subject recently, and that most conservative of magazines now admits that the ordinary interpretation of the date of the creation, about 6,000 years ago, is to be set aside as untenable and at variance not only with historic and archæological research, but with the substantial discoveries of geology. The reviewer quotes the opinion that it is impossible that the earth can have existed many millions of years, as the earth is cooling, if not rapidly, at such a rate as to make such an antiquity impossible; and again, there is reason to believe that the earth's rotation is not so rapid as formerly.

The question as to the date of creation must be considered to refer to our solar system alone. The nearest fixed star or sun outside our system—possibly the center of a similar system—is too far off to enter into the question of the age of our sun and its planets and their satellites, being two hundred millions of millions miles away. Sir Charles Lyell gives the date of the Cambrian formation of rocks as at least two hundred and forty millions years ago; while Mr. Darwin assigns to the world a much greater age even than this. Mr. Adams has essayed to calculate the retardation of the earth by the friction of the tidal waves on the atmosphere; and in conjunction with Professor Tait and Sir William Thomson, he allows 32 seconds per century as the time lost by the slackened speed. Mr. Chambers wisely concludes his article as follows: "We can only say that the theories propounded are eminently suggestive, but nothing more. It is not remarkable that there should be differences of opinion among men of science concerning the dark and stupendous questions of the cosmogony of the world. All we deprecate, in the present state of human knowedge, is rash dogmatising, one way or another."

A Question.

To those interested, the following facts are submitted:

About B. C. 278, Ptolemy, king of Egypt, wrote a letter to Eleazer, the high priest at Jerusalem, extracts from which are as follows:

"King Ptolemy to Eleazer the high priest, sendeth greeting. There are many Jews who now dwell in my kingdom, whom the Persians, when they were in power, carried captives. . . . As I am desirous to do what will be grateful to these, and to all the other Jews in the habitable earth, I have determined to procure an interpretation of your law, and to have it translated out of Hebrew into Greek, and to be deposited in my library. Thou wilt therefore do well to choose out and send to me men of a good character, who are now elders in age, and six in number out of every tribe. These, by their age, must be skillful in the laws, and of abilities to make an accurate interpretation of them (Antiq. b. 12, ch. 2, sec. 5).

The following is taken from Eleazer's reply to king Ptolemy:

"Eleazer the high priest to king Ptolemy, sendeth greeting. . . . We have also chosen six elders out of every tribe, whom we have sent, and the law with them. It will by thy part, out of thy piety and justice, to send back the law when it hath been translated; and to return those to us that bring it in safety. Farewell." (Antiq. b. 12, ch. 2, sec. 8).

Now the question:—If the ten tribes of Israel did not return from their captivity back to Jerusalem, how could Eleazer the high priest at Jerusalem send "six elders out of every tribe" to translate the Hebrew Scriptures into the Greek; if the twelve tribes had not returned from their captivity? Who will answer?

T. M. PARDLE.

CHICAGO, ILL.

REMARKS ON THE ABOVE.

A theory which uses proofs like the above stands greatly in need of crutches. That certain persons from the different tribes were involved in the captivity and restoration of the two tribes, Judah and Benjamin, no one pretends to question, but that there was a complete restoration of the ten tribes along with Judah and Benjamin is contrary to all history sacred and profane. By consulting Josephus, book i. chapter 14, the reader will learn that the ten tribes were carried captive "into Media and Persia." The captivity of the ten tribes was entirely a separate affair from that of the Jews. Josephus, in book xi. chapter 1, refers to the restoration from Babylon, and states that only two tribes were restored. If Mr. Pardle accepts Josephus as authority on which he challenged me to adduce, and which he has not, and I predict never will, attempt to answer. But worst of all, why apparently try to make the honest convictions of one whom he acknowledges as a brother in Christ, so odious, both with our editors, and the readers of our paper, that they may feel justified in excluding their investigation from our paper? If he would adduce a particle of evidence to prove these charges I would not complain; but to be judge, jurors, and executors without even attempting to prove a single one of the six charges which he considers amply sufficient to exclude my articles from the columns of the RESTITUTION, is too bad. Should not a man with nerves of flesh, feel duly sensitive under such treatment? If it were an enemy I could bear it. Able advocates always meet arguments with arguments. If a brother has no arguments to offer in confutation of arguments which he thinks are awful, dangerous, he is not obliged to say anything. Silence is more profitable than hard and abusive language. Let us have hard arguments, brother, and not mere assertions without even an effort to sustain them. I would say to my learned theological brother, bear with my weakness. It has required no small amount of patience for me to bear with some articles I have read on the "Two Witnesses," but if I should be called upon the review them, I will give my reasons for dissenting from their views. I think my brethren will agree that this would be the better way.

I would say as an apology for holding views, the best arguments which I have ever adduced in favor of which, are not considered worthy of confutation by my fellow and instructed brother, that I have used all the means with in my reach for twenty-five years to the very best of my ability: and I will willingly learn of him at this late period if he will be so kind, and condescending as to teach me. If I am unlearned will he instruct me? If my positions are unsupported, will he lay down a firm foundation upon which they may securely rest? If unrevealed, will he please give me "thus saith the Lord," instead of thus saith mortal man, whose breath is in his nostrils? If my conclusions are illogical, will he learn me how to reason, thus showing the difference between logical and illogical reasoning? If they are unwarrantable assumptions, will he show the difference between assumptions and cogent arguments? I refer my learned teacher to the axiom, qui docet discit. "He who teaches others learns himself." Also the following: Docile et quodlibet. "Justly and mildly." brother.

If Rev. xxxi. and xxii., and Isaiah lv. 11 does not plainly teach that there will be individual as well as national probation and sin in the millennial age, or in the transition periods of the new heavens and earth, as described by the Revelator and the great God, then I must confess that I do not understand the simplest meaning of language. As to my authority for the meaning of the word restoration, I refer my brother to the etymology of that word as given by every lexicographer.

And now I conclude with my convictions confirmed by the strictures and solemn charges above the initials of my name, which it has been my painful duty to notice; that to remove all temptation to the use of language that will wound our brethren's feeling, let each correspondent write out the ground of his own hope, and let the readers of our hope be the jury to decide upon the merits of the questions.

Yours friendly and hopefully,

J. M. S.

Immersion, not Sprinkling.

NEVADA, MO., Aug. 1876.

Eds. Presbyterian, St. Louis Mo.

I was headed your paper to read "Reply" No. 11 "What is Baptism?" Now by your permission I wish to make a few remarks, not for the sake of controversy qut to a more thorough examination of "the Scriptures" concerning "baptism" as to its design, and object. I am not a Baptist hence shall not argue from their standpoint, but more from yours, the word Rantize I wish to examine more particularly.

I wish to say to "T. G." that I was buried in water (en udati) years ago, and believed by that act I had submitted myself to Christ, and put on "Christ by baptism into his death" and had "risen" therefrom "to walk in newness of life."

I also understand that "T. G." refers to the writings of the apostles when he alludes to the New Testament yet if he will examine more carefully he will find, as I have done, that the apostles do not teach, or write the New Testament or new covenant at any time.

As to the Greek words Bautizo Baptisma, etc., in the mode, or the object, of "baptize" I believe a plain fact that the use of Rantize to sprinkle was not in the mind of Jesus, and we all know it is not found in the language of the —— "teach all nations, baptizing them," etc. Why? For to have had his apostles, or anyone since to "Rantize" he should have said positively "rantizing them!" For it is easier to speak the syllable ran than bap, and it would have been definite and true, also have saved the writing of so many volumes, debates, and confusion in the minds of multiplied thousands of honest though ignorant men, and women, anxious to obey the "the gospel of Christ."

The prophet is positive, when God has gathered Israel out of all countries —— then will I sprinkle clean water upon you —— Paul writes to "the Hebrews" of sprinkled water being used at the making of the first covenant, hence according to the prophets God will use "clean" water when he makes the new covenant with the house of Israel, and yet in the future

Now at this date I am not able to see why the words Baptizo, Baptisma Baptism were transferred and not translated, as the word Rantize has been correctly translated "sprinkle" from "the book" (in Matt.) to the "Amen" (in Rev.) Yet it is evident by a fact patent to all searchers of the Scriptures that such is the case, that Baptize is Anglicized to "baptize" and not to "ranlize," and all agree that "to bap" is "to sprinkle" hence "baptize" is not, to sprinkle.

Again I believe "T. G." will agree that when Jesus and the apostles ever spoke of "to baptize," "baptizing them" they never used the Greek word "Rantize."

For instance; Matt. iii. 6. "And were baptized of him (John) in Jordan"—How were they baptized? He could not sprinkle them or pour them in Jordan, and yet no one could have dipped them in Jordan, hence applying them to the Jordan, and not the Jordan to them. Hence we have the positive declaration in 11th verse; I indeed baptize (not to rantize, you in water (en udati) the action is to apply "you" to the water, and not the "water" to "you." I believe I can say without the least fear of successful contradiction that in all the apostles' writings, and excluding that the word Rantize is never used for "baptism" of any believers of "the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ."

And again I have never found Jesus, or the apostles using the word "baptize," and "rantize" interchangingly in conversation, or writing, no more than "T. G." would day, night; good, evil, God, and Baal.

Hence if the action contained in the Greek word "bap tiz" was to "sprinkle" then the word "rantize" in Heb. 9 would have been superfluous, yet as we find the word "rantize" translated "sprinkle" we are forced to this conclusion, that to "baptize" is not "to sprinkle." And we find the word "baptize" so often in the Acts of the apostles, or their writings, and confined to an act of believers of the Gospel of Christ. See Acts viii. 12; ii. 38; x. 47; xvi. 15, 33; viii. 38. Now the word "en tiz" is not in those passages quoted above, hence they could not have been "rantized" or sprinkled because there is no such a command given by Jesus or his apostles, and Jesus said to them, "if ye love me keep my commandments." In conclusion I would say if "baptism" is essential to any soul's salvation, then let that soul be "baptized," and not "ran tized." For it is plain that baptizing is not sprinkling, as I have clearly shown by the Scriptures. But if "baptism" is NOT essential, I ask "Why baptizest thou then?" If there is no change, no adoption, no remission of sins, no reconciliation, no burial, no death, no resurrection, no newness of life afterwards, no into the only NAME, no into Christ by baptism!! In fact no COMMAND to "be baptized?"

But essential, or non essential, it is in the great commission, "Go —— baptizing them" and "repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ," again in "now why tarriest thou? arise and be baptized and wash away thy sins, calling upon the name of the Lord: and "can any man forbid water that these should not be baptized which have received the Holy Ghost as well as we and he (Peter) commanded them to be baptized in the NAME of the Lord" and "baptism doth NOW save us," how Peter? "by the resurrection of Jesus Christ."

Not the first time was or is found the command "to ran tize." I would mark "T. G." if he has been "ran tized" instead of "baptized," when there is not one place in the sayings of Jesus, or the Acts of the Apostles, or in their writings, for any one to be "ranized" (I am now transferring the word "ran tize") or to rantize them, or be rantized "into his death," etc., etc.

The just CONCLUSION to my mind would be for "T. G." to believe that Phillip preached in Acts viii. 12. as the eunuch did in ver. 37, and then do as he did in ver. 38, and then "walk in newness of life." And myself and thousands of others of apostolic faith would extend to "T. G." the hand of fellowship," etc.

"He Giveth His Beloved Sleep."

The day with its cares is ending,
The call, and the startle, and the fear;
And the lengthening shadows betoken
That the night of rest is near.
We linger awhile in the twilight,
And over our hearts doth creep
This peace of that faithful promise,
"He giveth his loved ones sleep."

The day of life is ending,
Are its duties faithfully done?
Have we trimmed the hand that has led us,
Through the freighted days that are gone?
Then cure the rest of the spirit,
In that land where they nevermore weep,
"Dust to dust," till the last great awakening,
For "He giveth his loved ones sleep."

The Constitution of the Christian Association of America.

Having been published in the RESTITUTION, and the brethren of the one faith, the faith of Abraham, the father of the faithful, having been wisely and considerately invited to examine it with a view to the adoption or rejection of it, as a permanent institution among us,

I avail myself of the opportunity thus courteously afforded, after careful consideration, to offer to the brethren some objections to what is proposed.

1. The organization is confessedly man-made, not God-made. It is not claimed that there is either Bible precedent or authority for such an organization. Is not the church of God, of Christ, as established and set in order by the Bible, Christian Association? The only means and machinery which Divine wisdom hath ordained, for every good work connected with the preaching of the word for the salvation of those who seek and desire to serve God? Is there any other known to his plans?

If not, whence do we receive authority to create or legislate another or an additional scheme to supply the efficiency of his plans?

In Acts xvi we read of the Apostles and elders "coming together to consider" of the subject of the circumcision of the Gentile converts, in respect to which there had been much disputing." This w y a contention which had arisen among the brethren in the churches. They finally decided the contention as related in 23-30. They did this after hearing these words by Peter. "Now therefore, why tempt ye God to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear? But we believe that through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, we shall be saved, even as they." I cite this testimony for a double purpose.

1. To shew that the Holy Spirit would not permit them to put on the disciples any other or greater burden (28) than what had already been imposed and assumed by them.

2. That had it been wise or lawful to supplement or keep out any defect in this previous plan of proceeding (as by establishing for example, a "Christian Association of the whole Roman empire)". The time of the accession was suitable and appropriate to have done so then and there. Now as they did not ordain or even agitate any such organization, I conclude that we should imitate their commendable example and abstain from putting any other yoke on the Disciples.

II. Let us enquire whence we get the idea that it is the work or mission of the disciple of Christ to convert men to truth and righteousness by any other means than preaching the word —sounding out the Gospel to all men as God favors us with time and opportunity. If we do this, shall we not have done our duty? Is it not written of the first disciples, "then they that were scattered abroad went everywhere, preaching the word"? Can we not do this as well as they, and without the yoke of a Christian Association? If it is objected that we can not thus convert as many, I may reply that we do not know that, because the experiment has not yet been tried. But suppose it to be so; are we to be held responsible for not doing more than God requires of us? It is not the preaching that wins multitudes to Christ; else why did not he, who spake as never man spake, the great Teacher sent from God, convert the multitudes who listened, even with wonder and delight, to the gracious words and great truths that fell from his lips? Paul has taught us that although he planted and Apollos watered, it is God who gives the increase.

Is not this feverish desire on the part of zealous and ardent brethren to swell the numbers of the converted, and build up large and populous churches, the result of inattention to the fact that the present is not the age for the conversion of multitudes—that the Gospel was not to be preached to convert all nations, as some may suppose, but purely and expressly as a witness to the nations of the Roman empire. See Matt xxiv. 14.

Do they forget that Christ has said that few of each generation shall be saved—so few, especially of the generation contemporary with his coming, that he significantly asks the question, "When the Son of man comes, shall he find faith on the earth?"

We are not yet in the Lord's day, The Christian age is not yet come. It will be ushered in when this same Jesus shall so come as his disciples saw him go. We must wait for the Kingdom. When it is established, and when the god of this world,—that old serpent, the devil—is bound in chains of darkness and will not be able to deceive the nations any more, then the nations and all shall know the Lord, and then only there shall be salvation for the people with peace on earth and good will toward men.

III. It is a current opinion and belief that we, like the apostles, are commanded to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature. Yet this is plainly an error. It was a command confined especially to the apostles as special ambassadors, a command which we are taught expressly by Paul in two places in his writings, they literally complied with in their lifetime. Rom. x. 18; Col. i. 23. With them all the worlds meant the Roman empire. See Luke ii. 1. Yet although they heard the Gospel in all the world of that day, Paul, quoting Isaiah, testifies that they have not all obeyed the Gospel. Then as now it is want of faith, not opportunity, that blinds the multitude.

In my humble opinion, and from the premises before us, I conclude that the most perfect working of the wisest organization of the Christian Association of America would not advance the cause of the true evangelization and conversion of the people of our day to any appreciable degree or extent. In these Gentile times, when darkness covers the land, and gross darkness the people, the mass of mankind are too much absorbed in money-loving and money-getting, the cares of this world and the deceitfulness of riches, to leave any room in their hearts for the true riches and that honor which comes from God only. Those of them whose consciences are touched by a sense of their danger and the fear of a hereafter, much prefer to soothe and lull their apprehensions by joining some convenient church or body whose terms are easy, and which will accommodate itself to the easy religion of the day.

If we be asked what we must do in the meantime who know the truth and the way of life, I answer, bear uncompromising testimony to the truth as it is in Jesus, and preach and contend earnestly for the faith of the Gospel of the Kingdom of God, in all boldness and honesty, and thus do good to all men with whom we associate, and so letting our light shine, leave results and consequences to Him who judgeth righteously.

So much for the general scheme itself. I have some objections to the details of the plan proposed in the constitution, but as this paper is long enough, I beg to defer them to another number.

Faithfully and affectionately submitted. A. B. MAGRUDER.

212 W. BALTIMORE St.,
BALTIMORE, Md., Aug. 12.

Dear Bro. Read:—

In your editorial this week, you say "The conference to convene in Philadelphia is not to be a general centennial meeting of the brotherhood throughout the United States."

Of course we have no concern in this in the centennial of the United States, as our politics are associated with an absolute monarchy, our country is girt by the hills of Zion, our king is now absent, and we are strangers and pilgrims; but the last annual meeting of the eastern churches, was to take advantage of the exhibition of the "riches o the Gentiles," being held in Philadelphia, to make that city a place of gathering for the brethren all over the United States, and all over the world, if we could get them.

To a certain extent that idea has failed, in consequence of the brethren at Philadelphia being unable to receive so many visitors, but your readers will see by the official notice, that the church here in Baltimore has authorized our Bro. Gellett to invite all baptized believers in the Gospel of the kingdom to meet with us in Baltimore.

You may call this a "conference" if you wish, but it is really a meeting for the pleasure, mutual acquaintance, and edification of the brethren. We trust that those who come, will come in a spirit of love for each other, and the glorious hope which unites us.

Brethren desiring to do so, will be able to visit Philadelphia first, and then come on to Baltimore, and as many as can come we shall be glad to see.

As you say this is no centennial meeting, but it is one to which all our brethren and sisters are welcome; there is but one thing necessary, and that is, that all who come should be baptized with the one baptism, with the one Lord, and be partaken of the one faith and hope of the Gospel, for being one body, we have no desire to fellowship other than members of that body, but all that are from glorious United States and elsewhere, are heartily welcome.

Brother Read:

I see in your issue of Aug. 20, in H. Updegroff's report of the church here, —Strawn, Coffey Co., Kansas,—he puts Payton as one of the Elders. I wish it distinctly understood that I do not belong to any organized body—much less a man-made elder in one.

The Debate at Remington, Ind.

It is due those who are interested to say that absence from home, temporary illness and an unusual press of other matters which could not be delayed, have prevented and still prevent the preparation of the remainder of this debate. The preparation of two sermons weekly, Sabbath school and pastoral duties, are generally accounted sufficient labor for one man; but when you add to that the editorial labor on Sunshine, the preparation of its monthly lessons for the Sunday School, keeping its books, attending to its correspondence—all the labor usually performed by a business agent—wrapping, addressing and mailing it monthly, with my own hands; attention to a large correspondence, business, religious and social, outside of that; the preparation of an occasional article for the RESTITUTION, and the cares which fall to the lot of the father of a large family, with an occasional lecture during the week, you have a sufficient reason why I have not and at present cannot give time to unravel the intricacies of the notes of that debate, and give to the world a recently full and impartial account of it. I must therefore beg all who have expected and desired it to be patient bide my time, and not to be too severe if that time should even never come.

"The 144,000."

Some of our friends in Hartford claim to be a part of that company sealed out of the churches by the Advent message.

Calling on a friend we were speaking of their claim and she said I do not think they are a part of that company or that any one knows who they are.

I said does not the book tell who they are? She did not know. The book says they are twelve thousand of each of the children of Israel. If we do not take that testimony we are left to every man's guess and one is as good as another, and altogether are good for nothing.

But some one will say the ten tribes are lost. The word of the Lord: "Behold I will send for many fishers," saith the Lord "and they shall fish them and after I will send for many hunters and they shall hunt them from every mountain and from every hill and out of the holes of the rocks, for mine eyes are upon all their ways, they are not hid from my face."

A Reversed Engine.

Very little help will a reversed engine give toward getting a heavy train up a steep grade. Indeed it will be remarkable if such an engine attached to a train under such circumstances is not a positive injury! I know a prominent S. S. Superintendent who makes a business of "playing cards"—who plays such games daily. And I know the children who understand the matter, ask, "Is a card player a safe guide in holy things?" Such a man in this great work is like a reversed engine,—his influence pulls the wrong way. Alas! how many such helps there are, they help, but towards the wrong result. JUDEX.

Indiana Annual Conference.

The Lord willing, this body will assemble in the A. C. church at Bridgeport, Clarke county, Ind., on Thursday, Sept. 28th, 1876, at 2 o'clock p. m. This will be an important meeting, and it is earnestly hoped that all interested will make a special effort to attend. Bridgeport is situated on the L., N. A., & Chicago R. R., some 14 miles north of New Albany. The church is but a few steps from the R. R.

DIED.

CARTER—August 22, 1876, our beloved Brother Brother Adam Carter.

Brother Carter was born in the state of Ohio, March 25, 1805, and removed to the state of Indiana in early life. He embraced the Abrahamic faith and Gospel hope about 20 years before his death, and died in the anticipation of the resurrection at the coming of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

We believe the hope of our brother will be realized, for we have been acquainted with him about seven years. At our last interview in June last, he said that he did not expect to stay with us much longer. His health had been poor for many years. He leaves a wife and five children to mourn his loss, but they sorrow not as those having no hope. We think all of his family, one exception, have put on Christ by baptism. He was true to his profession from first to last.

May we all strive to live the life of the righteous, that we may meet our dear Brother in the Kingdom.

Words of comfort were spoken by the writer from Job xiv. 14, to a well filled house, who gave good attention. We hope good will result to the living.

Your brother, in hope of the soon coming Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. WM. A. WEBB.

LAWSON—Near Plum River, Arkansas, at the residence of R. W. R. Chambers, on the 5th of September, Lottie A. Lawson, aged 15 years, 5 months and 20 days.

Sister Lottie was an amiable girl, beloved by all who knew her. For some time previous to her death she was a member of the Church of God, believing firmly in the things concerning the Kingdom of God. She died as she had lived, hoping for that glorious day, when she will be in the resurrection and the life shall come, to raise the people from the dust, crowned with immortality. "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal, immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. THOS. J. SHIRLEY.

BUSINESS DEPARTMENT.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

O. M. Myers will visit for the purpose of holding meetings.

At the Wisconsin conference, Sept. 29 to Oct. 2.

Notice is here given to the brethren of the Ann Arundel Co., Maryland, North-eastern Missouri, and Southwestern Kansas to meet in conference with the church of God worshipping on Santa Fe Prairie, Coffey county, Kansas, near station Sutton, M. K. & T. R. R., commencing Friday, Oct. 27, 1876, at 2 o'clock p. m.

The object of this conference is the propagation of the Gospel of Christ, the establishment of Gospel order among believers in Christ, to take action upon the Constitution of the Christian Association of America," the publication of our papers—the RESTITUTION and Sunshine, and all necessary business that may be presented for action. The church worshipping on Indian Hill will be glad to meet in conference all lovers of church order, all that are tired of preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ and teaching the gospel, that is mingled with the Gospel of this dispensation.

I wish to say, in justice to those who come on to Baltimore, that there are some few of the faithful living near the place of meeting, and those for whom it is left to faith and poor in this world's goods, that will go up, three, to this meeting, as the Jews did to their feast of tabernacles.

By order of the church.

J. W. LOVEJOY.

PORT SCOTT, Kan., Sept. 4.

Moved by the recent letter of Brother Wilson, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, that the church of Christ in that city feel it possible under the circumstances of the case, to hold, as originally the annual conference in their city, the church at Baltimore has resolved to invite all those of like precious faith who have been baptized, believing in the Gospel of the Kingdom of God, to meet in our city (Baltimore), to break bread with us and drink with us in celebration of the death and resurrection of our Lord on the first Sunday of October. Meetings of the brethren will commence on the Saturday afternoon previous, September 30.

We especially hope that the brethren on the Atlantic coast will make an EXTRA EFFORT to attend these meetings. The date mentioned has been decided upon that time of year brethren and sisters from the Western states who purpose visiting the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia may have an opportunity to arrange their visit so as to pass through to Baltimore to attend these meetings. We trust that all that can come will come, and we will endeavor to make their stay pleasant and profitable.

It is very important that all brethren coming to these meetings should communicate their intention at least ten days prior to September 30, that the proper arrangements may be made for their reception; also what train they will arrive on, that we may meet them at the depot. Please address all such communications to T. C. Weeks, Engraver, 213 W. Baltimore Street, Baltimore, where also any stranger brother may come if not met at the depot.

J. F. WILLCOX,
Secretary of the Conference.

All brethren and sisters who purpose to attend the Baltimore conference are specially requested to arrange their visit so as to arrive in the city not later than Saturday afternoon, September 30, as supper will be spread in the hall at 6 o'clock, and the first meeting will be held at 7 o'clock punctually. And we are anxious that all who are coming should be on hand at the opening.

Also, for the greater comfort of the visitors, and those who have the care of the arrangements, the brethren and sisters are requested to inform the undersigned, by letter, at least three days before the meeting, (and if possible earlier,) what line of railroad and what train they intend to come on.

Married brethren will please state if their wives will accompany them.

As we have reason to expect a large gathering, strict attention to these preliminaries will enable us to provide suitable lodging, and will add greatly to the general comfort.

We again call attention to the fact that the committee of reception will be distinguished by a strip of white ribbon attached to the lappel of the coat. But if from any cause brethren should fail to recognize them, please enquire for me, during the day at 213 West Baltimore street, or during the night at 134 East Monument street. If brethren arrive on Saturday evening, they will please look in the hall at the North-west corner of Paul and Lexington streets.

N. B.—All are requested to bring their hymn books. THOS. G. WEEKS.

The annual conference of Northern Illinois and Southern Wisconsin, will convene September 29, 1876, at 10 o'clock a. m. at the Mitchell school house, Green county, Wisconsin, and continue over Sunday.

Those coming by rail on the Western Union, should write to Aaron McCauley, Rock Green, Stephenson county, Ill., and should get off at Decota.

Those coming to Joslin should write to Cary Noble, Twin Grove, Green county, Wis.

Brother Myers will be expected at this meeting.

J. H. ARNOLD, Pres.

Centennial Number of the Restitution.

It has been deemed best to issue a Centennial number of the RESTITUTION, wherein is to be set forth our faith and hope upon the great questions of Bible truth. Those who have heretofore contributed to the Tract Fund, will find the amount credited under this head. It is to be hoped that every brother will give something toward this laudable effort to let the light of the glorious Gospel shine into the hearts of men. No people have as much truth and do so little. Why is it? Let every one do his duty. God will bless you.

Put Your Name on this List.

Recently quite a number of brethren have considered that as easy and effectual way to get the truth before the minds of the people is to send them the RESTITUTION for three months. This is a good decision. It is almost impossible for the paper to be examined and read by any household for three months without its making an impression upon their minds for good. Send on your names and money. We hope to have a goodly number report. The following is a list of those we already have above referred to:

Valuable English Works.

Our readers are informed that we expect shortly to have for sale the works mentioned below. Orders and remittances for the same may be sent at once to this office.

Discussion on the State of the Dead. Between the Rev. W. G. Brookes, Congregational minister, and W. Kelleway, editor of Bible Echo, and minister of the Gospel. Both of England. The propositions discussed were: 1. That the dead exist in a living, conscious state, after their decease. Affirmed by W. C. B. 2. That the Scriptures teach that man in death are wholly unconscious, insensible, and unable to perform any act whatever; and that they rest in darkness, silence and the dust. Cloth, bevelled boards, well bound, 585 pages 12c. Paper cover, 35c; postage 6c.

Duration and Nature of Future Punishment. By Rev. H. Constable, M. A. late Prebendary of Cork, Ireland. 250 pp. An elaborate argument touching the punishment of the unsaved. It is particularly rich in its philological chapters respecting the meaning of the Greek words used by the inspired writers to indicate the doom of the lost. Price 81; postage 12c.

We hail this book with lively satisfaction. Undoubtedly the ripest which it treats with such an attractive combination of learning and modesty, of power and reverence, the last half of the minds of many of the most thoughtful Christian men of our day. Its great gift, from a pen prolific in the first edition to a handsome volume of great hundred and thirty pages in the fourth, is conclusive proof that the question of such a book has a profound importance.....We must also compliment the publishers on the tasteful and handsome dress in which they present the book to the public, and express the hope that the heavy outlay will speedily be made much more than recovered by the large sale of a work which must take a standard place in this patiently misunderstood department of Christian theology.—The Scotsman.

Hades; or, The Intermediate State of Man. Crown 8vo, 2d edition. Price $1.50; postage 12c.

The work presents the Bible doctrine of the state of man between death and the resurrection.

"Mr. Constable has, in a series of articles, devoted much labor and research to establishing from Scripture and other sources the real nature of the future state; and the present book is the result of his more exhaustive labors on one special point. His argument is supported by an able learning, a keen logic, and a clear and forcible style. There is a good deal to be said for the general doctrines propounded.—Nonconformist.

"It is characterized by his usual vigor of thought and clearness of expression. To all lovers of truth, rather than of tradition, we cordially commend this treatise."—The Church Monthly.

Bible Echo. Volumes for May to December, edited by W. Kelleway. The only English weekly that advocates the ancient Gospel. Many volume of numbers of the Bible Echo, publishing important papers and discussions on vital matters, and the latest concerning the spread of the scriptural doctrine of the mortality. Price $1.50.

Bible Echo. Vol. IX, January to June, 1875. This is a continuation of the above for the period stated. Price $1.

Bible Echo. Vol. III July to September, 1876 This completes the Bible Echo as a weekly newspaper, and also finishes the old series. Price $1.25.

Bible Echo. New Series. Monthly numbers from October, 1876. The yearly subscription for this magazine, including the 3 months of last year, is 50c.

New Facts Upon all Subjects. By the author of "Inquire Within Upon Everything." Useful to the physician, the artist, the chemist, the engineer, the manufacturer, the agriculturist, the gardener, and the housekeeper. 336 pp. Price 50c; postage 10c.

A New Work by Mrs. H. V. Reed.

Harvest Words for Home Reapers. Nearly 400 pp. Well printed on heavy tinted paper, neatly bound in cloth. Price 50c; postage 10c.

"This book is one of the most satisfactory of its kind that could be written; indeed we know of no other of the many published from which any of the assembly of subjects in the Bible as a revelation from God. We would be more than grateful if we could be placed in the possession of a copy. Indeed if this multitudinous and talented lady, the authoress. Her "Bible Triumphant" was a good work, and it is, we know, warmly appreciated by many; but this work of hers, as far as we are conversant, it would be hard to guess where its success will end. Everybody should possess a copy."—The Bible Echo.

Daily Telegraph. A new supply is expected. Price 6, paper covers, 50; cloth 75c.

The Jewish Pilgrim.

Are these the ancient holy lots,
Whose angels walked of old?
Is this the land our story tells
With glory not yet cold?
For I have passed by many a shrine,
O'er many a land and sea;
But still, O promised Palestine,
My dreams have been of thee.

I see thy mountain cedars green,
Thy valleys fresh and fair;
With summer's brightness they have been,
When Israel's home was there;
Tho' o'er thee sword and mine have passed,
The cross and crescent's blaze,
And hostile chain has pressed,
O, thou art still our own.

Thine are the wandering race that go
Thy bread through every land,
Where blood has stained the polar snow,
And quenched the desert sand;
And thine the house for hearts that turn
From all earth's natives to thee,
With their lone faith for ages borne
In sleepless memory.

For thrones have fallen, and nations gone
Before the march of time;
And, where the ocean rolled alone,
Are towns in their prime,
Since Hamzin ploughshares marred the brow
Of Zion's holy hill,
Where are the Roman eagles now?
Yet Judah wanders still.

And has she wandered thus in vain,
A pilgrim of the past?
No, long deferred her hope has been,
But it shall come at last.
For in her wastes a voice I hear,
As from a prophet's urn;
It bids the nations build not there,
For there shall return.

O, lost and loved Jerusalem!
Thy pilgrim may not stay,
To see the glad earth's harvest home,
In the redeeming day.
But now resigned, in faith and trust,
I seek a resteless tomb:
At least beneath thy hallowed dust,
O, give the wanderer room.

—Jewish Chronicle.

The Lost Ten Tribes,

In the year 1823 Mr. Sargon, who was one of the London society for promoting Christianity among the Jews communicated some interesting accounts of a number of persons resident at Bombay, Cannanore, and their vicinity, who were evidently descendants of Jews, calling themselves Beni Israel, and bearing uniformly Jewish names, but with the Persian terminations. This gentleman, feeling very desirous to obtain all possible knowledge of their condition, undertook a mission, for this purpose, to Cannamore; and the result of his inquiries was, that they were not of the ten tribes and a half, being of a different race from the white Jews, and also from the black Jews at Cochin, and consequently that they were a remnant of the long lost ten tribes. This gentleman also concluded, from the information he obtained respecting the Beni Israel, that they exist in great numbers between the Cochin and Bombay, to the north of Persia, among the hordes of Tartary and in Cashmere—the very countries in which, according to the German paper, they exist in such numbers. So far, then, the accounts confirm each other; and there is every probability that the Beni Israel resident on the west of the Indian peninsula had originally proceeded from Buchari. It will therefore be of interest to know something of their moral and religious character.

The following particulars are collected from Dr. Wilson's interesting work, The Lands of the Bible Visited and Described, vol. ii. 607-633.

The Beni Israel, in their physiognomy, resemble the Arabian Jews; although they view the name of Yehud, when applied to them, as one of reproach. They are fairer than the other natives of Judea, of the same rank of life with themselves; but they are not much to be distinguished from them, with regard to dress. They have no shendi, like the Hindus, on the crown of their heads; but they preserve a tuft of hair above each of their ears. Their Turbans (augrakas) and shoes are like those of the Hindus, and their trousers like those of the Mussulmans. Their ornaments are the same as those worn by the middle class of natives in the Mahratta country: their houses do not differ from those of other natives of the same rank. They do not eat with persons belonging to the other communities, but don't object to drinking from vessels belonging to Christians, Musulmans, or Hindus. They ask a blessing from God, both before and after their meals, in the Hebrew language.

Each of the Beni Israel, generally speaking, has two names, one derived from a character mentioned in Scripture, and another which has originated in deference to Hindu usage. The Hebrew names current among the men are the following: Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Reuben, etc. The name of Judah, it is to be remarked, is not to be found among them. Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel, Leah, Sapphira, Milchar, Zilchat, Miriam and Hannah are the Hebrew names given to the women.

All questions concerning the caste and religious discipline of the Beni Israel are determined, in a meeting of the adult members of the community in each village, by their Mukuddum, or head-man, who has a kind of magisterial authority in the community, and the Kadhi, who is the president in religious matters, and the conductor of public worship, and whose duty it is to entertain the complaints made before them. The Mukadam and Kadhi have generally the assistance of four Chegale or elders. Any of the people present at an investigation however, may express their sentiments on the subject under discussion, record their dissent, and under certain circumstances, procure a new trial.

The Beni Israel all profess to adore Jehovah, the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob. Many of them, however, till lately, publicly worshiped, and some of them at the present time worship secretly, the gods of the Hindus, particularly those who are supposed to have a malevolent character; and a few of them practice divination. Though they have remained quite distinct from the people among whom they have been so long scattered we see the applicability to them of Deuteronomy xxviii. 64: "Thou shalt serve other gods, which neither thou nor the fathers have known, even wood and stone."

The Beni Israel have in their synagogues no Sepher Torah or MS. of the law, like the Jews. They admit, however, the divine authority of all the books of the Old Testament. It is only lately that they have become familiar with the majority of the names of the inspired writers; and it was not without hesitation that they consented to acknowledge the latter prophets. From the Arabian Jews they have received the Hebrew liturgy of the Shepardim, which they use in their religious services. A few copies of the Cochin ritual, printed in Amsterdam about the end of the seventeenth century, are to be found in their hands. One of their number has a copy of one of the Targums, but I do not know that it is turned to any account. Parchments bearing small passages of Scripture are sometimes worn on different parts of the body. It is understood that of late they have almost universally abandoned the use of charms, to which the example of the heathen had made them in some degree partial.

When a birth takes place in any village in which the Beni Israel are not very numerous, they almost all visit the house, and are entertained with sweetmeats and fruits. Circumcision is performed by the Khadi on the day appointed by the law of Moses. The rite is considered as making decent from Abraham; but no spiritual meaning is attached to it, except by individuals who have had intercourse with Christian missionaries. The ceremony is attended by a considerable number of people, who are hospitably entertained, and invoke the health of the child over the juice of the grape. The Khadi usually receives from eight annas to two rupees for his services. Small presents are sometimes given to the infants.

The marriages of the Beni Israel generally take place as early in life as among the Hindus. The arrangements connected with the betrothment are those of the parents. The ceremonies of marriage continue for five instead of seven days, as with the ancient Jews; and they are in some respects of a heathenish character. On the first day, the bridegroom is restrained from going abroad, is bathed, and gets his hands stained red with the leaves of the Mendi (Lawsonia inermis), and the front of his turban ornamented with yellow or white paper, cut in the form of the flowers of the Champa (Michaelo champaca,) while he is visited by his relatives who begin to feast and rejoice. On the second day, his neighbors, without distinction, are invited to participate in the hospitality of his father's house; while he is required to have his hair dressed, and to array himself in his best apparel and ornaments. He is then mounted on a horse and conveyed, with the usual clang and clatter of the natives, to the place of worship, where a part of the marriage prayers of the liturgy is read, and a blessing pronounced by the Kadhi. From the masjid he is conveyed to the house of the bride, where he is received by her father and placed among the assembled multitude. A dress and ornaments for the bride are presented in his name, and by the hands of his father, to the bride, who immediately turns them to use. A couch covered with a clean cloth is then produced, and on it the happy pair are sealed together. All the visitors stand before them. The Kadhi takes a cup containing the juice of the grape, which is viewed as a token of the covenant about to be entered into; invokes the blessing of God upon it; and puts it into the hands, first of the bridegroom and afterwards of the bride, who both drink a little of it as soon as they have been questioned as to their willingness to enter into the married relation, and faithfully to discharge their respective duties. The marriage covenant, drawn out in the form usually observed by the Jews, is then produced and read; and after being signed by the individual in whose handwriting it is, and three other witnesses, it is placed by the bridegroom in the hands of the bride. She holds one end of it while he holds the other, and declares it to be a legal deed. He then folds it and gives it into her possession. She disposes of it by committing it to her father's care. The cup is again tasted, certain passages of the Psalms are read; a ring is placed by the bridegroom on the forefinger of the right hand of the bride; and the religious part of the ceremony is closed. The Kadhi blesses the espoused seated together, and they receive offerings, principally in small sums of money, from their acquaintances. Feasting and rejoicing conclude the labors of the day. Next evening the bridegroom and bride leave the bride's house—the former seated on a horse and the latter in a palanquin—and proceed amid the firing of squibs and rockets to the masjid, where they receive a fresh benediction from the Kadhi before going to the house of the bridegroom, where they dine with their assembled friends. Amusement and feasting continue during the two subsequent days. The marriage covenant is in general rigidly observed, even though its violation is but slightly punished. The innocent member of the family is allowed a divorce, and the liberty of remarriage. The offending party, in the lax discipline of the community, is seldom prevented from having similar privileges. Polygamy is practiced in a considerable number of families; but there are no instances known of a man having more than three wives. A few individuals keep concubines. Barrenness, as of old, is considered a misfortune; and children are adopted by written covenant on a failure of issue. Females are not so degraded among the Beni Israel as among the Rabbinical Jews; but they are not allowed to go to the masjids for the purpose of worship.

The interments of the Beni Israel quickly follow the death. They bury without coffins, in graves of three or four feet in depth, the head of the corpse being placed toward the east. They sometimes make offerings to the deceased of rice, milk, and cocoa nuts, and sprinkle flour mixed with water at the time of the interment; and they visit the grave on the third, fifth and seventh days after it is closed, for the purpose of prayer. They have also an annual ceremony for the dead, like that of the Hindu Shraadh. Their formal mourning for the dead lasts seven days.

The Beni Israel reckon their day from sunset to sunset. They now denominate their months by the Hebrew names.

The weekly Sabbath is, in some degree, observed by about a third of the population. At 6 in the morning they assemble in the masjid, where they remain two or three hours, principally engaged in reciting prayers or parts of the Scripture after the reader, and practicing genuflexions. A few of the more devout of their number may be seen in the masjid about midday, or about two or three in the afternoon. The evening service is that perhaps which is best attended. It lasts for about two hours, and is frequently concluded by the persons present touching with their lips the cup of blessing.

The day of the new moon is very little observed by the Beni Israel, unless it may happen to fall on the Sabbath. In a few houses, and also in some of the masjids, the prayers and lessons appointed for the day are read as they are given in the liturgy of the Shepardim. On the fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, or tenth of the month, when the moon is seen to increase, the readers of the synagogue and a few other individuals read the blessing of the moon, springing upon their toes with their faces toward that luminary. This custom, like most of the others connected with their worship, is allowed by the Beni Israel to have been derived from the Arabian Jews.

The annual religious festivals and feats of the Beni Israel, I shall mention according to the number of months, beginning with the commencement of the ecclesiastical year, which takes place about the vernal equinox.

1. Abib or Nisan. The great Jewish festival of the Passover commences on the fourteenth of this month. It is a curious fact that the Beni Israel allow that their fathers in India, even till a late period, were entirely ignorant of the objects for which it was originally instituted, and that the only regard which they paid to it was upon the eighth day from its commencement, when they indulged themselves in eating and drinking. At present, particularly in Bombay, about one-third of their number institute, on a small scale, the mode of observance of the Arabian Jews, paying special regard to the first two and last two days. The 23d of this month, the Beni Israel denominate Isru-Hag, that is the festival sacrifice, though for what reason they do not know. It is spent nearly universally by them as a day of rejoicing.

2. Iyar or Zif. In this month falls the second Passover of the Jews (Num. ix. 10, 11,) observed by those who can not attend the first Passover. It is never regarded by the Beni Israel.

3. Sivan. The feast of weeks, or Pentecost, commences on the sixth of this month. They partially observe it for two days as a season of rejoicing remaining awake at the masjid during the intervening night, and spending the time principally in reading and praying. They have no ceremonies connected with the produce of their fields, though a few of them use the prayers of the Jews which refer to them. They have no acquaintance with the Rabbinical be associated with the festival.

4. Thammuz. The Jews observe the 17th of this month as a day of fasting, in remembrance of the breaking of the tables of the law, and the ceasing of the regular sacrifice, and the Beni Israel have begun to be their imitators.

5 Ab. On the ninth day of this month the Jews fast, because it is said that the temple was first burnt on it by the Chaldees, and afterwards by the Romans; and because on it God declared, in the time of Moses, that none of those who came out of Egypt should enter the promised land. Some of the Jews of London, who lately opened a correspondence with the Beni Israel, have exhorted them strictly to observe it, to which for many years they had not been disinclined, having been admonished to the same effect by the Cochin Jews.

6. Elul. The Beni Israel observe some customs during this month, and the nine days of the following one preceding the day of the atonement, which are as far as I am aware, are peculiar to themselves. Except on the Rosh Hodesh, and the Weekly Sabbath, they professedly fast with great strictness during the time the sun is above the horizon. Numbers of them attend the masjid for prayer long before sunrise.

7. Tisri. The civil year of the Jews commences on the first of this month. The Beni Israel devote to feasting and rejoicing the while day, with the exception of a few hours, during which some of them attend the masjid, for the purpose of offering up prayers, and blowing horns and trumpets. Like the Jews, they use honey and sweetmeats at their evening meal. The second day of the year they spend in the same manner as the first. About three o'clock in the afternoon some of them repair to the shore, and worship towards the ocean.

On the third day of Tisri, the fast of Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam, whose murder is mentioned in the last chapter of 2 Kings, is generally observed by the Beni Israel, as well as by the Jews. The fast of the Day of Atonement, on the tenth day, is strictly observed by the Beni Israel. A few families, in deference to some Rabbinical legend which they have heard from the Arabian or Cochin Jews, sacrifice a cock, to which they give the name of the Kopparah, or expiation, on the preceding evening. They spend much time both during the night and day, in confessing their sins and supplicating the Divine mercy, agreeably to the forms of the liturgy. In the course of the night they offer up prayers to God for the sovereign of Britain, the Governor of Bombay, and all the authorities of the country. The day following the Kippur is distinguished for the exercise of hospitality and charity.

On the fifteenth day of this month the Feast of Tabernacles is celebrated by the Beni Israel for nine days, being two in excess of the time prescribed in the Old Testament. A booth, covered with the branches of the palm, and ornamented with flowers and fruit, is erected in every village near the masjid in which the people assemble for the purpose of singing psalms and receiving the cup of blessing; but their prayers are recited in the usual place. The eighth night those who attend the tabernacle devote to watching. The first two and the last two days of the festival are those which are most regarded, and during them little secular work is performed.

8. Bul, or Marcheswan. In this month the Beni Israel observe neither fast nor festival.

9. Chisleu. On the twenty-fifth day commences the festival of the Purification of the Temple, which lasts for eight days. Few or none of the Beni Israel illuminate their houses like the Jews. They keep lights burning, however, at the masjid whither, morning and evening, they partially repair for worship. A few of them have some knowledge of the godly zeal of Judas Maccabaeus, which the Jews celebrate at this season.

10. Thebat. On the tenth day a few of the Beni Israel fast, in commemoration of the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, the King of Babylon.

11. Shebat. This month is not distinguished by any holiday.

12. Adar. On the fourteenth day the Beni Israel fast, preparatory to the feast of Purim, or Lots, which takes place on the following day, and which they partially observe, in imitation of the Arabian or Cochin Jews, as a festival commemorative of the great deliverance wrought through the instrumentality of Esther. They do not, like the Jews, repeat the feasts of Lots or Purim, when the intercalary month, Ve-Adar, happens to occur.

The Beni Israel practice occasional voluntary fasts; particularly when they are inclined to make vows. They observe no jubilee.

The Beni Israel use, on all occasions and under the most trivial circumstances, the usual Jewish prayer, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord."

They expect the Messiah, and that they will one day return to Jerusalem. They think that the time of his appearance will soon arrive, at which they much rejoice, believing that at Jerusalem they will see their God, worship him only, and be despised no more.

This is all the information that can be collected from the accounts of Mr. Sargon and of Dr. Wilson.—Prophetic Times.

A Question and Its Answer. Daniel Chapter 8.

The identification of the Horn and his sanctuary, or the place of his sanctuary, now claims our attention. It was not the four horns of the goat, nor one of the four, that was exalted. But out of one of them there came forth a little horn. It is claimed by some that this little horn is the head of the Mohammedan church and nation. But was this horn the Sultan of Turkey, conceived in one of the divisions of Greece? If so, where is the evidence? If this horn has arisen, it must of necessity be either Mohammedanism or Popery. Is there any evidence that Popery was conceived in one of the divisions of Greece? If not, then Popery was not this horn. But, if Popery was conceived here, and if it will fill the other parts of the vision, then Popery must be this horn; and, if history can be relied on, then we have the origin of the horn, for it was the Greek Emperor Zeno that set up the first claim of headship of the church. This emperor did in the year 482 pass the edict called the Henoticon. This was prompted by the bishops of Constantinople and Alexandria. The design of this decree was just what the word happens—Heretical or uniting; the decree to unite all under one head. This was the entrepreneur of headship to the church. Out of one of them, one of the divisions of Greece, came forth a little horn. From this small is gaining this little horn waxed great. This which was conceived by these bishops and this Emperor culminated in the supremacy of the Bishop of Rome.

In the Bible we trace the lineage of God's Messiah from Seth to Noah, Abraham, David Zerubbabel, on down to Mary. Daniel's vision runs along the line of Anti-Christ, starting with the pushing of the ram, the plot of Haman, and runs on down the line of the Greek Emperors till the horn is produced, becomes great; and his greatness comes down when from him the continual (received as tithes) is taken away, and the place of his sanctuary is cast down. If words must be supplied in this prophecy, why not supply them here? The word revenue, or tithes, instead of the word sacrifice? If this be the horn, a continual revenue was paid to him by those over whom he, in his greatness, gained ascendency, which revenue could be taken away. The secret of this prophecy seems to be in getting the proper words to fill up the vacuum. Words were withheld. The words "were closed up and sealed till the time of the end." "Shut up the words, and seal the book to the time of the end." Dan. xii. 4, 9. Daniel heard but did not understand; and yet, at the time of the end the wise were to understand. In ch. viii, 13, let us supply this little word to—"At the time of the end is the vision,"—the taking the continual, and making desolate, is at the time of the end, "I will make the know what shall be in the last end of the indignation: for the time appointed (2300 days) is at the end," the end just referred to, the last end. "The vision of the evening and the morning which was told is true; for it is for many days;"—far down to the future, a far off scene.

"How long is the end of these wonders? or, how long is this wonderful end? Ch. xii. 6. Don't read it "how long shall it be to the end of these wonders?" but, "how long is it to the end?"

In ch. viii. the question is, "How long is the vision concerning the continual, the transgression and making desolate, to give, or, till the sanctuary and host is given over 2300 days to take away the continual in, and to make desolate in?" Then, from the end of the 2300 days, till the man in linen above the waters of the river is fulfilled, in a time, times, and a part (Mar.) of a time; three years and a part of the fourth year. The vision of Ch. viii. closes with the taking away from him the continual and the casting down the place of his sanctuary; this is 2300 days long from the beginning of the taking away till its end. The vision of Ch. x. is just what was seen "One man in linen, girded with fine fine gold of Uphaz; his body like the beryl, his face as lightning, his eyes as lamps of fire, his arms and feet like in color to polished brass, the voice of his words like the voice of a multitude." This scene of the taking away of the continual from the horn of Ch. viii. In this vision of Ch. viii., one scene after another passes before the prophet's sight;—the ram, the goat, his great horn; then it is broken; then four arise; then appears the little one; then its greatness; then its decrease, etc. But the vision of Ch. x. opens with the man in linen; the curtain was drawn on the scene of Ch. viii. just where the sanctuary is given over, the continual is taken away, etc.; and the scene of Ch. x. opens just where the other closed, and the last question of the saint is put to the man in linen "How long is this end of wonders, this wonderful end?" The first question was not, how long is the vision from the pushing of the ram to its end, but how long is the taking away, etc. The last question is not "how long shall it be to the end of these wonders?" but "how long is the end of these wonders?" The answer is, "a time, times, and a part (Mar.) of a time;—three years, and a part of the fourth. 2300 days, 6 years and 110 days, is measured off in which to take from the continual revenue, the place of his sanctuary cast down, and the sanctuary cleansed, etc.; and three years and a part of a fourth, it, which to fulfill the vision of the man in linen.

Some may claim that the translators had the best right to supply the words of the vision; but as the words were sealed up till the time of the end, the translators could know no more of the vision than others. In Rev. Ch. x., we have an example of the manner of sealing up words. John is told to seal up what the seven thunders said, and write them not—a very effectual way of concealing them. It is conceded that we should have had in Daniel the word continual instead of the word daily. If the horn is identified, and it is from him that this is taken away, then we can determine whether it is continual revenue, or sacrifices &c. for the last time, let us trace out and identify the horn. Out of one of them came forth a little horn, it waxed great against (Mar.) the host of heaven; and he (it again) was magnified even to be the prince of the host; and from him (Mar.) the continual was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary cast down. To fulfill this part of the vision, we must find a horn that was exalted,—one that had a sanctuary, one from which something is taken away, etc. This horn and this sanctuary, at the last end of the indignation, had no more to do with Jerusalem and her host, than it had to do with the moon. In Ch. ix. we have 70 weeks from the beginning of the vision measured off on Jerusalem and her people. Daniel says, that the man Gabriel, that he had seen at the beginning of the vision, informed him, and said to him, "Understand the matter, and consider the vision." It is certain that the vision of Ch. viii. is here referred to; for Daniel say—the man Gabriel that I had seen in the vision at at the beginning. This vision began with the pushing of the ram that stood before the river Ulai.* Time is the beginning of the vision; and here the 70 weeks began and end on Jerusalem.

But the vision of the continual, and making desolate, was far before. Here Jerusalem and the temple appeared in the scene. Daniel would, at least, have understood this part. But after the vision, we find him pleading to know something about Jerusalem, his people and their sanctuary. If the sanctuary, Christ, was the one at Jerusalem, and he had heard that 2300 days were measured off upon it, why does he afterward plead to know something about it? But it was the sanctuary of the horn that was to be cleansed, and then given over to be trodden under foot at the end of the 2300 days. This may seem like foolishness to many, but wait till you get all the testimony before giving the verdict.

Noble Tribute to Woman.

The time was when woman was a delicate toy, a passive instrument, a petted slave; but that time ended when first her baptism in Christian faith and love began. She, whom the wisdom of hoary antiquity deemed too weak to act as witness to a dying man's will, was called upon to give her testimony to the cause of God. From the palace and the cottage, gathered from all ranks, made up of all ages, matrons grave with years, young mothers with clining infants, virgins tender and pure as the maid-mother of Him they adored, calmly and cheerfully bore the horrid penalities of the faith that was in them. Mangled and gored by wild cattle, torn by savage beasts, mutilated and hacked piecemeal by the executioner, their flesh rent by scourges, their spirit more deeply agonized still by that last refinement of the praetor's cruelty, exposure in the public street to the mocking indignation of the populace—thus did this holiest army of martyrs lift up their spotless sacrifice to God, and then it was that the misprised name of woman was redeemed once and forever from the desecration of the past, and she stood forth before the world a noble creature, made to serve and glorify God, a spiritual being, with spiritual faculties for spiritual ends.—Selected.

A curious discovery has been made in the convent of Santa Maria la Nuova at Rome, which formerly belonged to the Franciscan monks. It consists of three underground cells, accessible only through a hidden trap door, and where monks guilty of grave offences were, probably, put. In the first there is a little light, through an opening in the wall; the second is narrower and darker; the third is without a ray of light, and is a dismal hole. Sinister and mostly obliterated inscriptions cover the walls, and numerous instruments of torture, as well as human bones, were found.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.
THE RESTITUTION advocates the final revelation of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with Jesus Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immediate location of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion, as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Church Organization Papers. Why Organize?

"All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."

2. The Scriptures require that the Gospel shall be preached in all the world to every creature, and he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned. This work must be done by the saints.

3. They enjoin upon all those who believe the Gospel in every place to be one as Christ and the Father are one, to be perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgement, that they may stand fast in one spirit, with one mind, striving together for the faith of the Gospel. They compare this union to a house built of stones, to a building fitly framed together, as a house builded together for a habitation of God, as a body composed of many members, yet but one body.

4. They represent that the gospel which is to be preached and believed is the faith which was once delivered to the saints, the promise made of God to the fathers,—the Gospel which was preached to Abraham; and that it is comprehended in this saying: "In thee, and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." That the all nations to be blessed are all the living inhabitants of the earth under the whole heaven at the time referred to.

That Jesus Christ is the seed of Abraham, and that he was born to do what the seed of Abraham was to do; that he lived, and died, and rose again; and that he went to heaven, and will return again, and raise the saints from the dead, and sit down upon his throne, and have power over the nations, for the same purpose, to fulfill the promise made to Abraham.

That those who become Christ's by believing the Gospel and being baptized into his name, are also the seed of Abraham, and joint heirs with Christ according to the promise, and that Christ and the saints when they shall be perfected by the resurrection from the dead, will constitute the seed of Abraham which will jointly sit down upon his throne, and have power over the nations to subdue them, and bless them, as God spake to Abraham. That this promise reveals God's purpose concerning the world, in the following particulars.

1. That all the nations of the earth shall be blessed as a final result.

2. That the seed of Abraham will be the instrumentality by which this work will be accomplished.

3. That this seed, when fully developed, and made incorruptible and immortal by being raised from the dead when the Lord comes; will take possession of his enemies and subdue them, by blessing them that bless Abraham, and cursing them that curse Abraham; and in this way execute justice and judgment in the earth.

4. That when the nations shall be subdued to God, and after the wicked shall be destroyed, then all the nations of the earth will be blessed. Then there will be no more sin, nor sorrow, nor sickness, nor pain, nor death, nor curse, but blessing instead. Then every knee will bow, and every tongue will confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father, and then the knowledge and the glory of God will cover the earth as the waters do the sea, and the will of God will be done on earth as it is done in heaven. And from that time onward Christ and the saints will reign over the nations which have been healed by the leaves of the tree of life forever and ever. See proposition 4. The Scriptures enjoin upon.

5. And finally, that the Scriptures do enjoin upon all the saints to yield themselves unto God, as they have been accustomed to yield themselves unto sin.

Now, therefore, being satisfied that we almost utterly fail of being joined together as stated above, or of striving together for the faith of the Gospel in the manner described above, we, whose names are hereunto annexed, having believed the Gospel as set forth in God's covenant with Abraham, and having been baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, and being desirous to walk in newness of life, do agree that we will work together according to the following plan:

ARTICLE I.—THE NAME.

We assume the name given to the saints in the New Testament the Church of God.

ARTICLE II.—OUR OBJECT.

Our object is to unite and enroll the names of all like precious faith in this place, and in the region round about into one compact body; to instruct, encourage, strengthen and perfect each other in Christian character, to provide for the poor of the body; and to preach this Gospel by the living preacher, and by the circulation of printed matter, in order to gather together a peculiar people zealous of good works.

ARTICLE III.—MEMBERSHIP.

We will receive to our membership any who have believed the Gospel, and have been baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, and are walking in newness of life, by having their names enrolled with us, and also those who believe the Gospel, on their being baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins.

ARTICLE IV.—OFFICERS.

There shall be one or more elders, and one or more deacons, and one clerk, according to the necessities of the church. These officers may be chosen at any regular or special meeting of the church, providing notice of the election has been previously given, and shall hold their office during the pleasure of the church.

ARTICLE V.—DUTY OF OFFICERS.

The elders shall labor to instruct and edify the church and oversee its spiritual interests, and preside at its meetings. The deacons shall have charge of its finances, collect and hold its funds, subject to the order of the church. The clerk shall perform the duties usually pertaining to that office. These officers shall be the rulers or overseers of the church.

ARTICLE VI.—MEETINGS.

It shall be the duty of the church to maintain stated meetings, as often as it shall be deemed expedient.

ARTICLE VII.—FUNDS.

Each member of the church shall contribute to its funds at such stated times as the church shall determine, according as God has prospered him, that it may be in readiness when occasion shall require.

ARTICLE VIII.—HOW SHALL THE FUNDS BE APPROPRIATED?

They shall be used for the objects stated in Article No. 2 in such proportion as the church shall from time to time direct.

ARTICLE IX.—HOW SHALL THE EQUALITY OF CONTRIBUTIONS BE DETERMINED?

By comparing the receipts and expenses of each member with such uniform rule as the church may direct. We agree to adopt the following plan as an experiment for one year. We will each of us, or if husband and wife, jointly report to the deacon monthly our receipts and expenses for the month preceeding, to be recorded in his book, and pay one per cent. of our income at the time of making the report and four per cent. of the excess of our income over our expenses at the end of the year.

ARTICLE X.—DECISIONS DETERMINED BY A TWO-THIRDS VOTE.

All decisions of the church shall be determined by a two-thirds vote of the members present.

ARTICLE XI.—DISCIPLINE.

In cases of discipline, the Bible alone shall be used as authority by which to convict of wrong.

ARTICLE XII.—THE ACTION OF THE CHURCH FINAL.

In all matters of discipline the decisions of the church shall be final, and not subject to an appeal to any other body.

COVENANT.

We do now covenant with God and with each other, that we will strive to walk together in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless; that we will faithfully perform the duties contemplated in the striving together for the faith of the Gospel; that we will maintain a faithful, watchful care over each other, and endeavor to provoke each other unto love and good works; that we will attend faithfully the appointments of the church, and pay into its treasury as stated in our articles of agreement; that we will be honest in our deal, faithful to our obligations, temperate in our habits and just towards all. And finally, that we will deny ourselves of ungodliness, and worldly lusts; and live soberly, and righteously, and godly in this present world; looking for that blessed hope, the glorious appearning of our Savior Jesus Christ. Amen.

Bible Organization.

Thou art a elect, and upon this rock will I build my church, and the gates of hell (hades) shall not prevail against it. Matt. xvi. 18.

Peter's confession—Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God,—is the great fundamental truth of the Christian system and comprehends the Gospel of Christ. Christ means anointed, as the Hebrew word, Messiah. He acknowledges that Jesus is the promised Messiah, anointed to be a Prince and a Savior, to give repentance to Israel, and remission of sins.

In response to this confession Jesus says: "Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona, for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven."

But, to be built on the revealed word that Jesus taught is the same as to be built on Him. Hence Paul, Ephesians ii, 19th to 22d verses: "Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints of the household of God; and are built upon the foundation of prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ himself being the chief cornerstone; in whom all the building fitly framed together, groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord." "For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Christ Jesus." 1 Cor. iii. 11. In the same connection, Paul declares that he was a wise Master-Builder, doing his part in building Christ's church on this rock foundation.

Jesus built his church by his personal work of preaching and showing the glad tidings of the Kingdom of God, and by the miracles he wrought to confirm the word. He called and instructed twelve apostles, and sent them to preach the same Gospel. He also sent out seventy disciples to preach to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. He then died upon the cross, and "bare our sins in his own body on the tree." "So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many, and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without a sin-offering, unto salvation." He cried on the cross, in the agonies of death, "It is finished!—the great work that he came to do on the earth until his second appearing. In the meantime he ever liveth to make intercession for his church, in heaven above. All this he has done and is doing through his personal agency and that of the apostles and others who have been and are at present preaching the same Gospel, and thus building up his church. On the day of Pentecost a new and mighty impulse was given to this work. Then was the promise of the Holy Spirit fulfilled, and through his agency and mighty working in conjunction with the testimony of the apostles, three thousand souls were added to the church. The Lord added them through the miraculous power of the Holy Spirit confirming the cardinal truth proclaimed, that Jesus was the promised Messiah and Son of God, and although they by wicked hands, had crucified him, yet God had raised him from the dead to sit on David's throne, and restore again the Kingdom to Israel. Believing this Gospel, the convicted thousands were called upon to repent and be baptized for the remission of sins. Then they that gladly received his word were baptized, and the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls; and they continued steadfastly in the apostle's doctrine (teaching) and fellowship, and in breaking of bread and in prayers.

How did these many converts get into the church fellowship of the apostles and one hundred and twenty other Christians? Were they voted in? Did they have to assent to a human creed and covenant? Did they agree to give a certain per cent, or endorse some modern "our position"? The answer is very plain: They did not. They gladly received the word and obeyed, were baptized.

Our position as Christians is clearly defined by the word of the Lord. We need not take upon us any human covenant to be honest and temperate, and to statedly give at short periods, &c., because in taking the inspired word for our guide, we are thoroughly furnished for every good work. All we can demand of any one is that he subscribe to a solemn covenant to take the Holy Scriptures for his rule of faith and practice, and do it! This agreement comprehends all duties, and not a few. No covenant of man's device can comprehend all obligations of heart and life, but the Bible does; Hence it is far preferable.

We are, therefore, not called upon to frame a church organization, but to accept God's organized plan of church building. The elders and deacons are of his appointment and should be selected by the church as God directs; but the elders should not "Lord it over God's heritage, but be ensamples to the flock." Through a mistranslation, the elders have claimed to be rulers, and even lords. Paul says, in 1 Tim. v. 16, "Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honor." [The Diaglott translates it preside well, which is literally correct. Again, in Heb. xiii. 17, "Obey them that have the rule over you." The Diaglott renders this and the 7th verse leaders—"Remember them who are your leaders." Bible elders, then, are spiritual guides or leaders, and are not rulers. The leaders and led co-operate with Christ in building the church on the one foundation of prophets and apostles, Jesus being the chief corner stone, and the gates of the grave shall not long prevail against it.

E. HOYT.

Proposed "Constitution of the Christian Association of America."—No. 2.

This name—"The Christian Association of America"—implies that there is, or is to be no other; consequently it is expected to supercede all and every other organization ordained to effect the same purpose. Does not this, of necessity, ignore the separate, local churches of Christ which the apostles themselves or through others, as Timothy and Titus, planted, and "set in order and ordained" as depositaries of and witnesses for the truth, in all the world? Is there no danger, here, of our trenching on the divine rights and prerogatives? Is it not written that "the church, planted on the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ the chief corner-stone, is the pillar and ground of the truth?" I confess to some apprehension when we have the proposition made to us—not in terms, indeed, but in effect, and which is its ultimate tendency—to leave this foundation and try an experiment with another, reckless of the Scripture "other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid," and not even the honored and beloved names of such worthy men as Brethren Willcox, Reed, Stephenson, E. Miller and Eshelman, can wholly conquer my repugnance. I feel sure that I speak the sentiments and convictions of more than one among the brethren of the one faith and the one body, when I venture to call a halt to our fellow-travellers to the blessed better land, and invite, enquiring whether we are not in danger of making ourselves "transgressors by building (again) the things which we once destroyed." It is not in anger or childish alarm that we ventured to do so. It is not that we love Cæsar less, but Rome more. We are in honor and in duty bound to cherish the word and the work of the Master and his chosen twelve. They gave us the word, and the brethren at large are the "great company that are to publish it" and thus to lead all men to the truth; and when we have heard and obeyed that truth, they tell us to say to others, "come," "come buy wine and honey, and drink of the water of life, freely," "without money and without price." Freely you have received, freely give!! They say, plainly, "Preach the word—be instant, in season and out of season."

I extract from the otherwise admirable reasoning of Bro. E. Miller, in the RESTITUTION of September 6th, entitled, with wise conservatism, "Local Church Organization," this passage under the head of funds: "As it is impracticable to prosecute the work assigned to the church without funds; as (so) no church is efficiently set in order without the adoption of some plan of finance," etc. Will our intelligent brother and his co-signees of the address to the brethren, tell us what "plan of finance" the apostles "adopted" for the first churches other than the present divinely ordained, and, I submit, all-sufficient plan of the collections (as the Lord prospers us) "on the First Day of the week?"

But look at the premises of the brother's statement. If, indeed, "it is practicable" to do the work assigned to the church, without money, Peter and John were but poorly provided for their work, for they said, without murmur or complaint, "Silver and gold have we none." Did not they prosecute their work as the Master commanded? Again, if "impracticable," did the Lord require impossibilities of his servants? Is the Bible plan "impracticable" and yet the Master failed or neglected to give another "plan of finance?"

I beg to repeat the inquiry: Are we called upon to convert and proselyte all mankind? If so, in the present age and by some wise "plan of finance" which we are to frame, what need of the Lord's Day—of the millennial age—to do that work? God is now choosing "out from among the Gentiles—a people for his name"—the few who are to be saved in any generation until the Lord comes, after which "all shall know the Lord." Evangelism—the preaching of the word for the enlightenment of the Gentiles—is a secondary and inferior work, to making our own calling and election sure. It is rather the incidental work of the Christian servant of God. Read Paul's address to the elders of the church at Ephesus, in the 20th chapter, particularly 28-3 verses. He seems to be far more solicitous—apostolic evangelist as he was—that they and their flock should be "built up, and have an inheritance among the sanctified" than that they should invent or devise some "plan of finance" by which they should convert the nations. All such schemes and plans devised by the brethren, however well-meant and zealously urged, lead to a conformity to and copying of the sects, "the nations around us." We may not suspect it, in our honest zeal, but has not such an ardent desire for making converts and proselytes, its spring and fountain in our intense anxiety to "build us a name, lest we be scattered abroad in the earth," and so be lost to the public view, and to all public consideration? An aged brother, a veteran in the faith, a faithful servant of the Master, a bold and intelligent disciple known well to the brethren, writes only a few days ago in reference to what he truly considers this "new departure from the ancient faith." "I can find in it more resemblance to Rome than Jerusalem. It savors of the Vatican, and tempts one to think that it is a temptation of the evil one and will end, if it does not begin, indeed, in enrolling us also among the numerous progeny of the mother of abominations." If this apprehension prove well-founded, who among us is ready to sound the alarm: "Come out of her, my people that ye be not partakers of her sins," etc. I hope such a proclaimer will not be wanting.

Let us beware then how we depart from the Divine model. Men have been prone from the beginning to seek out "many inventions," rather than be content with God's ways and precepts.

It was because the generations descended from Noah after the flood had no faith in, or became forgetful of God's promise, so often before them in the rainbow, that he would not again destroy the earth by water, that they builded the city and the tower of Babel, to protect them from the recurrence of that calamity. See Genesis xi. 4-10. Had they believed and confided in God's rainbow token which plainly declared this truth, they would have exposed themselves to that folly and avoided the very evil which their want of faith brought upon them, and which they dreaded, viz.: Their dispersion on the whole earth, an event which God, in his wisdom and mercy, overruled for the good of the race.

Equally culpable were the Israelites in their complaints and murmurs in the wilderness, after their escape from Egypt, chiding Moses and Aaron for not permitting them to go back to the flesh pots they had left behind them in the house of boudage. So, too, when they had been settled in peace and prosperity in the promised land under Samuel and the judges, and in spite of their bitter national experience of evil in withdrawing the neck from God's yoke upon them, they desired a king to be given unto them to lead them in battle, to go in and out before them, as the nations around them," which excited the wrath of God, yet he punished them (as he may do his people in these days) by granting their request. Let us, then, beware. We are all painfully aware, in our own experience, that "man (even) in his best estate is altogether vanity." He never interferes with God's work without marring it and covering himself with confusion. We certainly cannot improve on his plans. Is it not presumptuous in us to attempt to do so? If a scheme so vast and ambitious as "The Christian Association of America" be needed to make converts to the truth and save the human race on this continent from destruction, which its high sounding name imparts, would not such a huge financial plan, or some hint of its necessity and "organization" be found somewhere in the Holy Scriptures? But no such sanction for it can be found in the Bible. It is confessedly, therefore, a plan of man's invention to do that which God has not required to be done, or, which, if required, he has failed to do, and hence, man—poor, finite feeble man—a mere atom or worm of the dust, "whose breath is in his nostrils," must step on the stage and offer, in his puny wisdom, to do it. I appeal to the candor of the brethren to say if that is not about the real state of the case?

The Bible tells us of the church at Rome, at Corinth, at Philippi, with their bishops and deacons, but where do we read of the grand "Christian Association of the Roman Empire?" The fact is, the churches, separately, locally and individually organized, are God's heritage. Is it not still true that "the Lord's portion is his people—Jacob is the lot of his inheritance?" They are the true Israel, the apple of his eye. Let us wait until He bids us to create a grand, central general government over them, and call it "The Christian Association of America."

If such an institution is created, will it not make the present separate local churches with all the rights, duties and independence of action among them now secured by the law of God, into the great, central controlling government at Plymouth, or such other Washington as may be chosen as the seat of government? In that case—and this is the inevitable tendency and result, if not the design (which I do not charge)—wherein shall it differ from the huge, human machinery of the hierarchies among us, the Catholic council, the Episcopal convention, the Methodist conference, the Presbyterian synod, etc., who meet annually to make laws to govern their flock? Are we prepared for this? I hope not.

In my next I propose to examine the specific features of the proposed "constitution."

Fraternally and kindly submitted to the brethren in Christ.

TORIAL DEPARTMENT.

☞ We saw Bro. Hugh Barnhill a moment on his return from Tyner City, where he preached last Sunday. H reports good meetings and that two were baptised. Bro. B—— is a good worker and shows commendable zeal for the gospel of our blessed Lord.

The Living Way.

The word life carries with it the sweet assurance of love. Where there is life there is activity. The whole mundane sphere teems with life and love. Matter in its every form, in its sorrow, in its comforts, owns its place in nature and falls in with the cold overshadowing evils. He falters when he sees the line of light. But still he ever hopes in the living activities of the present and hails with joy the coming morn. But life is the alpha of mundane activities. The bible reader and bible lover finds life the great burden of Divine Revelation. The realms of death are lighted up with the promise of life. There is a open book which is called "the book of life." There is a river ever flowing from the great white throne, and it is "the river of life." A tree with twelve fruits or twelve harvests is growing in the paradise of God, it is "the tree of life." We have the living bread, the ever living Christ and the LIVING WAY. Happy is he who walks therein, for it is the way of life and will lead to the living Father where all is life and love.

Not Good Enough.

There are those who see the Christian life in such purity and grandeur as to exclaim, "I am not good enough to be a Christian." The frailties of life are so numerous, and our weakness so great, that we feel unable to approach the throne of the Infinite. If we were to accept that view which converts God into a being of revenge, that He is cold and relentless, we should despair of ever coming to Him. But when we know that he is a God of love, of goodness, of compassion and mercy; that He is kind and forgiving, we should rejoice that a door has been opened wherein we can pass and find peace.

The world looks God at too great a distance; but He is not far from every one of us; the hairs of our head are numbered. His love has been made known by scriptures, promises and rewards. Love toward his enemies, forgiveness to those who persecuted his Son, pardon to all who repent. Then there comes the invitation; "Whosoever will, let him come and take of the water of life." The erring have hope, the fallen have promises, the sinful are offered pardon. Who would linger besides the pools of death when a free access to life's fountains is offered? The beggar must beg in his rags so the sinner must come as he is. Not good enough! Heaven rejoices over one sinner that repenteth, the golden realm is ready for the returning prodigal, and a crown of glory awaits the brow of him who forsakes his sins and seeks for immortality in the coming blessedness.

Too Much Theory.

No people in the world should feel happier and more at rest than we who claim to have the "light of life." The great questions pertaining to the coming rest, the resurrection, the destiny of man and earth, etc. These momentous themes shine forth with great brilliancy and beauty—they charm the beholder with an ecstasy of vision akin to the angels. But of what avail is all this beauty without a personal interest therein? We must not forget the duties of to-day in our eagerness for the to-morrow. The mere form of doctrine,' is not enough. We must be upright and earnest. There are temptations to be overcome, trials to meet, difficulties to settle, hearts to sooth and charities to be bestowed. A theory in the head may draw away from the heart its proper culture. The whole life must respond to the earnest and blessed work of Christ.

Christianity should not be treated as an outside garment, to be put off or on at our pleasure. It must be a part of us. The word must become flesh, in each one. The light of truth will shine with greater warmth in noble deeds than in words. Theory is necessary to a proper understanding of the will of Him who is the way, the truth and the life; but that alone will leave us on the shore, after the ship has taken its way for the other side.

We must be imbued with love for the fallen,—a real desire to save men will meet the demands of faith. But to speculate upon mere outward forms of spiritual life is merely to hold the truth in unrighteousness. It is a cloud without water. Our brethren, many times, in their zeal for theory, forget the inner and more important work of laboring to save men from death. It is right to preach, to pray and sing the truth, but to live the truth will meet heaven's plan and bring the sweet assurance that we are doing those things which are "well pleasing in his sight."

It often seems that our paper is too much loaded down with heavy articles and that too upon subjects too far away from life's burdens. The lonely suffering child of God finds too much comfort, too much zeal for hobbies. He is not fed upon the bread of life but upon the husks of speculation. As we cannot give what we do not have, we must labor to bring ourselves into that grace of truth where the joys of peace and earnest living shall fit us for the duties of to-day.

Huxley's Lectures.

Prof. Huxley, of England, has been lecturing the people of New York City upon the subject of Evolution. He concludes that the earth is older than the Mosaic record claims it to be. It is strange that men of science should have so much trouble with Genesis. The testimony says nothing about the world's age. Scientists, as they love to be called, do not read the Bible, but certain books written about the Bible. Mr. Huxley makes the following statement which shows how he understands the matter.

The second, or Miltonian hypothesis, holds that the universe appeared suddenly, and its parts were ordered in six natural days. On the first day light appeared; on the second the firmament, with the waters above and beneath; on the third the water drew away from the land, and such vegetables as now exist appeared; on the fifth came aquatic animals; on the sixth the earth gave birth to the terrestrial animals, excepting birds, and then man appeared, and the work of creation ceased. Methods of interpreting the Hebrew text have been found according to which any duration conceived to be necessary may be assigned as the length of the "day," but the scheme of Milton, which is that which all the English-speaking peoples have held, and we have all been taught, leaves no doubt as to what the great poet meant by the word —(the speaker here read an expository passage from "Pradise Lost")

It appears from this that Mr. Huxley is bound that the English people shall swallow what he calls, "the Miltonian hypothesis." Now let some critic, like Conway, set up the claim that all the English people endorse Milton's view of the devil, wings, tail and hoofs, and the farce will be complete.

Image Smashers.

There are times when seels seem to be as thick as blackberries. This state of things arises from a number of causes.

1. Old organizations will not admit that they are wrong in anything, but right in everything.

2. Those who feel the power of new ideas or new forms of truth, cannot help giving vent to their pent up doctrines. If they hold their peace, or keep still, the stones will become preachers. These men formulate their ideas into a given number of articles, and all who so believe co-operate. Then another sect is born. They have all the truth, and nothing but truth.

3. Another class of men, who see no other way to distinguish themselves, deem it wisdom to create divisions in existing bodies upon topics of a trivial character, and form a new party. Their chief distinction is in being unlike everybody else. They are negatives. What others do is false and wicked, and "we must not be wicked," is their motto.

If all the ambitious place-hunters were taken out of the way, and men who give out that they themselves are great ones were to keep silent, many little dwarfish sects would die out. We have a class of men who are great idol smashers! They destroy temples of worship and disorganize men, they glory in their personal importance and call it a zeal for God. But these sect-haters, anti-church attendants, opposers of the one-man power, are red hot for a new departure, but they must lead or the movement is wrong. Modern Christendom has as many isms as the scarlet beast has names. There must be a reason for all this work of partyism. We hardly know how the evil can be averted, but we are sure that if certain heads were down the surface would be smoother and there would be less danger to the ship. "Our name is legion" belongs to those who live in tombs. If men would exercise the same amount of good sense in religion that they do in the business affairs of every day life, we should soon get rid of much that is mildewing the world. If you have a new idea wait for a proper time to unfold it. Speak the truth in love. The world will hear an earnest, honest man who has really got a message, but it frequently turns a deaf ear to a man who appears as an elephant in a China shop, —who gives in his "bill of items;" "I come to smash things generally." If they do not listen they are all sent to the bad. Bad tongues make bad ears and worse hearts. Better by far appear in a community as a restorer of peace, as in sympathy with men, than to come with an ugly visage and "stamping the residue with your feet." Don't try to build up yourself at the expense of decency and religion. Be faithful to your message, then God will bless you and the people will rejoice.

Journal and Labors in the Gospel.

We stopped over a day with the old veteran R. V. Lyon and his kind and intelligent companion. We were never more kindly treated. They have a charming house, surrounded with shady trees and fruitful vines.

Our conversations were almost exclusively confined to Bible subjects; especially on his peculiar views. On these we differ widely. There may be a few who agree with him on some of his views but I have never seen another besides himself, and perhaps his wife.

He agrees with Thomas Paln with reference to the Father of Christ. If his view is correct? there is nothing miraculous in Christ's birth than in the birth of any since that of Cain. The connection of Isaac and John were miraculous but not Christ's birth, according to R. V. Lyon. But unlike Deists he only expunges that portion of the record of Christ's birth which relates to his virgin mother, and to his having been begotten by the Holy Spirit. He also repudiates Matthew's application of the prophecy of Isaiah in which he says, "Behold a virgin shall be with child, and bring forth a son, and they shall name him Emanuel which being interpreted is God with us."

He expunges the last seven verses of the first chapter of Matthew.

Thomas Paine gives as good authority I think, for throwing away the whole Bible, because none of it agrees with his creed.

He reasons in reference to the genealogy of Christ just as Thomas Pain does, ignoring the fact that it was only necessary for Joseph to be the legal father of Christ, to give him a legal title to David's throne and kingdom. To make his view consistent he should strike the following language of Mary and Gabriel from the sacred cause of inspiration. "Then said Mary unto the angel how shall this be seeing I know not a man." And the angel answered and said unto her, the Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the highest shall overshadow thee, therefore that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God." Luke 1:34-35. The whole of the foregoing is a farce upon the hypothesis that Joseph was to be the natural father of Christ. Elder Lyons has changed his views relative to none having a resurrection except obedient believers. He holds now that all the descendents of Seth whom God foresaw would have obeyed had they been favored with an opportunity, will be raised from the dead, and placed beyond the possibility of jeopardy. He makes their salvation absolutely certain, not being merely suspended upon the omniscience of God; but make absolutely sure by his immutable decrees. Would it not have been infinitely more benevolent in the great Creator to have kindly permitted the whole race to have died in infancy, and then to raise from the dead only such as he had foreseen would obey when the Gospel should be preached to them; and thus have prevented all the sin, misery and woe which will have cursed the earth and filled the world for thousands of years." What a pity that God had not known that Cain would sin and fill the earth with Canitish serpents for whose salvation no preperations could be made, for the sufficient reason that God did not know that they would exist; and was therefore taken by surprise. So was mother Eve mistaken, for she really supposed that she had received a child from the Lord. God had not found it out after Cain had killed Abel; for he calls him Abel's brother—thus either Abel was a serpent or Cain was not. God has not yet learned that Cain was to be the father of a numerous family of serpents, for he says to him, "If thou doest well shalt not thou be accepted" If God had decreed everlasting destruction of Cain and all his posterity, and had known that Cain could not do well, such language was deceptive, and unworthy the just Governor of the world.

If Cain was not a free agent having power to do either good or evil then there was no "if" about it, he could not do good at all. The sixth and seventh verses of the fourth chapter of Genesis clearly shows that Cain was a free agent having power to do good or evil; and that he be good or bad, accepted or rejected according to his conduct, and not according to the fixed decrees of God—but that he was just as responsible as his brother. The apostle Paul explains the grand reason Cain's sacrifice was rejected and Abel's accepted.

The position that it was because Abel's contained blood and Cain's did not, is all speculation. Each offered the products of his own labor, and the pursuit of one was just as honorable as that of the other. Both were excellent, but Abel's more excellent, because prompted by faith except mere legality. Thus, Paul says, "By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain by which he obtained witness that he was righteous; God testifying of his gifts." Paul explains the reason why no sacrifice, however excellent in itself, is acceptable to God unless it shall be prompted by faith. He says, when referring to the sacrifices of these two brothers in the next verse, after the record, "But without faith it is impossible to please him." The whole theme of the apostle in this noted chapter, is the glorious achievements of faith. Abel heads the long line of ancient worthies, the triumphs of whose faith are inscribed upon the mighty roll of earth's noblest heroes, "of whom the world was not worthy." Through faith in the inspired record, though dead he has been speaking for six thousand years. The present status of a man who has filled so large a space in the history of the cause of truth demands more than a passing notice. Our discussions were lively. He advocates his peculiar views with the same zeal with which he preaches the Gospel of the kingdom. I can with just as good authority as he gave, reject the whole New Testament Scriptures. I endeavored to confute his reasons, absurd as they appeared to me, with cogent arguments. I did not treat him as some of the able correspondents of the RESTITUTION have treated me. I believe in meeting everything with arguments. He who is sure he has the truth, can afford to be magnanimous. J. M. S.

Prayer.

Prayer is not an ornation which is designed to explain to God his own attributes. No man need to spend ten or twenty minutes in telling the Creator how great and how good He is. Such speeches would be an insult even to a man, and how can we imagine then to appear before the Supreme Ruler of the universe? Man cannot approach the Father in an act of devotion without idolizing his own insignificence. But when he undertakes to explain their relative positions to God, he runs the risk of losing all devotional feeling and degenerating into an attempt at a literary production. Many an elaborate composition has been delivered to please an audience, which was very far from being a prayer in the only true sense of the word. It is enough to chill the blood in one's veins to hear the flippant expression, "What a splendid prayer that was." If anything is sacred and free from criticism or compliment, it ought surely to be the pleadings of poor humanity with its only friend. But instead of this we have stereotyped forms of prayer adapted to various occasions and not only that, but prayers which are supposed to be extemporaneous, are reported and published and sold as the eloquent production of some fine speaker. What opinion can God and the angels have of this kind of merchandise? How much devotion is there in a prayer which a man knows he is delivering to a reporter that it may be circulated by the press? How much faith can he have, that God will answer a petition which is in every sense a mockery and an insult to the majesty of heaven? This is one extreme and here is another. There is one class of men who will not pray at all in public (and possibly some of them not even in secret,) because there are others who make "long prayers for a pretence"—men who will get up and make an address upon the theories of Christianity without recognizing its Author—men who will undertake to teach without seeking the aid of the Great Teacher—men who will give laws to mankind without consulting the Master, who will undertake to feed the sheep without reference to the Good Shepherd. We are forbidden to pray for the purpose of being seen of men, but Jesus our great exampler prayed before the multitude at the grave of Lazarus and his followers may, and should thus acknowledge the Father before men.

Our instructions, both by precept and example, are not to be ashamed of God, nor afraid to acknowledge him in public as well as private.

But we are also to remember that the Son of God must frequently sought solitude wherein to converse with the Father, so also the great burden of the Christian's prayer is in secret—in the closet or in the chamber where God alone can hear and approve, and we have the promise of an open reward. The ear of the Father is ever open to the pleadings of His children. His heart is ever alive to their sufferings and His hand is always ready to minister to their needs.

The pitiful cry of a wounded child will reach our hearts quicker than an ordinary request, so the deep earnest call to the Father for help will always bring aid from on high. It may be born to the throne in plaintive broken words, or possibly in no words at all. It may be only the pitiful throb of an aching heart reaching upward for help, but God is pledged to answer the cry as His pledges are never in vain. He who feeds the ravens and watcheth the fall of the sparrow will never betray the heart that trusts Him. "Therefore, in everything, in prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your request be made known unto God. And the peace of God which passeth all understanding shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus."

Israel's Great Tribulation.

Eleven hundred thousand Jews perished in the destruction of Jerusalem, and 500,000 fell by the sword with Barcochbas, the false Messiah. Such as survived were sold as slaves into Egypt and forbidden, under the pain of death, even to look at their beloved city. Sapor, King of Persia, violently persecuted them throughout his dominions, A. D 200. Mahomet flattered them for a season, but soon became their inveterate foe, and turning his arms against them, slew vast multitudes, drove them into exile, confiscated their estates, and compelled all who remained to pay the most exhorbitant tribute.

During the dispute respecting image worship in the eighth century, and such as would not bow to the cross and images were subjected to the greatest vexations. In 1065, the King of Grenada became so incensed against them that 100,000 families were reduced to the greatest extremities. During the eleventh and twelfth centuries, the Jews suffered the greatest indignities from the Crusaders, who trampled upon them, extorted their money, and put them to death, on their march to and from the Holy Land. In the first crusade, 16,000 were massacred at Strasburg, 13,000 at Mayence, 12,000 were slain in Batavia. Women at Treves, seeing the Crusaders approach, killed their children, prefering this to having them fall into the hands of the Crusaders. When Jerusalem was taken, all the Jews were inhumanely murdered. In England, in 1189, when Richard I. ascended the throne, the mob fell upon them, and put multitudes to death. From Henry III. they purchased an edict to preserve them from the outrages of the Crusaders. Some of the archbishops and bishops forbade any one's selling them provisions on pain of ex-communications They were often accused of the foulest crimes, and though not found guilty, were compelled to pay the most enormous fines. Seven hundren were massacred in London in 1262, by the barons, to please the Londoners. King Edward I. passed many severe enactments against them, and drew from them several hundred thousand pounds. In 1287 he ordered all the Jews in the kingdom to be imprisioned and 280 to be executed in London, besides vast numbers in other cities; and in 1290 he ordered them all to be banished from the kingdom, never to return upon pain of death. He seized their whole property, scarcely allowing them sufficient to bear their expenses into other lands; the number expelled was 16,511. From this time they were shut out of England for 350 years.

In France, under Louis IX., they were sold with the land on which they dwelt, and in the year 1253, during a violent persecution, 25,000 Jews were put to death under the most cruel tortures. Soon after, they were all banished by Louis, from his dominions. They were recalled and then banished many times from that country.

In Italy, Pope John XXI., pretended that affronted the holy cross, ordered their banishment from his territories, but recalled the edict for 100,000 florins.

The sufferings of the Jews in Spain, from the Crusaders, were probably greater than in any part of Europe. Their own writers indeed view them greater than their people were ever called to suffer since the destruction of Jerusalem. In Spain, too, they were accused of poisoning the rivers and wells, and 15,000 were in consequence put to death. In Spain the officers of the Inquisition brought about a terrible result upon the Jews, in which 2,000 were put to death, many were long imprisoned, and such as had their liberty were compelled to wear two red crosses on their garments, to show that they had escaped from the flames; 17,000 returned to the bosom of the Papal Church. In 1412, 16,000 Jews were forced to profess Popery. About 1472 they were barbarously massacred in the dominions of Venice. In 1472, Ferdinand and Isabella issued a fatal edict, which banished all the Jews, in four months, from Spain; 70,000 families, or 800,000 persons to this decree, left that beautiful kingdom amidst the greatest distress and suffering. Vast multitudes perished on their way to foreign countries. Such as reached them were in the deepest distress and many perished from famine and disease before they could find a settled abode. In Lisbon many fell a prey to the Inquisition. At Mentz, in Germany, 12,000 were killed on a charge of poisoning the fountains. In 1350, Louis, King of Hungary, banished them all from his dominions.

The Jews, by an inv sion of the Tartars in 1241, were driven from place to place and robbed of their possessions. And during the wars of Tamerlane in 1400, all their schools were broken up their learned men destroyed, and the whole people exceedingly impoverished. In Persia they suffered in 1660, under Shah Abbas II., a general massacre for three years' All without distinction of age or sex, were destroyed without pity, who would not renounce their religion. The negroes in Africa have been found treating them also in the most contemptous manner, calling them dogs. In the city of Nuremburg, they were not permitted to walk without a guide. At Augsburg they were suffered to enter only at the price of a florin for every hour they wished to remain. In Frankfort where they numbered 20,000, they were plundered and ridiculed, and shut up in one long narrow street, which was closed upon them at both ends, every night during divine service among others. In Prague where they filled a third part of the city, they were exposed to the greatest insults and confined to the most degrading employments. By the popes of the sixteenth century they were treated with great severity. Pius V. expelled them in 1569 from every part of the dominions, except Rome and Ancona. The Jews offered Charles V. 800,000 crowns of gold if he would suffer them to return to Spain; but their offer was rejected. In Spain and Portugal they lived only by dissimulation Outwardly they were good Catholics, while they secretly practiced the Mosiac rites, and if at any time they were discovered they were at once put to the tortures of the Inquisition. The sufferings of the Jews in that horrid tribunal for three centuries, were beyond all description. In Holland, a fine of 1,000 florins was laid on the Jew who found the least fault with the government. In the Ottoman empire they have ever been treated with the utmost contempt: they pay a tax for the privilege of worshipping in their own way. In their ancient city Jerusalem, they have for 1800 years received nothing but oppression, ignominy and reproach. Sometimes they have for ages been entirely excluded from it, and not suffered to look at it from the distant mountains; and when permitted to reside there, have exhibited the most affecting spectacle of human wretchedness.—Free Methodist.

A Startling Theory Concerning Hydrophobia.

Hydrophobia in the dog, I am satisfied, is the result of the animal having been inoculated by biting some person suffering from the disease of intoxication. Startling as this theory may appear, there is not the least question but that the facts will bear it out. First, hydrophobia and mania a potu are identical in most physical conditions—subjects dead of either disease presenting nearly the same autopsy. Second, the saliva of a man dying of delirium tremens, and that of a dog suffering from rabies, bear the same chemical analysis. Third, the entire system of the patient suffering from alcoholic madness is so poisoned that rapid inoculation will follow any contact with the virus of the blood. Fourth, the bite of a man in an alcoholic fit has been known to result in hydrophobia. As to the application of these facts:

First, with the canine race, hydrophobia is never spontaneous; with man the disease is known to be.

Second, there is not a case on record of a dog having died of hydrophobia that will not admit of proof—if the facts can be ascertained—that the dog had previously bitten an intoxicated person or had been attacked by some other animal suffering from a like inoculation.

"Things Present."

1 Cor. iii. 22.

"Things present are yours," though the day
may be dark,
Though billows be tossing around the frail
bark,
Like a glimpse of bright blue in the lowering sky
Is the thought that all comes from our Father on high.

"Things present are yours"—in the present rejoice,
And know that the future is also His choice.
To-day hath of good or of evil its share;
For the morrow our Heavenly Father will care.

"Things present are yours"—when the prospect is dreary,
Forecast not the future, your spirits to cheer;
But, leaving vain visions, seek present relief
From the Savior beside you in gladness and grief.

"Things present are yours"—whatever their form—
The joy and the sorrow, the calm and the storm—
Affliction, bereavement, perplexity, wrong;
Yea, "all things are yours," for to Christ ye belong.

Correspondence.

Dear Restitution:

I would be pleased to have some of your able writers give through your valuable paper an exposition of 1 Peter iii. 19. By which he also went and preached unto spirits in prison. I have some valuable friends among the officials in the Y. M. C. A., also a prominent Methodist divine who think that passage the only or most positive for consciousness after death. I do not so understand it to mean human consciousness, but I will wait to hear from others. I will say for your encouragement, spiritually, though perhaps not financially, that upon looking over the files of the Y. M. C. A. there is no papers read so much as the RESTITUTION and World's Crisis. I wish every association in the land could have your paper, Yours truly,

C. H. ADAMS.

BROTHER REED:—It is with pleasure that I take the opportunity to report the obedience of eight intelligent ladies to the faith during the last ten days. Bro. Wiley Jones, of Norfolk, has been laboring with us, proclaiming the Gospel of the kingdom. The brothers and sisters have been much refreshed, and have great cause to rejoice, and especially those whose children publicly invited us to aid them in putting on the precious name of Jesus in baptism. During our meetings, which were well attended, there was much interest manifested. We hear of others who are almost persuaded to become Christians. The harvest is plenteous, but the laborers are few. One of the ladies, which it was my pleasure to immerse, was, and has been, a member of the Methodist church (society) for many years, but hearing the Gospel of the kingdom and the name of Jesus Christ proclaimed, proved to be one of the few that have ears to hear. Hoping that others may soon have eyes to see and ears to hear, and taste that the Lord is good.

In the hope of the promise made to the fathers, I am yours.

R. P. KEETON.

Notes by the Way.

At the urgent request of Brother Hook, of New Palestine, Ind., I arranged for a series of meeting, to commence Sept. 8th, to hold over Sunday. Left home Thursday, stopping at Kokomo at Bro. McClellen's, where I enjoyed a pleasant time talking of the journey to that goodly land. How cheering to find, amid the hurry and and bustle of life a few who are anxious to know that they stand approved of God. The night was spent with that cheerful brother, W. L. Winslow, whose very presence is almost a complete antidote for the "blues." Taking a hurried leave of him and family, I was whirled away to the depot by the nimble-stepping team that I suppose are most always on time.

Took the early train for Indianapolis, from there on the J. H. & C. R. R. to New Palestine, when I met for the first (but Hope not for the last) time. Bro. Hook, in whose pleasant family I enjoyed a good time. The opposition to the truth is as strong there as at any place I have visited for years. How shall I account for it? Do you think if the handful of brethren there had been quiet about the teaching of the Bible, that it would have aroused the whole town? If in war times we should see a powerful defense prepared, should we not conclude that the enemy was no insignificant affair. To the little band of faithful ones then, let me say: "Hold the fort." "Don't give up the ship."

Our meetings were not large in numbers until the close, when we had a full house. But a deep interest in the word spoken seemed to silently say that the labor was not in vain. Was ably assisted during the meetings by Bro. Hatch, of Crawfordsville, and Bro. Grigg, of Indianapolis; the latter giving us an able discourse on the perpetuity of the Abrahamic Covenant. Bro. Grigg informs me that he has been holding forth the truth at the public park in the city. Success to him. He is a workman that need not be ashamed, and what is of more value, has the full confidence of those that know him. Dear brother or sister, if you have confidence in your teacher, tell him so, not to flatter, but to nerve his arm for the conflict.

On my return, in company with Bro. Hatch, I visited and formed the acquaintance of a few of the Abrahamic faith in Indianapolis. Our stay with them was quite limited, but impressions made by hearing their history, will go with me down the journey of life.

I am stronger to-day, that I can realize how fearful has been the struggle through which some noble souls have come; how they have renounced the allurements of position, of wealth, of the fashionable follies of the world, the maddening and exciting scenes of political strife. Yes, thank God, they severed their connection with all these things, and that, too, in order that they might serve God acceptably.

Well may we not hope that when the final addition is made to the list of God's roll of honor (Heb. xi.) that a few humble names of our own time may grace the list. A martyr for God need not burn at the stake of the executioner. It will be equally acceptable to God if they are willing to burn at the stake of public opinion, to come out and be separate, a people devoted to God and not to the world. To all whose society I am indebted for the pleasure of that visit, show the same kindness to one another and to all the faithful, and may the God of peace bless and finally save you in his everlasting kingdom, is the prayer of your brother, J. F. WAGONER.

Death of Speaker Kerr.

A few days before his death Mr. Kerr had a conversation with his son, in the course of which he said: "I have nothing to leave you, my son, except my good name. Guard it and your mother's honor, and live as I have lived." He leaves very little of this world's goods—not enough to supply his family with a living. In the same conversation he further said: "Pay all my debts, if my estate will warrant it without leaving your mother penniless; otherwise pay what you can, and then go to my creditors and tell them the truth, and pledge your honor to wipe out the indebtedness."

In religious matters Mr. Kerr was a liberal thinker. He might be said to have been a Rationalist, accepting nothing which did not bear the impress of probability. Without admitting the divinity of Jesus Christ, he was an advocate of his code of morals. To be honest and true and just was in his belief to be a good Christain. Early this afternoon he was visited by the Rev. Mr. Harris, president of the female seminary at Staunton, who, with a view to sounding him as to his religious views, asked: "I hope you are prepared for a better life hereafter, Mr. Kerr?"

The reply was a prompt inclination of the head in the affirmative.

Again the minister asked: "I trust you have a firm faith in the merits of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ?"

After a moment's hesitation, in which he seemed to be carefully weighing the question, Mr. Kerr shook his head slowly. It was a fine distinction to make, and one worthy of the fine analytical mind which maintained the supremacy to the last.

Finding that Speaker Kerr could not carry on a conversation, Mr. Harris promised to pray for him, to which Mr. Kerr whispered, "I thank you."

To Mr. Cox's inquiry, whether he was content to die, he nodded a tranquil assent.

Thus passed away one of the best and purest of men, and one of the ablest and truest of American statesmen—a man whose integrity was religion, and whose heritage to his descendants is his untarnished honor.

We clip the above from one of our exchanges, for the purpose of calling attention to the anti-christian hope entertained by the subject of the extract in the prospect of death and the cause of it. Doubtless Mr. Kerr was an honest, virtuous man, as the world goes,—was a faithful husband and father; a good citizen, a generous and benevolent man and all that; but on his death bed he denies that he has any faith in Jesus Christ. He dies tranquilly, full of hope, well prepared, in his own estimation, for "a better life hereafter."

Christians are wont to say that none but Christians can pass away thus; yet Deists point triumphantly to such cases as this (and they are increasingly numerous) in complete refutation of the claim. Now what will the advocates of the proofs of death-bed scenes for Christianity do? Was Mr. Kerr deceived? If so, what evidence does the condition of a man's mind on his death-bed afford of the truth of his doctrines, or the stability of his hope? Again, what has become of this good man who can die tranquilly, contentedly, and hopefully, while denying Christ? Did he wake up in hell? We venture that the clergyman who preached the funeral sermon didn't tell his friends so.

But what has caused this moral phenomenon? Why is it that so many who reject the claims of Christ can face death so triumphantly and hopefully, notwithstanding? What, to be sure, only that they think they have a certainty of a "better life hereafter." They are immortal, to be sure, and as to "merits," they have enough of their own, and have no need to "trust in the merits of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." And why need they, to be sure; "God is love," and the are virtuous; what great risk have they to run, seeing that his love has already granted to all the supreme attribute of his own nature, immortality. As to the horrible phantom of eternal tortures none but those who sleep still in the noonday of this nineteenth century are tormented with that nightmare. If they deserve any punishment at all, why; does not even the orthodox teach that it is to be "according to their deeds;" their deeds have been good, why need they fear.

But if they are not immortal? Ah! there is the rub. Deny that and their hope is gone. Would the Deist so tranquilly repudiate Christ if he expected to close his eyes in endless night? No, no; he was "prepared for a better life hereafter." How so? Through faith in Christ? Not at all; but by virtue of possessing an immortal soul. There you have the rock on which he split. Yes, and ten thousand others are going down on the same rock, or we would not make this case a prominent one by calling attention to it.

Immortality of the soul is accounted a fundamental doctrine of Christianity; yet thousands reject Christ because they believe it. The Thessalonians believed it, too; yet Paul tells those among them who believed in Jesus that those of their fellows that did not had no hope. Why? Because their hope was a false one.

So we now say to all who are trusting in this pagan superstition. You "have no hope and are without God in the world." You have no alternative. You must accept of the better life hereafter, through Christ the Life-giver, or no such life awaits you.

Thanks be to God that the power of this superstition is being shattered, and men are beginning to see Christ in his true light, and to believe him when he said: "I am come that ye might have life."

The Bible.

How comes it that this little volume, composed by humble men in a rude age, when art and science were but in their girlhood, has exerted more influence on the human mind and on the social system, than all other books put together. Whence comes it that this book has achieved marvelous changes in the opinions of mankind—has banished idol worship—exalted the condition of women—raised the standard of public morality—created for families that blessed thing, a Christian home—and caused its other triumph by causing benevolent institutions, open and expansive, to spring up as with the wand of enchantment? What sort of a book is this, that even the wind and the waves of human passion obey it? What other engine of social improvement has operated so long and lost none of its virtue? Since it appeared, many boasted plans of amelioration have been tried, and failed—many codes of jurisprudence have arisen and run their course and expired. Empire after empire has been launched on the tide of time, and gone down and expired. But this book is still going about doing good—leavening society with its holy principles—cheering the sorrowful with consolation—strengthening the tempted—encouraging the penitent, calming the troubled spirit, and smoothing the pillow of death. Can such a book be the offspring of human genius? Does not the vastness of its effects demonstrate the excellency of the power to be of God?—Dr McCulloch.

"Go out in the spring-time, among the meadows that slope from the shores of the Swiss lakes to the roots of the lower mountains. There, mingled with the gentians and the white narcissus, the grass grows deep and free; and as you follow the winding mountain paths, beneath arching boughs all veiled and dim with blossoms, paths that forever droop and rise over the green banks and wolds sweeping down in scented undulation, steep to the blue water, studded here and there with new-mown heaps, filling all the air with fainter sweetness—look up toward the higher hills, where the waves of everlasting green roll silently into their long inlets among the shadows of the pines, and we may, perhaps at last know the meaning of those quiet words of the 147th Psalm, 'He maketh grass to grow upon the mountains.'"—John Ruskin.

BUSINESS DEPARTMENT.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The congregation near Severance, (Doniphan Co., Kansas) will hold a meeting over the third and fourth Sundays in October, 1876. Preaching brethren are invited. We look for Cleaver, Kilmer, Adams and Picasso. Come, others, if you can, both brothers and friends to the cause. Part of the meeting will be at Severance, and part at Syracuse school house, two miles south of Severance. The meeting commence at Saturday night before the third Sunday in October, 1876.

S. P. BUTNER.

There will be a conference meeting of the brethren of the Church of God at the Freed school house, commencing on the Friday before the second Sunday in October, ten miles southwest of Girard, Crawford Co., Kansas.

We hope that Brethren Kilmer, Hayden, Butts, Stilinger, Hicklin, Moore and Pickett, of the preaching brethren will be with us, and all others who can come. Any one coming on the cars should write to me, and I will meet them at Girard. Come, brethren, and in the communion with the people of this country and the surrounding the communion exhibition. Let us meet in the name of the coming King who will sanctify all the communal that ever were or will be. Come one, come all. Let nothing but unknown keep you from coming. We will do all in our power to make you comfortable while you are here.

K. TAGG.

Girard, Crawford Co., Kansas.

C. M. Myers will visit for the purpose of holding meetings—

At the Wisconsin conference, Sept. 29 to Oct. 2.

Notice is here given to the brethren of the Abrahamic faith in South-eastern Missouri, and South-western Kansas to meet in conference with the Church of God worshiping on Indian Hill, Coffey county, Kansas, near Silver Station. M. R. & T. R. R., commencing Friday, Oct. 27, 1876, at 7 o'clock P. M.

The object of this conference is the propagation of the Gospel of Christ, the establishment of Gospel order among believers in Christ, to take action upon the Constitution of the Christian Association of America," the duty of supporting our papers—the RESTITUTION and Standard, and all necessary business that may be presented for action. The church worshipping on Indian Hill will be glad to meet all Abrahamic brethren of church order, all that are not tired of preaching the things concerning the Kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ and hearing them preached, that is satisfied with the Gospel of this dispensation.

I wish to say, in justice to those who chose me to call this meeting, that there are but few of the faith living near the place of meeting, and those few though rich in faith are poor in this world's goods. Let us go up, then, to this meeting, as the Jews did to their feast of tabernacles.

By order of the church.

J. W. LOVEJOY.

FORT SCOTT, KAN., Sept. 8.

Seeing by the recent letter of Brother Wilson, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, that the church of Christ in that city find it impossible under the circumstances they are placed, to entertain the annual conference in their city, the church at Baltimore has resolved to invite all those of like precious faith who have been baptized, believing in the Gospel of the Kingdom of God, to meet in their city (Baltimore,) to break bread with us and drink wine in celebration of the death and resurrection of our Lord on the first Sunday of October. Meetings of the brethren will commence on the Saturday afternoon previous, September 30.

We especially hope that the brethren on the Atlantic coast will make an EXTRA EFFORT to attend these meetings. The date mentioned has been so fixed as to suit those of our brethren and sisters from the Western states who purpose visiting the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia may have an opportunity to arrange their visit so as to pass through to Baltimore to attend these meetings. We trust that all that can come will come, and we will spare no pains to make their stay pleasant and profitable.

It is very important that all brethren coming to these meetings should communicate their intention at least three days prior to September 30, that the proper arrangements may be made for their reception; also what train they will arrive on, that we may meet them at the depot. Please address all communications to T. C. Weeks, Engraver, 212 W. Baltimore Street, Baltimore where also any stranger brother may come if not met at the depot.

J. F. GRIGG,
Secretary of the Conference.

All brethren and sisters who purpose to attend the Baltimore conference are especially requested to arrange their visit so as to arrive in the city not later than Saturday afternoon, September 30, as supper will be spread in the hall at 6 o'clock, and the first meeting will be held at 7 o'clock punctually. And we are anxious that all who are coming should be on hand at the appointed.

Also, for the greater comfort of the visitors, and those who have the care of the arrangements, the brethren and sisters are requested to inform the undersigned, by letter, at least three days before the meeting, (and if possible earlier,) what line of railroad and what train they intend to come on.

Married brethren will please state if their wives will accompany them.

As we have reason to expect a large gathering, strict attention to these preliminaries will be safe to us to provide suitable lodging, and will add greatly to the general comfort.

We again call attention to the fact that the committee of reception will be distinguished by a strip of white ribbon attached to the lappel of the coat. But if from any cause brethren should fail to recognize them, please enquire for me, during the day at 218 West Baltimore street, or during the night at 148 East Monument street. If brethren arrive on Saturday evening, they will please find the hall at the North-west corner of Pearl and Lexington streets.

N. B.—All are requested to bring their hymn books. THOS. C. WEEKS.

The annual conference of Northern Illinois and Southern Wisconsin, will convene September 29, 1876, at 2:30 o'clock p. m., at the Fairfield school house, Green county, Wisconsin, and continue over Sunday.

Those coming by rail on the Western Union, should write to Aaron McCauley, Rock Grove, Stephenson county, Ill., and should get off at Dacota.

Those coming to Judah should write to Cary Noble, Twin Grove, Green county, Wis.

Brother Myers will be expected at this meeting.

J. S. ARNOLD, Pres.

Centennial Number of the Restitution.

It has been deemed best to issue a Centennial number of the RESTITUTION, wherein it is to be set forth our faith and hope upon the great questions of Bible truth. Those who have heretofore contributed to the Tract Fund, will find the amount credited under this head. It is to be hoped that every brother will give something toward this laudable effort to let the light of the glorious Gospel shine into the hearts of those. His people have as much truth and do so little. Why is it? Let every one do his duty. God will bless you.

Put Your Name on this List.

Recently quite a number of brethren have concluded that an easy and effectual way to get the truth before the minds of the people is to send them the RESTITUTION for three months. This is a good decision. It is almost impossible for the paper to be received and read by any household for three months without its making an impression upon their minds for good. So send on your names and money. We hope to have a goodly number report. The following is a list of those we already have above referred to:

Valuable English Works.

Our readers are informed that we expect shortly to have for sale the works mentioned below. Orders and remittances for the same may be sent at once to this office.

Discussion on the State of the Dead. Between the Rev. W. C. Bradman, Congregational minister, and W. Kelloway, editor of Bible Echo, and minister of the Gospel. Both of England. The propositions discussed were: 1. That the dead exist in a lifeless, conscious state after their decease. Affirmed by W. C. B. 2. That the Scriptures teach that man in death are wholly unconscious, inactive, and unable to perform any act whatever; and that they rest in darkness, silence and the dust. Cloth, bevelled boards, well bound, 55c; postage 10c. Paper cover, 35c; postage 5c.

Duration and Nature of Future Punishment. By Rev. H. Constable, M. A. late Prelendary of Cork, Ireland, 320 pp. An elaborate argument touching the punishment of the unsaved. It is particularly fine in its philological chapters respecting the meaning of the Greek words used by the inspired writers to indicate the doom of the lost. Price $1; postage 10c.

"We hail this book with lively satisfaction. Undoubtedly the subject which it treats with such an attractive combination of learning and modesty, of power and reverence, has laid hold of the minds of many of the most thoughtful Christian men of our day. Its germ is from a pamphlet in The Rock edition to a handsome volume of three hundred and thirty pages in the fourth, is conclusive proof that the question discussed is one of profound importance.....We must also compliment the publishers on the tasteful and handsome dress in which they present the book to the public, and express the hope that the necessary outlay will speedily be more than recovered by the large sale of a work which must take a standard place in this painfully misapprehended department of Christian theology."—The Rainbow.

Hades; or, The Intermediate State of Man. Crown 8vo, 32 edition. Price $1.50, postage 10c.

This work presents the Bible doctrine of the state of man between death and the resurrection.

"Mr. Constable has, in a series of works, devoted much labor and research to establishing from Scripture and other sources the real nature of the future state; and the present book is the result of his more exhaustive labors on one special point. His argument is supported by no little learning, a keen logic, and a clear and available style. There is a good deal to be said for the general doctrines propounded."—Nonconformist.

"It is characterized by his usual vigor of thought and clearness of expression. To all sincere lovers of truth, rather than of tradition, we cordially commend the treatise."—The Church Messenger.

Bible Echo. Volume I, May to December, edited by W. Kelloway. The only English weekly that advocates the ancient Gospel. Bound volume of numbers of the Bible Echo, containing important papers and discussions on vital matters, and the news concerning the spread of the scriptural doctrine of immortality. Price $2.75.

Bible Echo. Vol. II, January to June, 1875. This is a continuation of the above for the period stated. Price $2.

Bible Echo. Vol. III, July to September, 1875. This completes the Bible Echo as a weekly newspaper, and also finishes the old series. Price $1.50.

Bible Echo. New Series. Monthly numbers from October, 1875. The yearly subscription for the 12 numbers, including the 3 months of last year, is $2 00.

New Facts Upon all Subjects. By the author of "Enquire Within Upon Everything." Useful to the shop-keeper, the artist, the chemist, the engineer, the mechanic, the agriculturist, the gardener, and the housekeeper. 252 pp. Price 50c; postage 10c.

A New Work by Mrs. H. V. Reed.

Sermons Words for Home Scripture. Nearly 300 pp. Well printed on heavy toned paper, neatly bound in cloth. Price 50c; postage 10c.

"This book is one of the most satisfactory of its kind that could be written; indeed we know of none other; in every way so pleasing to those who see the necessity of maintaining the Bible as a revelation from God. We would be more than content, we would be proud, if the author's name were our own instead of that of the estimable and talented lady, the authoress. Her "Bible Triumphant" was a good work, and it is, we know, warmly appreciated by many; but this work, so original, so forcible, so convincing, it would be hard to guess where its success will end. Everybody should possess a copy."—Ill. Bible Echo.

Bible Primer Book. A new reprint is expected. Price, paper covers, 25c; cloth 35c.

A Caution.

BY MRS. S. R. MORGAN.

Take care; crush not one germ of good
In rooting evil out;
Be sure the heart is understood
You are employed about.
The flower beside the weed oft grows,
And none at first the difference knows.

Take care; be cautious where you tread,
Along another's road;
It may with precious seeds be spread
Fresh from the hand of God,
Waiting the sunshine and the dew,
Which might be administered by you.

Oh! who hath felt no sudden smart
At some remembrance odious,
When, thoughtless of a yearning heart,
He lost the sacred power
Which then and only then was given
To win it to the truth and Heaven!

We each and all an influence
To work some good possess;
We daily may some joy dispense,
Some human grief bless.
If we can give but love and prayers,
'Tis better far than gathering tares.

The Rich Man, and Lazarus.

Bro. Read:—

Very many "expositions" of this much mooted and much quoted parable have been put forth by able brethren, that in the main are quite satisfactory, but all of them, it seems to me, fall into a very grave error in making Lazarus personate the Gentiles. Desiring to correct this mistaken view I herewith send you one chapter on that point—out of a work explanatory of the entire parable which I purpose giving to the public, sometime, entire. Please give this in the RESTITUTION. We find ourselves in a dilemma if we say Lazarus represents the Gentiles, for whether heaven, or the covenant of promise, be understood by "Abraham's bosom," we run against an insurmountable and impalpable obstacle and carrier: for it was in his "life-time," that he had "evil things," and if this "life-time," is predicted of a Gentile believer, or Christian, antecedent to his death to sin, it is not true, for then he was "dead," and had "no life," until he partook of Christ, and if subsequent to his being "dead to the world, and alive in Christ," it is also false, for then he had "peace and joy in the Holy Ghost," and only began to live, when he began to joy in God, at which time he began also to be a partaker, through faith, of "the good things to come."

On the other hand if we predicate this "life-time," of all Gentile unbelievers, antecedent to "the middle wall of partition," being broken down and taken away, then we are equally at fault, for "all that time they were without Christ,—aliens from the commonwealth of Israel,—strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world;—dead in trespasses and sins," consequently so far from "dying," when they, were "made nigh," or brought into the Abrahamic covenant, it was just then that they "were quickened," and made "fellowheirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ by the Gospel."

The first cuts up by the roots the common view, by interpretation and assumption, that this was a "soul transported in, by, or through, natural death, to heaven, independent of a resurrection, and anterior to a judgment. The second is equally fatal as to applying Lazarus to the Gentiles, as indicating their being brought into either covenant relation to God, or to Gospel privileges, for that would be living and not dying.

The only reasonable view left us then, is that the Lazarus of this parable represents Jesus of Nazareth himself as the exponent of the Gospel and head of the kingdom, he, at whom the proud and selfcomplacent Pharisee sneeringly turned up his nose. Such personal self representation, of Jesus, in his own parables is not without good precedent, as witness "the sower of good seed," Matt. xiii, 3, and xiii. 24, where he says, in ver. 37, the sower, is "the son of man," i. e. himself, and in that of the "wicked husbandman" in xi. 33, where the householder's "son" is introduced in vers. 37, 38; and "the stone" rejected by the builders, in vers. 42, 44; plainly refer to himself.

But the inquiry will naturally arise can he, "whom God hath appointed heir of all things," and "on account of whom also he constituted the ages," be likened to a mendicant? Ah, that is the wonder of wonders, and we must let the Scriptures answer that.

1. He came unto his own, and his own received him not. John. i, 11.

2 For he shall grow up before him as a tender plant, and as a root out of a dry ground; he hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see him, there is no beauty that we should desire him.

3. He is despised and rejected of man; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief; and we hid as it were our faces from him; he was despised, and we esteemed him not. Isa. liii. 2, 3.

4. But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Phil. ii. 7, 8.

5. A certain scribe came, and said unto him, Master, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest.

6. And Jesus saith unto him, The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the son of man hath not where to lay his head. Matt. viii. 19, 20.

7. For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich. 2 Cor. viii. 9.

Second, his position: "laid at his gate," i. e. placed in his power, subject to his disposal. Dr. Robinson in his Calmet, says pp. 447, 448, that "gate" in Scripture is often used to denote a place of public assembly where justice was administered, (Deut. xvii. 5-8; xxi. 19; xxii. 15; xxv. 6, 7,) "Gate" sometimes also signifies power, dominion; almost in the same sense as the Turkish Sultan's palace is called the Porte. God promises Abraham, that his posterity shall possess the gates of their enemies,—their towns, their fortresses, (Gen. xxii. 17,) and Christ says to Peter, "on this rock will I build my church, and the gates of hell (hades) shall not prevail against it."—i. e. The power of hell. The gates of the temple were those where the righteous, the true Israelites, pay their vows and praises to God, where none enter but purified Israelites" Undoubtedly both of these significations are embraced in the expression as used in the parable, for both are true as applied to Christ and the Jews.—

And while they abode in Galilee, Jesus said unto them,

Behold, we go up to Jerusalem; and the Son of man shall be betrayed unto the chief priests and unto the scribes, and they shall condemn them to death.

And shall deliver him to the Gentiles, to mock, and to scourge, and to crucify him:

Go ye up unto this feast: I go not up yet unto this feast; for my time is not yet full come.

Then the Jews sought him at the feast, and said, Where is he?

And there was much murmuring among the people concerning him: for some said, He is a good man: others said, Nay, but he deceiveth the people.

Howbeit, no man spake openly of him, for fear of the Jews.

Now about the midst of the feast, Jesus went up into the temple and taught.

Then assembled together the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders of the people, unto the palace of the high priest, who was called Caiaphas.

And consulted that they might take Jesus by subtilty, and kill him.

Then Jesus said unto the chief priests, and captains of the temple, and the elders, which were come to him, Be ye come out, as against a thief, with swords and staves?

When I was daily with you in the temple, ye stretched forth no hands against me: but this is your hour, and the power of darkness.

Then the band and the captain and officers of the Jews took Jesus, and bound him,

And led him away to Annas first; for he was father-in-law to Caiaphas, which was the high priest that same year.

Now Caiaphas was he which gave counsel to the Jews, that it was expedient that one man should die for the people.

Then saith Pilate unto him, Speakest thou not unto me? Knowest thou not that I have power to crucify thee, and have power to release thee?

Jesus answered, Thou couldst have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above: therefore he that delivered me unto thee hath the greater sin.

The kings of the earth stood up, and the rulers were gathered together, against the Lord, and against his Christ.

For of a truth, against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate with the Gentiles and the people of Israel were gathered together,

For to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done.

Third, His condition—full of sores. This word is used in Scripture in nearly the same sense as sorrow and affliction. 2 Chron. vi. 28, 29, and Rev. xvi, 2: If there be dearth in the land, if there be pestilence, if there be blasting or mildew, locusts or caterpillars; if their enemies besiege them in the cities of their land; whatsoever sore, or whatsoever sickness there be; then what prayer or what supplication soever shall be made of any man, of all thy people Israel, when every one shall know his own sore and his own grief. And there fell a noisome and grievous sore upon the men which had the mark of the beast, and upon them which worshipped his image.

So Christ, by imputation, in taking on our nature, the seed of Abraham, also took on our sores, griefs, sicknesses and sorrows, those with which the sin-body is afflicted.

Speaking of Judah and Jerusalem, (all Israel), as a nation, the Prophet says, Why should ye be stricken any more? ye will revolt more and more. The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint. From the sole of the foot even unto the head, there is no soundness in it; but wounds and bruises and putrefying sores; they have not been closed, neither bound up, neither mollified with ointment. Isa. i. And then in Isa. liii., when speaking of Christ, and calling things that be not yet as though they were already past, he says: Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows; yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted; but he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and with his stripes we are healed. All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way, and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all. He was oppressed, and he was afflicted; yet he opened not his mouth; he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth. He was taken from prison and from judgment; and who shall declare his generation? for he was cut off out of the land of the living: for the transgression of my people was he stricken. Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him; he hath put him to grief.

The New Testament says, Matt. viii. 16: When the even was come, they brought unto him many that were possessed with devils; and he cast out the spirits with his word, and healed all that were sick; that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying, Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses. Now is my soul troubled; and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour: but for this cause came I unto this hour.

For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin. Who his own self bare our sins in his own body, on the tree, that we, being dead to sins, should live unto righteousness; by whose stripes ye were healed. For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin: that we might be made the righteousness of God in him.

4. His desire to be fed with the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table. The first thing necessary here, is to learn what is meant by the word "table," for if not used in the ordinary, everyday sense of the word, then the accompaniments will also have a correspondingly different signification. Cruden says, "table," signifies 2d, the altar of God, as in Mal. i. 7-12: "Ye offer polluted bread upon mine altar; and ye say, Wherein have we polluted thee? In that ye say, The table of the Lord is contemptible. But ye have profaned it, in that ye say, The table of the Lord is polluted; and the fruit thereof, even his meat, is contemptible.

3. Provision, for food, either for body or soul, as in Psa. lxix. 22, also the two tablets of stone on which the law was written. Exodus xxxii. 16. Mental enjoyment. Luke xxii. 30. "Let their table become a snare before them: and that which should have been for their welfare, let it become a trap. And the tables were the work of God, and the writing was the writing of God, graven upon the tables. That ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. To feed, or to be fed, denotes to give or receive spiritual truths, as the Word of God, for food to the mind, upon which we are said sometimes to feast. Of Christ it is said, "He shall feed his flock." Isa. xl. 11. To Peter, "Feed my lambs." Jno. xxi. 16. To eat,—to feed on God's word, as in Isa. lv. 3,—"To do the will of God with delight." This was Jesus' desire, to feed on crumbs of truth, from the table of God's law, for "the commandment was ordained to (give) life," Rom. vii. 10, and "the man who did those things contained in the law, was to live by them." Rom. x. 5 and Jno. vi. 53; x. 17. "For I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. Therefore doth my father love me, because I lay down my life, that I might take it again. No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have the power to take it again. This commandment have I received of my Father. And when he had fasted forty days and forty nights, he was afterwards a hungered. And when the tempter came to him, he said, If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread. But he answered and said, It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. In the meanwhile his disciples prayed him, saying, Master, eat. But he said unto them, I have meat to eat that ye know not of. Therefore said the disciples one to another, Hath any man brought him aught to eat? Jesus saith unto them, My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to finish his work. And he said unto them, With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer: For I say unto you, I will not any more eat thereof until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God." Matt. iv. 2-4; Jno. iv. 31-34; Luke xxii. 15-16.

5. His consolation. "The dogs came and licked his sores." The dog was declared unclean by the law, (Lev. xi. 27) and was a displicable object to a Jew. Nothing could be more offensive than to compare a man to a dead dog. Dogs are enumerated among the characters excluded from the new Jerusalem, (Rev. xxii. 15) and are put for those who are impudent, and greedy of sordid gain, in Phil. iii. 2; for unholy men, in Matt. vii. 6, and for the Gentiles in chap. xv. 27, especially such as were cruel and bloodthirsty. Psa. xxii. 16. There is nothing in the world more soothing, quieting, cooling and healing, to an inflamed, angry, burning, and painfully aggravating wound, than to have it licked by a dog. Hence, there is a wonderful force in this little sentence, when we consider how Jesus was not received, how he was rejected, abused, scoffed, and derided by his own, and how those to whom he was not sent did receive him, and were glad, and believed on him. Unquestionably this does refer to the bringing in of the Gentiles, and the joy in heaven resulting from their conversion. Look first then on this side,—Sorrow:

Reproach hath broken my heart, and I am full of heaviness; and I looked for some to take pity, but there was none; and for comforters, but I found none. They gave me also gall for my meat; and in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink. For I am poor and needy, and my heart is wounded within me. They compassed me about also with words of hatred; and fought against me without a cause. For my love they are my adversaries: but I give myself unto prayer. And they have rewarded me evil for good, and hatred for my love. Yea, mine own familiar friend, in whom I trusted, which did eat of my bread, hath lifted up his heel against me. For it was not an enemy that reproached me; then could I have borne it; neither was it he that hated me that did magnify himself against me; then I would have hid myself from him. But it was thou, a man mine equal, my guide, and mine acquaintance. We took sweet counsel together, and walked unto the house of God in company. The spirit of a man will sustain his infirmity; but a wounded spirit who can bear? My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death." Mark xiii. 34; Psa. lxix. 20-21; xxxiv. 3-5; xli. 9-13.

And now on that,—joy and gladness:

"And, behold, a woman of Canaan came out of the same coasts, and cried unto him, saying, Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou son of David: my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil. But he answered her not a word. And his disciples came, and besought him, saying, Send her away; for she crieth after us. But he answered and said, I am not sent, but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel. Matt. xv. 22-24. Then came she and worshipped him, saying, Lord, help me! The woman was a Greek, a Syrophenician by nation; and she besought him that he would cast forth the devil out of her daughter. But Jesus said unto her, Let the children first be filled: for it is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it unto the dogs. And she answered and said unto him, Yes, Lord: yet the dogs under the table eat of the children's crumbs. And he said unto her, For this saying, go thy way; the devil is gone out of thy daughter. Mark vi. 26. I am sought of them that asked not for me; I am found of them that sought me not: I said, Behold me, behold me, unto a nation that was not called by my name. Isa. lxiii. 1.

Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will lift up mine hand to the Gentiles, and set up my standard to the people: and they shall bring thy sons in their arms, and thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders. And kings shall be thy nursing fathers, and their queens thy nursing mothers: they shall bow down to thee with their face toward the earth, and lick up the dust of thy feet; and thou shalt know that I am the Lord: for they shall not be ashamed that wait for me. Isa. xlix. And the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising. Isa. lx. Lift up thine eyes round about, and see: all they gather themselves together, they come to thee: thy sons shall come from far, and thy daughters shall be nursed at thy side. Then thou shalt see, and flow together, and thine heart shall fear, and be enlarged; because the abundance of the sea shall be converted unto thee, the forces of the Gentiles shall come unto thee. Isa. lx. O Lord, my strength, and my fortress, and my refuge in the day of affliction, the Gentiles shall come unto thee from the ends of the earth, and shall say, Surely our fathers have inherited lies, vanity, and things wherein there is no profit. Jer. xvi. And I will sow her unto me in the earth; and I will have mercy upon her that had not obtained mercy; and I will say to them which were not my people, Thou art my people; and they shall say, Thou art my God. For from the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same, my name shall be great among the Gentiles; and in every place incense shall be offered unto my name, and a pure offering: for my name shall be great among the heathen, saith the Lord of hosts. Mal. i. When thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin, he shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days, * * * he shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied: * * * * who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God."

Turkey.

The condition of affairs in Turkey is such as to give just cause for the gravest apprehension. The recent murder of the foreign consuls at Salonica is indicative of a state of feeling that may vent itself in horrible massacres at any moment. Turkish history abounds with instances of sanguinary religious fury, some of the most horrible massacres occurring in comparatively recent times. The most dreadful massacre recorded in modern history took place at Scio during the uprising of the Christian population of Greece against Turkish oppression. The slaughter lasted ten days, forty thousand of both sexes falling victims to the sword or to the fire that raged until every house save those of the foreign consuls was burned to the ground. Seven thousand Greeks who had fled to the mountains, and who had been induced to surrender on a promise of amnesty, guaranteed by the consuls of England, France and Austria, were butchered in cold blood. Some thirty thousand of the younger and more beautiful women and boys were all that escaped massacre, these being reserved for the slave mart and the harem.

On October 16, 1850, the Mohammedan population attacked the Christians—killing many thousands of—them, and burning three churches, and plundering five others, and destroying property to the amount of $5,000,000.

In 1840 the Mohammedan population of Syria made a general onslaught on the Christians, massacring many thousands before order was restored. The state of feeling among the Mohammedan population in European Turkey is now such that outbursts of religious fury no less sanguinary may occur, notwithstanding the pacific attitude and professions of good intentions on the part of the Turkish government. In Turkey they have God in the constitution, and their sacred book—the Koran—is the supreme law of the land. According to the Koran, the devout Mohammedan is only bound to obey his sovereign when he keeps within the restrictions of the Koran. Turkish patriotism is, by the peculiar constitution of their government, identified with religious zeal, and with the Christian populations in the North in revolt, and the imperial government bankrupt and impotent, the exasperation of the Turks may impel them as good Mohammedans to fall upon the Christian enemy wherever he may be found, notwithstanding the commands of the Turkish ministry.

Turkish government in Europe has been, as the historian Freeman forcibly declares, "the encampment of a barbarian horde." A government that does not give decent security to the rights of property or to female honor, is not entitled to the name. The vicissitudes of Turkish power form one of the strangest chapters in history. The barbarian invasion which wrested from Christianity the theater of its origin and early propagation, which destroyed the Eastern empire, depopulating the fairest and most populous land of the earth, and which was made the common object of attack by Christian Europe, would long since have been rolled back into Asia had it not been for the aid of Christian Europe. The story of the alliance of England with the Turks to maintain the rule of barbarians over a Christian population almost four-fold their number, will form a most interesting portion of the history of some future Gibbon.

Sacrifices.

Will the blood of bulls and of goats, ever again be an an acceptable sacrifice to God?

I am aware, that there are many good and honest brethren, who believe that in the age to come, many ancient rites and ceremonies will be reinstated; and, among them, will be that of offering sacrifices, to God. Now, to my mind, there are some very grave objections to such a position. I understand that the offering of the sacrificial lamb, and all the sacrifices that went before, were types of the great sacrifice the Lord Jesus Christ: that in these sacrifices, there was no virtue at all only as they typified the great antitypical sacrifice of Christ. And I find that the Apostle Paul so understood it; for he says in Heb. x. 1; "for the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they offered year by year continually, make the comers thereunto perfect." Here we see that these yearly sacrifices were only the shadow of the good things to come; and now the good things having come, will the time ever arrive, in this age, or ages to come, when we will have to lay down the substance, and again take up the shadow? which Paul says could never make the comers there unto perfect. But, again, we find Paul, in this same chapter, represents Christ as saying to the fathers, "In burnt offerings, and sacrifices for sin, thou hast had no pleasure then said he, Lo, I come to do thy will God, he taketh away the first that he may establish the second." verses 6-9. Then the will of God, which Christ prepared to do, was evidently to offer a sacrifice, in which he, (God) would have pleasure; for he says that he had had no pleasure in burnt offerings, and sacrifice, and further that he took away the first, (shadow that he might establish the second, or substance, in good things to come. But it is evident that the Apostle understood that the efficacy of the blood of Christ covered all time, for he says, "Neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood he entered at once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us." Now if eternal redemption was obtained by the blood of Christ, what need of any further offering, what could be the object of again going back to the old sacrifical routine, in which Christ himself says the Father had no pleasure! And Paul, as if to settle this question beyond dispute, says, that "this man (Christ) offered one sacrifice for sins forever. And again, "For by one offering he hath perfected forever them that are sanctified. Then, in conclusion, we would say that the sum up of the Apostle's argument is, that the blood of Christ has been shed, that through that blood eternal redemption has been obtained, that the sacrifice is forever, or, as the Diaglot has it, "an enduring sacrifice" that it spans all time and reaches to eternity. Or as Paul has said, that "by one offering he has perfected forever them that are sanctified. Therefore we conclude that the blood of Christ cleanses from sin, now, henceforth and forever, that the only way that we can approach the Father is through the merits of blood. Abraham will come up through the atonement made by his seed, Christ, Sarah, Isaac, and Jacob, will burst the bonds of Machpelah's cave and stand forth immortal, clad with the last robe that is taken out of the family of the first Adam, through the merits of that "enduring sacrifice."

BRO. GARDINER.

Military Progress in France.

Nothing can be more certain than that the Republican leaders in France sincerely desire peace. It is only the Imperialists and Ultramontane pretensions in identical with that in which Bismark is engaged, and this fact explains the good understanding (otherwise so inaccountable) which has for some time existed between the German Government and the French Republican leaders. Nevertheless, the process of pushing forward the work of thoroughly reorganizing the army has been going on with great energy for the last three years, and marvels have already been accomplished. It is now in a far more efficient condition than it has been at any time during the last twenty years. A German officer who has visited all the principal military stations has recently furnished an article to the Cologne Gazette, in which he fully indorses this statement. He describes the physique of the men as excellent, and the field artillery as superior to that of Germany, Russia or Austria. One of the most significant facts which he notes is that the priests take a special interest in these military preparations; and he goes so far as to assert that they "do more to induce the people to perform their military duties than can be done by all the magistrates and gendarmes in Prussia." The clericals, regarding France as the only truly "Catholic power" of any importance in Europe, and seeing in her the future champion of the Church against the "atheistic" government, are naturally anxious to make her formidable as a military power. But we are inclined to think that the Republicans will find it their wisest policy not to engage in the attempt to create the strongest army in Europe. Such an attempt, besides the burdens it must impose upon the industrial and agricultural interests of the country, cannot fail to arouse jealousies among her neighbors, and might in certain contingencies lead to combinations against her. We believe that this is the view held by the best statesmen of the country. All the moderate Republicans are in favor of devoting their efforts to promoting the development of the prosperity of the nation and to the maintenance of peaceful relations with neighboring countries, leaving the Church to fight her battle for power with her own own weapons of ghostly influence and political intrigue. Nothing could be more ruinous to the interests of France, or more out of keeping with the spirit of the age, than to lend herself to an Ultramontane crusade for the purpose of elevating the ecclesiastical above the civil power. Besides, all men whose eyes are not blinded by clericalism see clearly that the time has passed when the success of such a crusade was a possibility.—San Francisco Chronicle.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Holy Prophets since the world began." It also advocates as a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the Immortal saints as joint-heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. It also advocates a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

The Errors of the Age.

But, say the men of another class, though God may have spoken intelligibly and articulately, he has not spoken authoritatively. He has given us the Bible as a book of thought,—a sort of hand book or guide book, but not a statute book, not a promulgation of peremptory law, or infallible and inexorable truth. By this class of reasoners, the divine element of authority is stricken out, and man is allowed to trifle with the Scriptures, to play fast and loose with their revelations, as if they were the mere utterances of a higher kind of genius than that which gave us the Iliad, or the Canterbury Tales, or Faust, or Locksley Hall. Beauty, eloquence, lofty thought, tenderness, power, they allow to Scripture—but not authority. They will admire, but not obey, they will listen to its suggestions, but they decline its commands. They will study it, but they will not be bound by it. How this free and easy treatment of the Bible is reconcilable with the idea of a revelation from God, I do not now inquire. I point to it simply as another of the eliminations of the divine element from that which is yet recognized as a divine volume. How strangely destructive are some to thrust God out of his own book! How thoroughly they do this by this repudiation of infallibility and authority! And how blind they are to the loss which they themselves thus sustain in being shut out from all certainty by being deprived of all divine authority.

It is hardly possible to read the Bible without feeling how sternly it condemns this laxity. If some of these free and easy commentators would pronounce it the most bigoted of books. It is so unsparing in its denunciation of error and evil, and so uncompromising in its demands upon men for submission to its teaching. One God, one Christ, one book, one creed, one theology, one religion, one way to salvation! This is its unfaltering utterance from its first verse to its last. "He that believeth shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be damned." It assumes the absolute authority of the Creator. It assumes that as his wisdom is perfect, so all its utterances must be authoritative. It proclaims truth not as an opinion, a speculation, a theory, but a certainty. It takes unhesitatingly for granted that all error is sin; that truth is one, and never becomes antiquated or obsolete, but always blooms in immortal youth, no length of years or ages availing to extract the divine element from what God has once spoken. Unhistorical, as some have, by means of ancient hieroglyphics, or modern arithmetic, tried to prove it, it calmly yet boldly claims to be one true history of heaven and earth, of things visible and invisible. Mythical, as others call it, it spreads before us the naked, rugged facts of four thousand years, each one a veritable fragment of humanity, the embodiment, not of dreams or fantasies, but of living truth. Unphilosophical, as others affirm it to be, it presents to us its revelations as developments of the one authentic philosophy of mind and matter, of good and evil; not solicitous to defend itself from the charges of boasting or of foolishness, which self-sufficient assailants have brought against it; and making no apology for announcing itself as the one revelation which, like its author, is immortal and incorruptible. "The grass withereth, the flower fadeth, but the word of our God shall stand forever."

That this disposition to eliminate or extract the divine element from the Bible is the root of wide spread error, is obvious; that the error is deep and perilous, is no less plain. The tendency of each is, in a greater or less degree, to get rid of a personal God, or to remove him to a distance from us, or to interpose a cloud between him and us, so that the reader of his book shall no longer meet him face to face in that book, but simply certain abstractions, certain algebraic symbols, or unknown quantities, which may or may not mean anything, which lay no hold upon the conscience, either for alarming or pacifying, which still leave the soul without a living personality either to worship or to love.

But this line of error goes farther than the expulsion of the divine word of God. There is the transference of this to the creature, the deifying of man, the robbing God in order to enrich and magnify man. "Ye shall not surely die," was satan's insidious commencement of the rejection of the divine element from what God had spoken; his second step was the promised transference of the divine to the human, "ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil." As man ripens in iniquity, and as the errors we have dwelt upon unfold themselves, this daring transference—this full-blown Impiety of anti-Christ—this last and worst form of man's infidelity will exhibit itself, both in the church and in the world, consummating the evils of the perilous times of which the apostle has given us so appalling a picture.

Transfer the divine element to creation at large, you have pantheism; to images of brass or stone, you have idolatry; to the priest or the church, you have Romanism; to forms and rites and sacraments, and you have ritualism; to the visible things of the senses, and you have materialism; to the intellect, and you have rationalism; to the fancy, and you have religious pictorialism; to the feelings, and you have religious sentimentalism; transfer it to man, simply as man, and you have the last form of anti-Christ—the dethronization of the divine, the enthronization of the human, the rejection of the God-man and the exaltation of a man into his place as the only Messiah of the race, the world's only Redeemer and King.

Most subtle is the error that would have us deal with religious truth as a mere bundle of abstractions or ideas or speculations, of which every man is at liberty to form his own opinion. The essence of the Bible, the Alpha and Omega of revelation, is not truth alone, nor religion alone, but Christianity, a Christianity which is not presented to us merely as the communication of doctrines, but as the settlement of the great personal question between the sinner and God, the solution of the difficulty which law and conscience necessarily raise as to righteousness and grace.

And what is Christianity? Not metaphysics, not mysticism, not a compilation of guesses at the truth. It is the history of the seed of the woman—that seed the Word made flesh; the Word made flesh the revelation of the invisible Jehovah, the representative of the eternal God, the medium of communication between the creator and the creature, between earth and heaven.

And of this Christianity what is the essential characteristic, the indispensible feature from first to last? Is it incarnation or blood-shedding? Is it the cradle or the cross? Is it the scene at Bethlehem or at Golgotha? Assuredly the latter! "Eli, Eli, Lama Sabachthani" is no mere outcry of suffering nature, the cross is no mere scene of human martyrdom, and the great sepulchre is no mere Hawrew tomb. It is only through blood shedding that conscience is purged; it is only the cross that knits heaven and earth together; it is the cross that bears up the collapsing universe; it is the pierced hand that holds the golden sceptre; it is at Calvary that we find the open gate of paradise regained, and the gospel is good news to the sinner of liberty to enter in. Let men with the newly sharpened axes of rationalism do their utmost to hew down that cross, it will stand in spite of them. Let them apply their ecclesiastical paint brush, and daub it all over with the most approved of mediæval pigments to cover its nakedness, its glory will shine through all. Let them scoff at the legal transference of the sinner's guilt to a divine substitute, and of that surety's righteousness to the sinner, as a Lutheran delusion or a Puritan fiction, that mutual transference, that wondrous exchange, will be found to be wrapped up with Christianity itself. Let those who, like Cain of old, shrink from the touch of sacrificial blood and mock the "religion of the shambles," purge their consciousness with the idea of God's universal fatherhood, and try to wash their robes and make them white in something else than the blood of the Lamb; to us, as to the saints of other days, there is but one purging of the conscience, one security for pardon, one way of escape, one bond of reconciliation, one healing of our wounds—the death of him on whom the chastisement of our peace was laid; and one everlasting song "unto him who loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood."

When we speak of error or of truth, we speak of an idea, an abstraction. But the Bible does not deal in mere ideas. It has an orbit of its own, a region of its own, a world of its own—very different from that unto which the wisdom of man never enters—an orbit of which God's throne is the centre, a world of reality, a region of personality, in which the distant becomes near, the invisible the visible, and the shadowy substantial and the palpable. In the Bible we look the living God in the face; and he fixes his gaze on us. Divine revelation, as developed in Christianity, is not the elucidation of certain impersonal or impersonal questions; but the adjustment of all that is personal between us and God, so that we shall know, of a certainty, that in believing we are forgiven all our iniquities. Christianity is not the mere improvement of natural religion, nor the correction of certain philosophical obliquities, nor the removal of certain heathen misrepresentations as to the character of God; but the settlement of the great controversy between us and God, the re-adjustment of our relationship to him, upon a basis and in a way which not merely secures future reconciliation for us, but gives us the present assurance of it, with all the peace, and the liberty, and the holiness which that assurance brings.

It is round the Christ of God that all truth revolves; and hence all error connected either with his person or his work must be perilous. The revelation of the Christ begins at the beginning, and sweeps round a vast circle. It takes up the whole question of the sinner and God, and gives judgment upon every part of it. It condemns man, and justifies God. It pronounces authoritatively, both as to the way of life and the way of death. It does not accept earnestness as a substitute for truth, nor a justification or extenuation of error. It does not show man how to lay the foundation of the great settlement for eternity, it lays the foundation and presents us with everything on God's side as finished. It begins by announcing what God has done, before it says one word of what man is to do; it shows us God as the doer and the giver—man as the receiver, setting aside unsparingly every religion and every doctrine which would make man either in whole or in part his own savior; or which would make worship or service a thing of proxy, and shift the personality and the responsibility of the great transaction between the soul and God, to a priest, or a minister, or a church, or a ceremony, or a sacrament, or a creed.

Thus it is that, through the belief of God's testimony to the great propitiation, we are not only justified, but we know, we are assured, that we are; and thus it is that, through the simple reception of the glad tidings, all the gladness which they contain is transferred to us. Believing, we rejoice; we are saved; we have everlasting life.

The revelation of the Christ embraces in it the revelation of the Church in him, as his temple, his body, his bride; his present witness on earth, and the watcher for his return in glory. This church, even on earth, is no mere association of men holding certain opinions, no mere corporation favored with certain privileges, but a body chosen and called out of a world of darkness. Its legislation is divine, not human; its laws are not its own ideas of expediency and order, but the commandments of its Head. The essence of its constitution is not socialism, nor republicanism, nor despotism, nor anarchy; but an unearthly organization founded on entire subjection to its heavenly Head; an organization working itself out in order, unity, growth, fruitfulness, love, and zeal. Its ministers are not philosophers, nor lecturers, nor theorists, nor humorists, nor orators, nor priests; but messengers of God's free love, expositors of the Word, and shepherds of the flock, and executors of government and discipline. Its members are not politicians, nor lovers of pleasure, nor worshipers of gold, nor men who are trying to make the best of both worlds; but men alive from the dead, through the power of the Holy Spirit, possessors of a heavenly peace, bearers of a cross, yet heirs of a kingdom, strangers upon the earth, yet citizens of the New Jerusalem, which cometh down from God out of heaven.

All the errors of the age we cannot hope to shun; yet many more we might be delivered from, did we trust more to the Heavenly Teacher and his heavenly teaching; for surely the promise is to us, "He will guide you into all truth. . . .Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and know all things." Let us learn each truth directly from the Master's lips, so shall it be vital and productive; otherwise we shall be the possessors but of a second-hand, and therefore a second-rate religion—a reflected religion, with all the coldness of moonshine, but none of the warmth of the glorious sun; a timid and shrivelled piety that does no mighty deeds, and speaks no words of power—that will not even stand the tear and wear of life, far less brave the brunt of battle, or compete for the martyr's crown.

It is truth that makes us free, for all error is bondage. If, then, you would be free men, grasp the truth, tenaciously, bravely, calmly; bind it round you as a girdle, treasure it in your heart of hearts. "Buy the truth and sell it not;" that is, get it at any cost, part with it never. Error is sin, for which every man shall give an account to God; and sin is no mere mischance or misfortune that claims pity only, but not condemnation nor punishment; else what means the fiery law; what means the cross of the sin-bearer; what means the great white throne; what means the everlasting fire? "Stand, therefore, having your loins girt about with truth," remembering your high calling, as witnesses for the truth and the True One. Let neither your words nor your lives give any uncertain sound. Every man to whom the Bible comes is responsible for believing all the truth which that revelation proclaims, and for rejecting all the error which it condemns. Cleave, then, to the Word of the living God; and sit, as teachable disciples, at the feet of him who has said learn of me. So shall you be led into all truth and delivered from all error. Otherwise, how shall you stand, either now or in the evil day? How shall you hope to win the victory, or receive the recompense to him that overcometh? We once saw a painting—the representation of the last struggle of an ancient king. He and three of his pursuers are on horseback, engaged hand to hand in deadly battle. Even with such odds, he looks a man, for nature and strength and sinew, fitted to win the day. But the shield which he holds in his left hand is broken; the sword which he grasps so firmly in his right, is snapped in two, and his helmet has fallen from his head. With half a sword, with a splintered shield, without a helmet—how can he, old warrior as he is, win the field? What can he do but die? Let us in our great battle of life remember this, and if we would overcome, let us take the whole armor of God—the shield, the breastplate, the helmet, and the sword. So shall we fight; so shall we be more than conquerors; and the God of peace shall bruise Satan under our feet shortly.

The day of error will not always last. The day of truth is coming. For we know that though in the last days perilous times shall come; yet beyond these there is the splendor of the most glorious day that ever dawned upon the earth; for he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry. He that testifieth these things saith, Surely I come quickly. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus.—London Quarterly Journal of Prophecy.

The Temple of Jerusalem.

"For thus saith the Lord of hosts; yet once, it is a little while, and I will shake the heavens and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land; and I will shake all nations; and the desire of all nations shall come; and I will fill this house with glory, saith the Lord of hosts. . . . The glory of this latter house shall be greater than of the former, saith the Lord of hosts: and in this place will I give peace, saith the Lord of hosts." Haggai ii, 6-9.

I desire especial attention to this remarkable prophecy. The common conclusion of commentators is, that our Lord fulfilled the prediction by honoring the temple of Herod with his presence and his teaching. But the difficulties which stand in the way of such an exposition are not only formidable, but invincible. Our Lord did not at that time shake the heavens and the earth; neither did he give peace in that house, nor fill it with his glory. On the contrary, he found it a den of thieves, and left it such, for it was given over to fire and desolation. Expositors have puzzled themselves and their readers by violation of the unities; by seeking the predicted shaking at the seige of Jerusalem, and succeeding wars and commotions; whereas the prophet gives the true order of events. It is after the shaking of the heavens and the earth that the Lord appears and fills the house with glory, and establishes that profound peace of which the glory is a sign and a pledge. The promise is repeated in the close of the chapter: "I will shake the heavens and the earth: and I will overthrow the throne of kingdoms, and I will destroy the strength of the kingdoms of the heathen; and I will overthrow the chariots, and those that ride in them; and the horses and their riders shall come down, every one by the sword of his brother. In that day, saith the Lord of Hosts, will I take thee, O Zerubbabel, my servant, and will make thee as a signet." (ii, 21-23). Now none of these circumstances transpired in connection with the ministry of our Lord. The thrones and kingdoms of the heathen are as strong as ever, and the dead governor lies in his grave, waiting for the day when the Lord will receive him, and make him as a signet. I wish to anticipate all reasonable objection. It has been said,—If the Lord comes to fill another—a future—temple with glory, how can that be "this latter house" of which the Lord spake by the prophet? To this I reply, God speaks of the temple as a unity—as one continuous thing. See for proof the ninth verse: "Who is left among you that saw this house in her first glory, and how do ye see it now?" Clearly "this house" covers both the buildings, and moreover, has wider extension—even to the end. If this were not admitted, it would be easy to embarrass the objector by asking him how he finds the unity between Ezra and Nehemiah, and the more superb edifice reared by king Herod? Those who believe that the prophecy was fulfilled at the first Advent, just as quietly take it for granted that our Lord entered the actual structure reared by the returned captives. It was the same temple, but only in the large and continuous sense which I have indicated; and so it will be equally true when the more sublime temple of the future is founded, and the king returns to fill it with his glory.

Ezekiel, who has described the final temple in the most circumstantial manner, was permitted to see "in the spirit" the return of the departed glory and beyond all reasonable doubt he paints the glory which Haggai predicted: "Afterwards he brought me to the gate, even the gate that looketh toward the east; and, behold, the glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the east: and his voice was like a noise of many waters, and the earth shined with his glory. . . . And the glory of the Lord came into the house by the way of the gate whose prospect is toward the east." . . . . "And he said unto me, Son of Man, the place of my throne, and the place of the soles of my feet, where I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel for ever, and my holy name shall the house of Israel no more defile." (Ezek. xliii. 1, 2, 4, 7.)

But I have reserved for the conclusion of this note the consideration which will be admitted as the most conclusive of all. Paul distinctly puts the shaking of the heavens and the earth into the future by his quotation and commentary on Haggai's words: "Whose voice then cut the giving of the law shook the earth; but now he hath promised, saying, Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven. And this word, Yet once more, signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken, as of things that are made, that those things which cannot be shaken may remain. Wherefore we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear: for our God is a consuming fire." (Heb. xii. 26-29.)—G. Greenwell, in Rainbow.

John the Baptist and Christ.

To this preaching, to this baptism, in the thirtieth year of his age, came Jesus from Galilee. John was his kinsman by birth, but the circumstances of their life had entirely separated them. John, as a child, in the house of a blameless priest, his father, lived at Juttah, in the far south of the tribe of Judah, and not far from Hebron. Jesus had lived in the deep seclusion of the carpenter shop in the valley of Galilee. When he first came to the banks of the Jordan, the great forerunner, according to his own emphatic and twice-repeated testimony, "knew him not." Though Jesus was not revealed as the Messiah to his great herald prophet, there was something in his look, something in the sinless beauty of his ways, something in the solemn majesty of his aspect which at once overawed and captivated the soul of John. To others he was the uncompromising prophet; kings he could confront with rebuke; Pharisees he could unmask with indignation; but before this presence all his lofty bearing falls. As when some unknown dread checks the flight of the eagle, and makes him settle with lustred scream and drooping plumage on the ground, so, before the purity of a sinless life, the wild prophet of the desert becomes like a submissive and timid child. The battle-spirit which brainwaries could not daunt—the lofty manhood before which hierarchs trembled and princes grew pale, resigns itself, submits, adores, before moral force which is weak to every external attribute, and armed only in mysteric mail.

John bowed to the simple, stainless manhood before he had been inspired to recognize the divine commission. He earnestly tried to forbid the purpose of Jesus. He who had received the confessions of all others, now reverently and humbly confess his own: "I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?" The response contains the second recorded utterance of Jesus, and the first word of his public ministry: "Suffer it to be so now, for thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness."—Farrar's Life of Christ.

Missionaries Appreciated by Heathen.

The self-sacrifices of missionaries in their work is admired by the heathen. Of course, the more intelligent think the missionaries a deluded set, and prefer their own religion. But the love displayed by these men extorts from a Hindo this meed of praise:

"However we may differ with the Christian missionaries in religion . . . . as regards their learning, purity of morals, and disinterestedness of intention to promote our weal, no doubt is entertained throughout the land; nay, they are held by us in the highest esteem. European history does not bear on its record the mention of a class of men who suffered so many sacrifices in the cause of humanity and education as the Christian missionary in India; and, though the native community differ with them in the opinion that Hindustan will one day be included in Christendom, (for the worship of Almighty God in his unity, as laid down in the Holy Vedas, is, and has been, our religion for thousands of years, and is enough to satisfy all our spiritual wants,) yet we cannot forbear doing justice to the venerable ministers of a religion who, I do here most solemnly assert-rate, in piety and righteousness, alone are fit to be classed with those Rishees and Mohattmas of antiquity who derived their support, and that of their charitable boarding school from voluntary subscriptions, and consecrated their lives to the cause of God and knowledge."—Dr. Buttler's "Land of the Veda."

THE RESTITUTION

PLYMOUTH, IND.....OCT. 11th, 1876

EDITORIAL DEPARTMENT.

☞We clip the following item from the New York Independent, of last week. The signs of the times are pointing strongly toward Jewish colonization:

The Hebrew population of Jerusalem has been greatly increased the past five years by the return of Jews from all parts of the world, especially from Russia. The Jewish Herald (English) says this movement is unprecedented.

☞Dr. Burrows, a Baptist clergyman, of Louisville, recently communed with a Disciple church down in Virginia. He was brought to judgement by his church for the unholy act. He made a confession of his great sin, and was forgiven by his particular church; but a number of the Baptist papers yet feel that the man is not sufficiently humiliated. They claim that he is not repentant enough. The Disciples have all been immersed in water which is not sufficient. Perhaps a Dunkard who has been dipped three times might fill the bill. Who ever dreamed of a jacket so tight before.

☞Now that the heat of a great political campaign is about over, it is to be hoped that the people will assume a more consistent way of talking—and in some cases—reflect upon their hot, slanderous words. Some men have an idea that it is not immoral to steal from a railroad corporation, or tell big lies during a political campaign. But if they will only reflect, they will find that they have lost much personal respect by trying to hush conscience in order to blacken some name standing opposed to them in party issues. Stealing and lying react upon the morals of him who thinks that truth can be made to sleep while men are sowing tares.

☞It is to be hoped that our brethren will give us some stirring articles upon this life. Old controverted subjects about what God will do with Adam, etc., should give place to earnest articles upon the real burdens and duties of to-day. Brethren who have bobbies feel aggrieved sometime, because we do not open wide the gate and let their views have a prominent place in our columns. It has been the RESTITUTION'S aim to be liberal with all, but we must put the check rein on occasionally. The great aim of the gospel, if we understand it, is to develop men's character, to improve their minds, to build them up in truth and to fit them for immortality. Merely to have a correct knowledge of truth with a cold heart, will upset men from the way of life, unless the moral condition of the heart is improved by gospel influences, its work is lost. Some men are so brazen as to think that they are God's "vessels of mercy," merely because they believe correctly and are unlike everybody else. Such conceit will vanish in God's judgement day.

☞Bro. Dugger wrote a short article to the Sabbath Advocate, upon the law question, and states that he and his Seventh Day brethren do not keep the "law of Moses," but that they do keep the "law of God." It hardly seems necessary to inform the reader that the "law of Moses" and the "law of God" are spoken of in the Bible as one law. Bro. Dugger also states that the ten commandments are "a perfect rule of action." Sometime when our brother is alone, we hope he will look over the ten commandments and find that blessed precept, "thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." This precept was in Moses' law, but not AMONG THE TEN. Another good precept reads, "THOU SHALT LOVE THE LORD THY GOD WITH ALL THY HEART," etc. This holy command is NOT ON EITHER TABLE OF STONE, but it is written upon the fleshy tables of the heart. Is it not strange that in all the epistles of the New Testament not one word of instruction is given about how, when, or why men should keep the Seventh Day? If Bro. Dugger had been the writer of the fourteen epistles of Paul, do you suppose that he would have passed by the Seventh Day entirely? The Jews had eight Sabbaths, and Paul says they were nailed to the cross. No sophism can dodge it, no special pleading can get the Seventh Day out of the general question. It was a holy day, and reached its end in Christ. See Lev. xxiii. 1–3; Hos. ii. 11; Col. ii. 16.

If less judgments do not their work,
God can and will send greater.

It is a strong hand that conquers hard and unbelieving hearts.

If the wickedness of men ruffle our spirits, God's consolations may compose them.

It tends much to encourage our faith to reflect on the great things God has done for us.

Journal of Travels and Labors.

I returned to Canton, reaching there the next Saturday. I preached Saturday evening, Sunday morning and evening at a schoolhouse about two miles from the city. Had quite good congregations and excellent interest. Several preachers from the city had excited curiosity to hear the other side by their opposition.

Sunday afternoon quite a number of brethren, sisters, and friends convened at Bro. Eshleman's house. After a discourse from the teachings of Christ, we partook of the emblems of the broken body and shed blood of the Son of God. Near sunset the same day we repaired to the water and the writer immersed Bro. ANABEL'S wife. I remained in the city until the following Friday, visiting brethern and sisters Eshleman, and others of the household of faith, besides some who are not, but whom we hope will be united with us.

I next revisited Glasgow, where I remained over the following Sunday. I made my home with our good brother and sister Reznic, who are the only obedient believers in the place. Quite a number are investigating, and many are favorable to our views. I preached Sunday morning at Port Washington to a small congregation, but in the afternoon the audience was larger, and in the evening, at the M. E. church at Burr Oak, to a full house of very attentive hearers.

The next Sunday I visited Lenark, Ill., having been absent two months. I preached on Saturday evening, Sunday morning and afternoon in the Abrahamic church, to quite fair congregations; and Sunday evening I lectured on the subject of temperance in the M. E. church to about eight hundred people. The spacious meeting house was filled to its utmost capacity. Pending an election for city officers, and the question of license or no license, the ministers and members of the different churches had been holding union temperance meetings for a number of Sunday evenings. They united in an invitation to me to lecture on the subject of temperance, giving me the entire evening.

The temperance party were defeated in the election the next week by four or five votes. They have gone to work in earnest to educate the people so as to defeat the rumsellers and their abettors at the next election.

The next Sunday I attended the conference which convened at Antioch, Ind. As the report showed, it was one of the best conferences we have had. The next Sunday I preached in Chicago in the morning and lectured on the Eastern question. Had a fair congregation in the morning, and much larger in the afternoon. It has seldom been my privilege to address a more attentive and intelligent congregation. Our brethren in the city are making an effort to keep up weekly preaching in the city, without which they cannot get a congregation to keep up interest.

My next appointments were at Tolono and near Pesotum, Champaigne county, Ill. There is a body of fifteen or twenty believers in the vicinity of Pesotum, among whom are five or six brethren Gardeners, formerly of Canada. I preached Friday evening and Sunday morning in a schoolhouse in the neighborhood of brethren Gardeners. Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon I preached at Pesotum, the first discourses on our faith that has been delivered in that enterprising village. Sunday evening I lectured on the Eastern question to a very fair congregation who gave their undivided attention, and seemed much interested. The meetings at both places were well attended, and excellent interest was manifested in the word spoken. At Pesotum the congregation increased in numbers at each succeeding meeting. There seems to be a good opening at both places. Our indefatigable Bro. Hatch has visited the former place mentioned quite frequently. I next visited West Lebanon, where I had been preaching monthly for about nine months. There are quite a body of substantial brethren and sisters, who meet in their own pleasant house for worship. Under favorable circumstances there is always good congregations, and good interest. It is one of the oldest churches of the Abrahamic faith in the state of Indiana. At my last visit I preached the funeral of Bro. Evans, the son of Bro. David Evans, to a large congregation considering the prevalence of sickness in the community. On account of the pressure of the times, the brethren concluded that it would not be advisable for me to continue my visits. This leaves only one church out of four or five composed of our oldest brethren who feel able to support preaching. Like Bro. Wagoner, I must go into a saw mill or some other avocation for a bare living. I am satisfied by many years experience, that no man can spend his entire time in the proclamation of the truth, and live, without soon being so embarrassed with debts that he must possess more than ordinary business tact to work his way out at all.

I re-visited Lenark, preaching at Bro. Elliott's on my way and return. I next visited Burgett's Corners. So many were sick, that but few were able to attend. More in reference to that church after my next visit, which will embrace the last Sunday in this month. Brethren please arrange accordingly.

I next visited Paris, remaining over four days, preaching one evening in Paris to a fine congregation of intelligent auditors, and three evenings, and twice on Sunday, morning and afternoon in Bro. Thomas Young's neighborhood. So many were sick that our congregations were not large. About one hundred and fifty turned out to our grove meeting on Sunday. Will visit that neighborhood again the first Sunday in November.

The Covenants of Promise.

A covenant is an agreement entered into between two or more persons, or parties. In a certain sense, in Scripture, there may be many covenants But Paul speaks of but two covenants, one from Sinai, the latter a national covenant with the Jews, the covenant "of sin and death," the other of grace, world-wide, not national, the covenant "of life in Christ Jesus." The one commenced with Abraham four hundred and thirty years before the law, and has been gradually unfolding ever since, and will find its completion in the regeneration of the earth, the salvation and glorification of all the redeemed, and in the destruction of all the wicked.

The one is enunciated in prophecy, as Gen. xiii. 14, 15; xv. 18-21; xvii. 1-9; xii. 1-3; Jer. xxxi. 31-34, and various other Scriptures, too numerous even to mention. The other is found in the Sinaitic law, in all the laws of the Jews as a nation, grouping the Jews together into "a kingdom of priests and a holy nation," with God as their King, but only so long as they obey his voice. After having disobeyed his voice, after having become so corrupt that they were unfitted to be his people, then God took away his kingdom, declaring that it should be "no more until he (Christ) came, whose right it is," and that he would "give it him."

This law covenant had no life to give, but denounced punishments and death upon the disobedient. Hence Paul could well call it "the law of sin and death." True, God gave the Jews the promised land, but only as tenants-at-will during good behavior, blessing them in basket and store, in health and long life, and great national prosperity so long as obedient but denounced national sufferings, dishonor and death for disobedience. This is all that covenant had to offer. It could not give life, but brought death.

Judaism has always objected to this view. Paul had to reprehend Jewish Christians for their adherence of the law. They asked Paul, in his view of the law, "What then is the superiority of the Jews, or What the profit of circumcision?" None, he would answer, as regarded the inheritance, the eternal life; for these came not through law. But he admitted the Jews had this pre-eminence: "They were entrusted with the oracles of God," and through whom Christ came. But otherwise they were all alike, both Jews and Gentiles, "under sin"—and that by "Works of law no human being shall be justified" in the sight of God.

So that, aside from the oracles of God, national blessings in basket and store, and long life, if obedient; the Jews had no pre-eminence over the Gentiles. All were sinners, all had to die, and, without the sacrifice of Jesus, and his means of grace, none could be saved, either Jew or Gentile.

Paul clearly demonstrated that the old covenant had nothing to do with the Gospel preached to Abraham, with the promises in him and the Christ, nor with any of the blessings of this age and the ages to come. These all belonged to the new covenant in some of its phases from Abraham to the closing ages of Christ's reign and the doom of the world. Paul said, (Gal. ii. 21,) "I do not frustrate the grace of God; for if righteousness came by the law, then Christ is dead in vain." If men could be saved under the law covenant, then the death of Christ was useless, was of no account.

Again, Gal. iii. 11-18. Paul demonstrates that none are saved by law but by faith. "and the law is not of faith." "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law" "that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ." "Now to Abraham and his seed (the Christ) were the promises made," and this "covenant was confirmed of God in Christ" "four hundred and thirty years before the law." And "if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise." Gal. iii. 24-29, declares "the law was our school-master to bring us to Christ," and that we "are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus," not by the law covenant, and if we "be Christ's, then are we Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" made Abraham before the law.

Again, Paul allegorized "the two covenants," thus: "The one from the Mount Sinai, which gendereth to bondage, which is Agar," and answered "to Jerusalem which now is," that is the law covenant; "the other by a free woman," Sarah, and that "by promise." "What saith the Scripture? Cast out the bond-woman and her son"—Agar and all the children of the law; for these "shall not be heirs with the son of the woman—with Sarah and her seed by promise.

The object of the present phase of the new covenant, and the object since Christ's ascension, has been and is, to elect, bless, save, qualify and prepare rules for the kingdom age for their duties and glorious destiny during that age for the proclamation of the everlasting Gospel, the subjugation of the nations of the earth to Christ's reign, and the blessing of all nations that bless Abraham, and the cursing of all nations that curse Abraham. And, when this age is finished, it will place all the redeemed of all ages on the regenerated earth in the Paradise of God, and forever destroy as with the besom of destruction all the wicked of all ages.

Christ then is the end of the law, has abrogated the law covenant, and now is head of all things as regards the church, and without him there is no salvation to one son or daughter of Adam's race. The new covenant, "the law of life in Christ Jesus," that without which there can be no salvation, is Christ in prophecy, in his first coming, in his death, resurrection, glorification and priesthood, in his journey to a far country—heaven—to receive his kingdom, in his coming again to raise and immortalize his dead saints, to change his living to regather and resettle in their own land the Jews as the kingdom of God, over whom and the nations of the earth he and his saints will rule, in the offer of eternal life to all the nations of the earth during his reign, and in the salvation of all the people of God, and the utter overthrow and destruction of all the wicked And, when all is finished, to hand back to his Father a redeemed, glorified earth, that God may be all in all, forever and forever!

ALFRED MALONE.

Prof. Huxley—His Two Grand Points—His Logical Basis for Reasoning, and His Demonstration of Evolution.

1. His "logical basis of every process of reasoning," needs notice. Lecture 1st, Tribune report. This basis is "the order of nature;" which excluded the idea of chance: or "the notion of interference with that order."

But anon, he seems to evade all this by suggesting the opposite—"as there may have been a time, he says when evidence did not follow a first order; when the relations of cause and effect were not fixed and definite—cautious men will admit that such a change in the order of nature may have been possible; just as every candid thinker will admit that there may be a world in which two and two do not make four!"

Here we have suggested by him a logical basis for doubting, that underlies and subverts his more primal "basis for every process of reasoning!" To my feeble apprehension this loosens the series and unsettles all his own argumentation and "every process of reasoning;" as well.

Surely we are in such a world already where 2 and 2 do not make 4; but only to the unbeliever,—or idiot, that is incapable of noting such numerals! And I do not see why any "candid thinker" should suffer his mind to be let into an imaginary, and to us, an impossible world, save to create a state of doubt and mental confusion, where the professor's "probable belief" and science too may sink to final oblivion!

Forever until Prof. Huxley shall have found such "a world where 2 and 2 do not make 4," as he suggests, he should stick to this for his logical basis of reasoning to "candid thinkers" where "cause and effect are fixed, and 2 and 2 do make 4."

If I see he turns the tables over himself; and buries his argument under the loose lumber logic! But if his indigent in doubt prompts his notion of a chaotic "world where 2 and 2 do not make 4," to unsettle belief in this; his "candid thinker," I trust, will prefer to adhere to this where "cause and effect are definite;" and "2 and 2 do make 4."

II. The demonstration of evolution. The professor finds an analogy between the varied gradations in animal forms: as in the horse's legs and the human arm, etc. Thence he traced back the possible gradations of the horse through extinct forms toward that which he regards as the primal type! But on all this, it is obvious to notice the fact there is economy observed in the varied gradations of vegetable, as well as animal forms of organic life. The mechanical powers are few and the same may enter, as required, into all existing forms of living beings; and hence when prompted by pride of learning or singularity, or novelty, an enthusiast may find in this a proof of evolution on every line of singularity in organized life; as he desires.

The mechanic must employ substantially the same powers as, needed, through all his gradations of mechanical skill; but the enthusiast or deceived alone, finds here the doctrine of evolution, so in this case precisely. The professor's bed is too short for his "candid thinker" to lie on. His facts do not reach the length of his presumed logic—except in mistake.

Again, he should not ignore the fact that there are myriad forms of mere animal, and also of human life now, as in past ages, that perish.—Nay more, that the most imperfect forms are the first that so perish! Hence, they cannot evolve into higher forms. The facts are all, as a body, against his argument. So they remain till the nondescript form has certainly evolved by well ascertained gradations, into a form the most complete of its kind. But as the most immature forms are those that most certainly and quickly perish; the logic of the great mass of facts which his subject embraces lies in the line of dissolution!—and all against his evolutions!

Furthermore, his "dry bones," (like unsupplied mechanical forces) have no voice except his own—no effort toward life or motion. The will, the purpose and the living power to start them, to clothe them, and inspire them or use them, must always come from without. This is absolute, as that Prof. Huxley had his "bones" for illustration; or that "2 and 2 do make 3;" within the entire range of his argument as to our world, where alone it has any "logical basis;" or possible application. "Evolution" is true, however, where wisely applied; and that is where there is a competent will as the cause, or exclusive agency and an adequate management—as an architect, a builder, and then the household occupants—an engineer, an engine and the lengthened train it moves, under the direction of its conductor! But there must be some such order in it.

In the valley of vision the "dry bones" needed the word of power, and the lips—giving spirit ere they could live. But Prof. Huxley's "bones" and pictures did not testify. They remain silent. All we heard was his personal opinion; which is, at most, as he said in giving his logical basis, "a probable belief;" and this is only as sure as that "2 and 2 may not make 4!"

His "cautious men and candid thinkers"—should I think beware.

"The evolution" that belongs to us—that has its world wide monuments in "the order of nature;" in the circuit of the seasons; seed time and harvest; its orders of animated beings, "each after its kind—whose seed is in itself!" Nay more; it has its evolution of the ages; Patriarchal, Mosaic and Christian, as they evolve toward "the restitution of all things spoken!" And all this transpiring as foretold! But the dry bones and fossils of rocks are both deaf, and dumb, and dead! But "the evolution" of the ages and earthly empires, has an open record; "known and read of all men." The present evil and the promised good; the penalty and promise transpire as declared.

"I am God says he—declaring the end from the beginning; and from ancient times the things not yet done. Saying my counsel shall stand." Isa. xliv. to xlvi. 10.

It is marvelous that God may so overrule armies, and kings; and distribute the devil and death, so far as to demonstrate evolution, under his direction; and to accomplish his end—his good pleasure! It is to rid the world of all that causes its "groanings for deliverance." Rom. viii, 21–22; Rev. xx. and xxi.

The occasion for subjecting creaturehood to "vanity," is man's sin and to demonstrate "evolution" from evil to good, and make the demonstration absolute, that it is not of the erring creature man; but that "salvation is of the Lord."

The mechanic makes chips and leaves fragments; but his intended mechanicism is not to be determined by them. No, no; we judge of his wisdom and skill and capacity for good results, by his progressive stages toward those results, and his word as to their adaptations to secure them. So of the Divine operations. Here is this great world, with its overhanging heavens, age after age, obeying the same "ordinances;" its nations' history from Nimrod to Napoleon, in accord with Prophecy; its dispensations, in fulfillment of its unfolding promise, that the Messiah "shall bruise the serpents head;" all and each, indicating the all-comprehending wisdom and good will of God, to "deliver" his world from evil, and fill it with glory as "the waters fill the sea!"

We can well afford to abandon the fragments or fossils of the past, and give ourselves to prayer and preparation for the blessed consummation!

The blessed hope comes from above to uplift and in due time to resurrect; but the dry bones have no voice, except that of the ancient idol, as dictated by devotees to level them down to the same plane, without hope!
